[The Hon. the Speaker.]

SECOND SITTING

The Hon. the Speaker commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to proceed to the House of Commons and acquaint that House that it is His Excellency the Administrator's pleasure that they attend him immediately in the Senate Chamber.

The House of Commons being come,

Their Speaker, the Hon. James Jerome, said:

May it please Your Excellency,

The House of Commons has elected me their Speaker, though I am but little able to fulfil the important duties thus assigned to me.

If, in the performance of those duties, I should at any time fall into error, I pray that the fault may be imputed to me, and not to the Commons, whose servant I am, and who, through me, the better to enable them to discharge their duty to their Queen and country, humbly claim all their undoubted rights and privileges, especially that they may have freedom of speech in their debates, access to Your Excellency's person at all seasonable times, and that their proceedings may receive from Your Excellency the most favourable construction.

The Hon. the Speaker of the Senate answered:

Mr. Speaker, I am commanded by His Excellency the Administrator of the Government of Canada to declare to you that he freely confides in the duty and attachment of the House of Commons to Her Majesty's person and Government, and not doubting that their proceedings will be conducted with wisdom, temper and prudence, he grants, and upon all occasions will recognize and allow their constitutional privileges. I am commanded also to assure you that the Commons shall have ready access to His Excellency upon all seasonable occasions and that their proceedings, as well as your words and actions, will constantly receive from him the most favourable construction.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

His Excellency the Administrator of the Government of Canada was then pleased to open the First Session of the Thirtieth Parliament with the following speech:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

I have the honour to welcome you to the First Session of the 30th Parliament of Canada.

I am here today in my capacity as Administrator of the Government of Canada, duties which I assumed following the illness suffered by the Governor General last June. Canadians were saddened to hear of His Excellency's stroke, but have been encouraged by reports of his steady progress. I am happy to say that his recovery is such that providing all continues to go well he will be able to resume his role before too long. I am sure I reflect the feelings of all Canadians in expressing gratitude that he will be able to give further service to his country in the high office which he holds.

This year marks an event of particular interest and importance to all Canadians—the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the entry of Newfoundland into Confederation. We anticipate with great pleasure the visit of His Royal Highness, the Duke of Edinburgh, who will shortly join us to share in this happy occasion. In November the citizens of Ontario will welcome Her Royal Highness Princess Anne and her husband who will attend the opening of the Royal Agricultural Winter Fair and other civic engagements.

The international economic situation is serious, with a high rate of inflation, balance of payments problems, lower growth rates and the rapid accumulation of large currency reserves by a few countries. Canada is engaging in bilateral and multilateral discussions as part of a concerted effort to ensure that the current fragile state of the world's economy is strengthened. Those developing countries lacking the natural resources which have enabled others to benefit from high commodity prices have been particularly hard hit by this situation. Canada is contributing to international measures to reduce the unjust and potentially dangerous gap between the rich and the poor. This will involve us not only in increasing the flow of financial assistance to developing countries but in re-examining other policies which affect our economic relations with the Third World.

Canada has contributed to many international peace-keeping operations. A source of special concern at present is the instability in Cyprus and in the Middle East where 2,000 members of Canada's Armed Forces are performing dedicated service with the two peacekeeping forces which the United Nations has established there. While these forces have had some success in keeping the belligerents apart, the necessary political solutions appear distant and, unhappily, civilian casualties, as well as casualties among members of the peacekeeping forces, continue.

In the context of the United Nations, Canada will also take:

- initiatives to provide for adequate safeguards so that spreading nuclear technology and materials are not perverted for military purposes;
- initiatives to increase world food aid so that the disastrous shortages some countries are experiencing may be alleviated.

For Canada as well as for most of the world the most serious problem is inflation; it is necessary both to deal with its causes and to mitigate its effects. This world-wide problem had its origins in the largest increases in food, energy and other commodity prices in a generation, occurring at the same time as an upsurge in economic activity in all major industrialized nations. The policy of the Government on inflation has been to pursue appropriate fiscal and monetary policies, and:

- to increase the supply of goods and services;
- to protect those least able to protect themselves; as well as
- to soften the impact of soaring oil prices on Canadian consumers and to cushion the economy against disruptive increases in other commodities.

It was generally expected, inside Canada and outside, that the tide of inflation would recede as conditions in the international food and commodity markets returned to normal, but a new situation has been created. The major oil exporting countries have re-affirmed their determination to keep the prices of their oil to importing countries, including Canada, at a high level. New adversities have fallen upon crops in Canada, the United States and elsewhere with possible adverse effects for food prices. Industrial commodities have not generally fallen in price as much as some expected in a world of static or falling industrial production. International interest rates have been pushed up to record levels and financial markets have been seriously disturbed.

Industrial unrest has become more prevalent in the world as a result of inflation. Agreements reached through collective bargaining are being abrogated as workers feel they have inadequate compensation to deal with inflation. In some countries there is a threat to the cohesion of the very fabric of society.

As various groups in society try to protect themselves against rising prices by seeking higher incomes, a stronger element of cost derived inflation is created. It is clear that some groups are much better equipped to protect themselves than others. Corporations, trade and professional associations, labour unions and governments are in most cases all able to adjust to inflation, but there are many Canadians on fixed incomes and others lacking economic power whose incomes are not rising as rapidly as the rate of inflation and for whom the consequences of inflation are a cause for concern.

Canada has thus far suffered less from inflation than most other countries, but the problem is serious and urgent. For its part, the Government will exercise restraint in its own expenditures with particular emphasis on improving effectiveness and efficiency in its existing operations while controlling expansion of new activities which, although desirable, would contribute to inflationary pressures. The Federal Government will urge that provincial and municipal governments take similar steps.

The total expenditures of the Federal Government in the 1975-76 fiscal year are expected to incorporate the costs of certain major new measures, including payments to equalize prices of petroleum products in Canada. Insofar as further new initiatives are concerned, the Government will be conscious of the need for restraint and careful phasing in relation to the state of the economy. Federal expenditures on goods and services, as opposed to various transfer payments, have remained relatively constant as a proportion of Gross National Product for some years, and their proportion was lower in 1973 than it was in 1961.

The Government does not intend deliberately to generate slack in the economy in order to combat inflation. Higher production, not lower, is essential to slowing down price advances. The Government does intend to ask all Canadians to join with it in a co-operative effort to achieve by non-inflationary means an equitable sharing among all groups in the community of the fruits of our productive efforts.

In order to increase the supply of goods and services, which is the first objective of the Government in dealing with inflation, a number of measures will be proposed:

- To increase food production—
 - incentives to farmers and fishermen including the stabilization of incomes and markets,
 - continued international action to ensure that Canada has the right to manage its coastal resources and environment, including the conservation of fish stocks;
- To increase construction of homes—
 - financial assistance in order to reduce the cost of serviced land and to encourage land assembly;
- To increase economic productivity—
 - greater financial and other support for small business,
 - continued reorientation of manpower activities so that Canadians are trained and available in the right locations to fill the increased number of job opportunities,
 - amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act,
 - extension of the Regional Development Incentives Act;
- To increase the supply of energy—
 - the establishment of Petro-Canada, the national petroleum corporation,
 - guarantees for domestic control of uranium and for adequate future supplies related to Canadian needs,
 - steps to ensure that the price of Canadian oil and gas is regulated in a manner which will encourage necessary exploration and development in Canada;
- To ensure continued export of Canadian grain—
 - legislation to ensure the resumed movement of Western grain, if the current dispute has not already been resolved,
 - steps to facilitate grain handling this winter.

In order to help protect those particularly hard hit by inflation, which is another objective in the battle against inflation, the following measures will be taken or proposed:

- To monitor food prices—
 - renew the mandate of the Food Prices Review Board until the end of 1975 so that it may continue to report regularly on trends in food prices and analyze the reasons for price changes in specific areas;
- To help home buyers—
 - additional assistance to buyers of moderately priced housing who have not owned a home before,
 - ask financial institutions to continue to direct all low down payment high ratio mortgages exclusively to moderately priced housing,

- a Registered Home Owners Savings Plan,
- a system of warranties which will protect new home buyers of National Housing Act financed homes,
- better disclosure provisions for the true interest rates on mortgages;
- To protect the consumer—
 - first stage amendment of the Combines Investigation Act, including measures dealing with unfair or uncompetitive business practices such as misleading advertising and pyramid, referral or bait-and-switch selling,
 - a comprehensive overhaul of consumer credit legislation, including disclosure by all lending institutions of effective rates of interest on all loans,
 - a total revision of our bankruptcy law, including special procedures to help the consumer debtor,
 - improved safety of consumer electrical products,
 - establishment of more consumer storefront offices;
- To assist those having difficulty finding employment, and in cooperation with the provinces—
 - a community employment strategy for people who experience chronic and particular difficulty in finding and keeping regular employment,
 - special efforts on behalf of individuals and specific groups who are ready and willing to work but tend to experience particular difficulty in finding regular employment;
- To help older citizens, the needy and war veterans—
 - provide for regular increases in the Year's Maximum Pensionable Earnings in 1976 and subsequent years, revise the Year's Basic Exemption, and eliminate the earnings test on retirement pensions for people aged 65 to 70,
 - provide for the payment of allowances to the spouses aged 60 to 65 of Old Age Security recipients effective October 1975 and eliminate certain hardships involving Canadians absent from Canada for limited periods of time,
 - achieve equity as between provinces in the application of the Canada Assistance Plan in respect of the treatment of youthful offenders in other than welfare institutions, and in respect of the care given needy persons in nursing-homes in provinces that have introduced universal nursing-home care programs, and
 - further increases in war veterans allowances.

The third objective of the Government's policy to combat inflation is to take such specific initiatives in the economy as are required in order to deal with unjustified increases in incomes, prices and profits.

The Government will introduce legislation to deal with unjustified price increases where such increases are identified. This legislation will be designed to ensure that unacceptable profit levels are not being realized.

You will be asked to approve the imposition of an export charge on crude oil and certain other petroleum products to provide compensation for Canadians who consume imported oil and to regulate the price of Canadian hydrocarbons in interprovincial trade, so that all Canadians pay the same basic price, plus appropriate transportation charges, no matter where they may live.

There must be a greater awareness of the need for restraint by everyone in what each seeks to secure in incomes, profits, prices or taxes if inflation is to be mitigated. Demands to secure more than the economy can provide, or indeed for those who already have a respectable return to seek to benefit relatively from inflation, must be resisted, and the Government believes it has a clear responsibility in this area. Just as no one group in society should benefit at the expense of others from inflation, so should no one group shoulder an unfair burden.

The Government has therefore initiated a series of consultations with the principal groups in our society—business, professions, farmers, labour and provincial governments. They will be asked what proposals they can suggest and what contribution they are willing to make to defeat inflation. They will be asked how productivity can be increased. They will be asked if improvements can be made to the basically adversarial nature of the collective bargaining system, leading toward a joint search for solutions to mutual problems. Representatives of the private pension industry will be asked to explore jointly with Government ways of protecting pensioners against inflation. The Government will ensure that these consultations deal with the problems of those lacking organized power in the economy and retired people, for in many cases they are the ones most adversely affected by inflation.

The Federal Government believes that it has the responsibility of playing the leading role in bringing Canadians together to discuss their common problems and challenges and to develop proposals for their solution. The Government intends to fulfill this leadership role with vigour and determination. These meetings will form part of a major effort by the Federal Government to enter into a dialogue with all segments of the Canadian community.

In the inter-related society and economy of today, a clear distribution of responsibilities among the different levels of government in a federal state cannot in practical application have the neat precision that it has in political theory. Few actions can be taken by one level of government without affecting, or taking into account, the policies and programs of another. In many areas of government activity effective implementation of a government's policy depends upon the cooperation of other levels of government. Consequently the Government will:

- propose a number of conferences with the provinces during the coming year, including one at the First Ministers level early in 1975; and
- take new measures within the federal administrative structure to improve the coordination of federal policies and programs that are of interest to the provinces and to make consultation with them even more effective.

A key factor in increasing supply is transportation. More generally, transportation is vital to Canada providing for the flow of people and goods that link and bind our regions. It is at the heart of our ability to function as a domestic economy, and as a trading nation. Transportation must be an instrument of national purpose, designed to achieve broad social and economic objectives. While the scale of Canada is one of its greatest assets, equally, it poses challenges of distance and communication virtually unique in the world. These problems are particularly real for the provinces and regions away from central industrial Canada. The Government does not believe the principles underlying the present transportation system or its methods of management and operation are adequate to meet current and future national aspirations.

The Government believes transportation rates should continue to be based on the principle of competition among alternative modes of transportation in areas where there is effective competition. Where such competition does not meaningfully exist, transportation rates cannot be allowed to exact what the market will bear. Consideration of costs, as reflected in the provision of comparable services in circumstances where competition is effective, is a more acceptable guide, and it is toward the achievement of equitable arrangements on such a basis that the Government will work. Even as so qualified, the principle of effective competition may have to be subject to exceptions to permit the achievement of national policies relating to the reduction of regional economic disparities and the encouragement of a more balanced distribution of industry.

The Government is conducting a comprehensive examination of the ability of existing ground, air and marine transportation systems to meet present and growing future demands for passenger and goods services. Also under review are the roles of the various bodies which manage, operate and regulate the transportation system. The aim is to determine the role of government in both the public and private sectors of transportation, the most rational use of available capital resources, and the most appropriate means of balancing existing regulation and direct government intervention. While the cooperation of all parties will be sought, these problems are of a scale that they require Federal Government coordination. This work will lead to the implementation over the next several years, at a rate matched to the Government's overall financial ability, of a program of changes designed to produce a modern, safe, efficient and coordinated transportation system.

There are a number of new initiatives that the Government is prepared to undertake immediately designed to improve transportation services in Canada which will not in any way prejudice the review of basic policy to come:

- a program in cooperation with the railways which will lead to the eventual creation of new Government machinery to ensure the effective management of all ground transport;
- immediate implementation of experimental programmes designed to upgrade progressively a number of intercity passenger train services;
- ensuring an adequate supply of rail cars for the future and to resolve rail access problems to all major ports and distribution centres;
- improved transportation to and from remote areas, including further assistance to airports in small municipalities, and a new program to fund airports located in developing areas of the country;

- legislation to provide for the most efficient port system for Canada compatible with local, regional and national interests;
- steps leading to the creation of Canadian-owned ice-breaking cargo vessels for use in the North;
- establishment of an Independent Accident Investigation Board;
- new laws concerning shipping and the coasting trade in Canada;
- ensuring rail costing data will be made available to provincial governments pending consideration of a more comprehensive transportation information act;
- additional steps to strengthen the effectiveness of urban transportation systems and improvement of commuter services compatible with regional and provincial plans for urban development.

The Government believes further steps must be taken to enhance Canada's independence and sense of identity. To this end measures will be proposed to:

- revise the law governing corporations including the introduction of a provision whereby a majority of directors of federally incorporated companies must be Canadian;
- provide for Government intervention in cases where a Canadian company may be prevented from fulfilling export orders by its foreign ownership;
- enhance Canadian processing of the country's natural resources which are exported, involving consultations with the provinces and negotiations with other countries;
- ensure Canadian technological innovation is encouraged and available for the benefit of Canadian industry;
- ensure ownership of fishing vessel licenses is retained by Canadians;
- produce a new Citizenship Act;
- confirm O Canada! as our national anthem;
- restructure federally supported granting councils which provide money for university research in the humanities and social sciences as well as the natural sciences;
- establish an integrated regulatory body for telecommunications;
- establish a Joint Committee of the House and Senate to consider questions relating to the future of the National Capital Region;
- preserve the national heritage by providing incentives for the purchase by Canadian institutions of works of art which might otherwise be exported; and
- bring assistance to Canadian cultural enterprises by extending the provisions of the Foreign Investment Review Act; by promoting the sale of Canadian books and magazines; and by opening discussions with provincial governments about ways to increase the exposure of Canadian films in commercial theatres in Canada.

The health of Canadians will be a priority for the Government, with emphasis being placed on the prevention of illness, which includes raising the level of physical fitness of Canadians. A series of major athletic events including the Canada Winter Games in 1975, the Olympic Games in 1976, the Canada Summer Games in 1977 and the Commonwealth Games in 1978, should stimulate all Canadians, and particularly youth, to higher levels of participation and achievement in this area.

The federal-provincial Social Security Review is continuing on an urgent basis. Studies on alternative approaches to the reform of the income security system are expected to be sufficiently advanced to enable federal and provincial ministers to agree upon a preferred approach at an early date. Similarly it is anticipated that proposals for the reform of social services will have been agreed upon shortly.

Stemming the despoilation of our planet and returning our water, air, and land to a more natural state are urgent and challenging goals. Legislative measures toward these goals will include:

- greater protection from contaminating substances in the interests of human health and ecological stability; and
- curtailment of ocean dumping through international agreement.

The Government is also determined to continue its program of extending equality before the law to all Canadians. To this end wide-ranging legislation will be introduced to guarantee the equal status of women in areas within the Federal Government's jurisdiction. In this respect the Government is planning a substantial program of activities to mark International Women's Year in 1975.

Other measures related to equality before the law include:

- human rights legislation;
- substantial amendments to the Criminal Code;
- legislation to provide for royalty rates for oil and gas on Indian reserves comparable to those charged by oil-producing provinces;
- amendments so that the Supreme Court can deal more expeditiously with cases which come before it and to remove the right of appeal based solely on financial considerations.

There has been a rapid expansion in the numbers of people seeking to come to Canada as immigrants, as students, and as temporary workers. A Green Paper will be published shortly which will form the basis for public and federal-provincial discussion.

The volume of public business before Parliament increases with each passing year and this Session will not be an exception. The view is widely shared within and without Parliament that the rules and procedures of the House of Commons should be adapted to enable Members on all sides—supporting and opposing the Government—to discharge their growing responsibilities more effectively. The Government will seek, as a matter of urgency, support on a non-partisan basis for the necessary reforms of Parliamentary rules and for measures to be laid before you dealing with:

- redistribution of seats in the House of Commons;
- broadcasting the proceedings of the House; and —possible conflicts of interest of Members of the House of Commons and the Senate.

Amendments will be proposed to the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

You will be asked to consider other legislative proposals.

Members of the House of Commons,

The Government intends to present a budget early in this Session.

You will be asked to appropriate the funds required to carry on the services and expenditures authorized by Parliament.

Honourable Members of the Senate,

Members of the House of Commons,

May Divine Providence guide you in your deliberations.

The House of Commons withdrew.

His Excellency the Administrator of the Government of Canada was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

THE LATE HONOURABLE ROMUALD BOURQUE

TRIBUTES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, since we met last May we have lost an esteemed member of this chamber by the death of Senator Romuald Bourque, the senator for de la Vallière in the province of Quebec, who passed away on August 14.

Senator Bourque had a long career of service to his country, his province and his community. He was Mayor of Outremont from 1947 to 1963. In 1952 he was elected to the House of Commons and he was re-elected in four subsequent elections. In July 1963, as some members will recall, he was summoned to the Senate.

Senator Bourque was born and educated in Ottawa. In addition to his career of public service he had a long and distinguished career as a successful member of the business community in his home province of Quebec. Romuald Bourque was a friendly man who made a lasting impression in all parts of this house and in all parts of Parliament, and before he was stricken with ill health he was a very faithful attendant in this chamber. Although Senator Bourque has been absent from this chamber for some time, we shall miss him greatly and we are deeply grieved at his death.

I convey to his widow and the members of his family our deepest sympathy.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, in the unavoidable absence of Senator Flynn, it is my sad duty to associate myself with the regrets expressed by the Leader of the Government on the passing of our colleague, Senator Bourque.

On behalf of this group, I am also pleased to associate myself with the tribute paid to him. I remember him very well. He came to the Senate the year after I did and recently occupied an office in the same corner of the fourth floor as I do. From time to time he would drop into my office, and occasionally I would drop into his, and I was happy to be able to receive from him some of the wisdom that he had acquired over his many years of public service.

Senator Bourque typified the best in the dedication to public service which is a characteristic of an increasing number of Canadians in public service. As the Leader of the Government has mentioned, Senator Bourque was Mayor of Outremont for 14 years. He was elected to the House of Commons five times in succession. He had, if I may say so, the distinction of having been a Liberal member of Parliament from Quebec elected in that historic year 1958.

His associations with the business community were very extensive, extending from his activities as publisher in Sherbrooke to his activities in the printing business in the city of Montreal.

We shall miss him, because, as the Leader of the Government has said, he regularly attended here in the Senate and in committee. In the work of the Senate his counsel was always available to anyone who sought it, and I am glad to say that from time to time I was one who did.

On behalf of this group and, if I may presume, on behalf of all his colleagues, I extend our condolences to his widow, his son and family, and his many grandchildren, who will miss him perhaps even more than we shall, even though we shall miss him greatly.

[Translation]

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, as a personal friend of Senator Bourque, I join my voice to that of the Leader of the Government in the Senate as well as that of the Acting Leader of the Opposition, to mourn the loss of a friend whose high merit won him great achievements in every sphere of activity in which he delved during his fruitful career, as well in the field of business as in the service of his fellow citizens. He founded, managed and developed a business firm which was the envy of his competitors.

As for his public life, his services were called upon for many years; as the Leader of the Senate pointed out, he put his talents of administrator to use in the service of the city of Outremont both as councillor and as mayor.

Then, the electors of the federal riding of Outremont elected him member of Parliament. I had the privilege of being his colleague in the House of Commons—his riding and mine being neighbouring ridings—and he never refused to help younger candidates through his influence, prestige and eloquence. For this, I am personally grateful to him.

Finally, to crown a well-rounded career, the Prime Minister summoned him to the Senate, where Senator Bourque continued to give his fellow citizens the benefit of the wisdom of his advice.

In my turn, I express to the bereaved my most sincere condolences.

Hon. J.-E. LeFrançois: Honourable senators, I wish to associate myself with those who have spoken before me to mourn over the death of Senator Bourque, a colleague whom we all loved.

From the time of his appointment to the Senate in July 1963, the senator and myself were almost inseparable, since we travelled together, ate together, and spent our spare time together. I therefore mourn the loss of more than a colleague, for he was a sincere and devoted friend whom I shall always remember.

To his family, I express my sincere condolences.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask the Leader of the Government if there is any special significance in the fact that we now have five bills introduced in the first instance in the Senate? This is a rather unusual but perhaps welcome procedure.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I respond by saying to the honourable Leader of Her Majesty's Opposition in the Senate that, cognizant of the desire of all members on both sides of the house to make this body increasingly important and relevant in the Canadian parliamentary system, representations have gone forward from many parts of this house to have more legislation originate in this chamber. I welcome the expression of support for this procedure by the Leader of the Opposition.

TERMINATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY ON EIGHTH SITTING DAY

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Perrault, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i):

That the proceedings on the order of the day for resuming the debate on the motion for an Address in reply to His Excellency the Administrator's Speech from the Throne addressed to both Houses of Parliament be concluded on the eighth sitting day on which the order is debated.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the Leader of the Government if he could designate the eight sitting days.

Senator Perrault: May I respond by stating that we hope to be able to detail and delineate those days at tomorrow's sitting.

Motion agreed to.

THE HONOURABLE DAVID WALKER, P.C.

On the Question Period:

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have a question of a facetious nature. I wonder who the new face is across the way, sitting on Senator Choquette's left. I can only say that the beard is a great improvement.

Senator Walker: It certainly hides a great many sins, doesn't it? As a matter of fact, I have for some time been most anxious to emulate Senator Argue.

SENATE CHAMBER

SEATING ARRANGEMENTS FOR SENATORS ON CEREMONIAL OCCASIONS—QUESTION

Senator Rowe: Honourable senators, if it is not inappropriate to raise the question at this time, may I say that it struck me yesterday that some better arrangement should be made for the accommodation of senators in their chamber—our chamber—than has been the custom in the past. I am thinking specifically of the fact that at the opening ceremonies yesterday several senators, having arrived shortly before the ceremonies were to begin, were a little embarrassed because of the difficulty in finding places to sit. It seemed to me there were not enough seats to accommodate all the senators who attended here.

At no time should a senator find it difficult to get a seat in this chamber, and I wonder whether on ceremonial occasions, when our desks have to be removed and arrangements made to accommodate guests, the seats for senators could have their names on them. There should be some system installed to guarantee all senators a seat. They should not have to go through the embarrassment and trouble of wandering around, trying to squeeze in somewhere.

Senator Perrault: I want to assure the honourable senator that his recommendations will be given careful consideration, and that proper communications will be made with respect to the matter he has raised.

AMPLIFICATION AND SIMULTANEOUS INTERPRETATION SYSTEM—QUESTION

Senator Choquette: Honourable senators, now that suggestions are being made to improve conditions in the Senate chamber, I have a suggestion to make which I think is timely. It is that an amplification system should be installed in our galleries. I made this suggestion some five years ago, and I was given assurance that the matter would be looked into promptly and that something would be done about it.

The Opening of Parliament in the Senate chamber is an historic occasion. Many of us have seen it perhaps sixteen or seventeen times, but it is a memorable event for visitors. Yesterday I had some guests who were sitting in the gallery and they could not hear one word of the Speech from the Throne. They could not hear one word said by Madam Speaker.

I submit that something should be done as soon as possible to remedy this situation. The galleries should not only have loudspeakers installed but should be equipped with a simultaneous translation system similar to the one at the United Nations where people can plug in and listen to what is being said in whatever language they want. We have two official languages here, and visitors in our galleries, as well as senators on the floor, should be able to plug in to an amplification and translation system and listen in the language of their choice.

This equipment should have been installed in our galleries a long time ago, and I am suggesting to the new leader that something be done about it immediately.

Senator Croll: I am amused when the honourable senator says "Plug in." I have been plugging in for fifteen minutes and have heard nothing.

Senator Perrault: I want to assure Senator Choquette that his recommendation, along with the previous one raised by Senator Rowe, will be properly considered. All of us appreciate the unfortunate distractions which were apparent yesterday. The senator has made a good suggestion, and hopefully something can be done to correct the situation.

Senator Grosart: It seemed to me the problem yesterday was that there were far more senators than usual in this area on the left of the Speaker. I had hoped some of them might remain, but I can assure them there are some vacancies here.

Senator Langlois: What did you do to attract them?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I would like to make a remark that I am sure will find a ready response in the bosom of all senators, and that is that the work of the staff of the Senate since yesterday afternoon in restoring this chamber to its present condition has been remarkable. As a rule we take these things for granted, but this was a very special kind of effort that was made, and we are indeed indebted to them.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

MOTION FOR ADDRESS IN REPLY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of His Excellency the Administrator's Speech at the opening of the session.

Hon. Joan Neiman moved, seconded by Hon. Ernest G. Côtteau:

That the following Address be presented to His Excellency the Administrator of the Government of Canada:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Bora Laskin, Chief Justice of Canada and Administrator of the Government of Canada. May it please Your Excellency:

We, Her Majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the Senate of Canada, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious Speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

[Translation]

She said: Honourable senators, let me on your behalf assure His Excellency Jules Léger that we deeply regretted his absence yesterday, on the occasion of the opening of the First Session of the Thirtieth Parliament of Canada.

But assuredly he was most brilliantly represented by his deputy, the Right Honourable Bora Laskin.

We wish to extend His Excellency our best wishes for a prompt recovery, and we look forward to seeing him soon back with us.

[English]

Senator Muriel Fergusson was appointed our Speaker shortly after I was summoned to the Senate, and I well recall, while our elevations were similar if somewhat unequal, we both felt a certain amount of trepidation in the contemplation of our new duties.

As you all know, Senator Fergusson dealt with her new duties magnificently. I do not think I could ever have maintained the pace nor could I have achieved the goals that she set for herself in fulfilling the obligations of her office. I should very much like to congratulate her on her tact and humour in dealing with the difficult decisions and situations that so often arose. I also thank her most sincerely for the contributions she has made to us during her period as Speaker, and for the contributions that I know she will continue to make.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Neiman: I am, of course, delighted to welcome our new Madam Speaker and I am, naturally, somewhat proud that the Prime Minister has seen fit to appoint another member of our sex to this important position. She will add her own special brand of Gallic humour to the competence displayed by her predecessor in office.

[Translation]

The Honourable the Speaker certainly has a better knowledge of my mother tongue than I of hers. I will therefore strive, and this is my challenge, to learn and speak this language of hers which is new to me.

I wish to take this opportunity to wish her, on behalf of all the honourable senators, many, many years as Speaker of this house.

We cordially assure her of our affection and support.

[English]

I should like also, honourable senators, to express my personal tribute to the Honourable Paul Martin, who has served our country so brilliantly, devotedly and effectively in many areas of public life.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Neiman: His most recent field of service was as government leader in the Senate.

From my earliest recollections of Senator Martin I know that he has always been a political force to be reckoned with and respected. All party considerations aside, anyone who has ever known Senator Martin, or even known of him, can only have the deepest admiration for the manner in which, by his tremendous talent and energy, he consistently served not only Canada, but, indeed, many other countries of the world.

● (1430)

Senator Martin long ago earned a respite from his continuous labour in public service, but I rather suspect that he does not yet want it. In whatever way he chooses to continue it, he should know that, no matter how tenuous or infrequent the association of some of us has been with him, we are all happy to accept a modest amount of credit for his accomplishments.

I extend a warm welcome to our new government leader, the Honourable Raymond Perrault.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Neiman: Our young Lochinvar has come out of the West, undoubtedly bringing many fresh ideas which he will impart to us before we can settle back into our old bad habits—if we had any, of course. I shall be interested in the new directions he suggests, because I believe that in order to remain vital the Senate must be prepared to experiment and to change to meet the constantly changing demands of the society it serves. I expect Senator Perrault will find many new challenges. I wish him great success in the important position he has assumed.

I am glad to know that our deputy leader and the Leader of the Opposition are carrying on in their duties. I see that we have a new Deputy Leader of the Opposition and I am sure that he will be as effective as Senator Choquette was before him.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Neiman: I am glad to see that Senator Choquette is still occupying a front bench, because I enjoy his pixie smile with the rapier wit that he generally directs across to the other side.

Finally, since I am sure their Maritime colleagues, who know them much better than I, will have a great deal to tell us about them shortly, I only wish at this point to welcome our new members, the Honourable Irvine Barrow and the Honourable Ernest Cottreau. We are happy to have them with us.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Neiman: Being a comparative novice in this chamber and also conscious of the honour which is bestowed on me in asking me to move the motion for the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, you can well imagine that I had to start thinking about what I was going to say some time in advance. Of course, it was easy to guess that a good part of the Speech from the Throne would be reasonably similar in thrust to the previous one, of just nine months ago, since the government then really did not have the opportunity to implement many proposals the Speech contained. As we heard yesterday, intervening events, and particularly the steadily darkening economic picture, have altered some of the priorities the government has set for itself. Throne Speeches tend to be filled with rather lofty expressions of a government's concern for the economic good and social well-being of its citizens, as well as rather cloudy proposals as to how the desired improvements are going to be achieved. In the end we know, however, that it is what a government does during its tenure, not what it says it will or will not do, that counts.

I am concerned a little about what I think are some significant omissions, or, at least, lack of specifics, in the Speech from the Throne. I am hopeful, however, in the long period of time which this government has been granted to prove its good intentions, it will demonstrate that its concerns go far beyond those briefly outlined in the Speech from the Throne.

There is no doubt that the state of the economy, ours or that of some other country, is a popular topic of conversation these days. I hope we do not talk ourselves into a severe recession because, with absolutely no expertise on the subject, I simply do not think that need happen. However, the shortages of essential commodities and a volatile money market have created grave international tensions, and I am concerned as to how the affected countries will attempt to moderate their present difficulties.

The oil shortage last year, no matter how artificially created it may have been, shocked industrialized nations into an unhappy awareness of their dependency on the few oil-producing countries of the world. Millions of dollars have been pouring daily into the coffers of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries. The World Bank predicts that by 1985 the staggering sum of $1.2

trillion will have passed into the hands of that organization. Money is power, and those nations who now hold the balance of power cannot be expected to relinquish it easily.

I am reminded of a passage in Viscount Morley's Life of Richard Cobden:

Great economic and social forces flow with a tidal sweep over communities that are only half-conscious of that which is befalling them. Wise statesmen are those who foresee what time is thus bringing, and endeavour to shape institutions and to mould men's thoughts and purpose in accordance with the change that is silently surrounding them.

The implications of that statement are shockingly pertinent in the light of certain events in the international scene of which we have recently been made aware. We have had some revelations of the interference with, and the abrogation of, the basic rights of people within nations and between nations.

A principle is set out in the Atlantic Charter:

—to further the enjoyment by all States, great or small, victor or vanquished, of access, on equal terms, to the trade and to the raw materials of the world which are needed for their economic prosperity.

We are now indeed a planetary society, and President Gerald Ford reminded the United Nations of that fact when he urged its members to adopt a global strategy for food and energy, but the iron fist was there beneath the velvet glove. The implied threat contained in some of his later remarks should give us all cause to ponder and to worry. When their lifelines are being squeezed or cut off or, indeed, where people have very few lifelines even to cling to, nations often feel justified in adopting tactics which infringe on the rights of other nations, sometimes even to the point of armed intervention.

In those bilateral and multilateral discussions which the government has already commenced with other countries, I hope Canada will play a leading role in stressing the importance of recognizing the differing needs and aspirations of each of them, and the essentiality of resolving any basic conflicts of interest by open and honest negotiation. I would add that no matter what Canada does, I believe it must also play a leading role in providing food and essential materials particularly to a number of those countries which are part of what we call the Third World.

No matter what other measures we take to restrict our own expenditures, that has to be part of our global strategy and part of our duty to other nations.

On July 8 the Canadian people gave the Prime Minister and his government an overwhelming mandate and a clear message, "We want a strong government, able and prepared to deal decisively with the most pressing problem in our country today—inflation." I think they got the message, but its implementation will not be easy.

The Speech from the Throne described in some detail the inflationary squeeze in which not only Canada but virtually all developed countries are caught, and which, combined with critical shortages of essential materials and food, has had a damaging effect on the economy of the country.

I was pleased to note that the government, realizing that the problems engendered are national and international in character, has undertaken to work closely with all other levels of government, and to exercise leadership in encouraging the closest cooperation amongst them to seek and work at solutions. I would hope that this policy would always be followed.

Most people will be encouraged by the declared intention of the government not deliberately to generate slack in the economy in order to combat inflation. Instead, it has set out an extensive list of methods it proposes to use. We can only wish it Godspeed and good luck.

One undertaking I particularly like is that the government will exercise restraint in its own expenditures, and will concentrate instead on improving the effectiveness and efficiency of its operations.

The objectives of the government are as concise as they are commendable. Apart from its "appropriate fiscal and monetary policies," which I gather we shall not be able to assess fully until that "early budget" is brought down, the government proposes:

- to increase the supply of goods and services;
- to protect those least able to protect themselves; as well as
- to soften the impact of soaring oil prices on Canadian consumers and to cushion the economy against disruptive increases in other commodities.

I might say here that I do not personally believe that inflation is having quite as devastating an effect on Canadians as some of the howls of anguish would indicate. Although many are hurt, few are mortally wounded. I have yet to hear of anyone who has put his car on blocks because he cannot afford the gasoline to run it. But one important segment of our nation has been badly hurt. I refer to those on fixed incomes or with no income at all other than welfare payments. They need our immediate attention.

The government has re-affirmed its intention to protect those least able to protect themselves. In line with that continuing policy, which I know we all support, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has announced that there will be another increase in the Old Age Security pension and the Guaranteed Income Supplement in October. However, other sections of the needy have been overlooked. I recall reading in a Toronto newspaper last week a letter from a blind pensioner stating that the government had apparently forgotten that his needs were just as great as those who receive the Old Age Pension. Apparently this sector of our society has not been remembered by the government. The government provides various pensions because it recognizes its obligations to particular classes of citizens. Those in need must be treated equally. Most importantly, all governments must try to find some method of ensuring that when a much needed increase in financial assistance is given with one hand, it is not immediately taken away with the other.

The government has listed in considerable detail the measures it proposes to take to combat inflation. I do not propose to review them all. None of them are startlingly new, but all of them, if implemented efficiently and effectively, will undoubtedly have an ameliorating effect on our troubled economy. Again, it is the performance and not the promises that we shall be watching. I would have to be convinced, as also would the hungry people of this country, that the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency could not somehow have done a better job.

Many honourable senators will agree with the blunt remark of the Minister of Transport a few months ago that our transportation system is in a mess. We shall welcome any and all improvements the government intends to make—and the sooner the better.

In this age of people against planes, ratepayers' groups against expanding airports, and our growing awareness of the ecological damage they cause, we need and we want alternatives. Had we commenced thinking about this situation much earlier and had done something about it, it is just possible that we would not now be faced with all the problems concerned with the building of a second airport near the city of Toronto.

Many Canadian women will be somewhat less than ecstatic at the government's intention—I quote from the Throne Speech—to introduce "wide-ranging legislation . . . to guarantee the equal status of women." How often have we heard those words before? The report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women was tabled four and a half years ago, and out of 167 recommendations within the jurisdiction of the federal government, only about one third of them have been implemented. It is hardly a great track record.

However, we have recently had public commitments from some of our ministers to introduce in the near future amendments to laws which are of great concern to us women. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has stated that he will shortly introduce an amendment to the Canada Pension Act to ensure equal treatment of men and women with regard to pensions under the act. Great!

The Minister of Justice recently stated that he is considering amendments to the Criminal Code which will considerably ease the problems of women testifying in the courts in connection with charges of rape. That is a very painful process to which women are subjected both before and after the event, and the Minister of Justice has rightly recognized that some changes are necessary. Such changes will be of help not only to women but also to those charged with the enforcement and administration of justice.

I might remind the minister, at the same time, that Recommendation No. 152 of the Report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women is that any requirement that women must establish they were of previously chaste character be deleted from all sections of the Criminal Code. Certainly, in the case of rape, the question of whether a woman was of previously chaste character has absolutely no relevance to the offence. That section should have been changed a long time ago, and its deletion is long overdue.

In January 1970 the Law Reform Commission of Canada published a working paper on family law. Shortly afterwards, the Ontario Law Reform Commission published its volumes of studies and proposals, many of which contained remarkably similar proposals to those contained in the federal draft. The federal paper has not gone beyond being considered a working paper, nor have I heard any evidence in the Ontario Legislature that any action has been taken on the recommendations contained in the Ontario report. There are a number that affect matrimonial and property rights of women, and these are of utmost importance to all of us.

I do not think it was until the infamous Murdoch case of about a year ago that many women really realized that the status of being legally married brought with it certain very definite economic disadvantages. I am not here to suggest that we dispense with the venerable institution of marriage, or that we place our warm relations with our spouses on a monetary basis. What I am saying is that the government and the legislators of this country should be taking some action to improve the status of women with respect to their marriage contracts.

We are fortunate in having a most distinguished Chief Justice of Canada. He is a person who has played, and undoubtedly will continue to play, a very influential role in reforming some of our hoary and horrendous concepts regarding women in the twentieth century.

The government has given no indication that it intends to clarify the law with respect to therapeutic abortions. I do not want to get into the merits of this most difficult question. Regardless of one's personal convictions, the relevant sections of the Criminal Code are so imprecise that they have led to a variety of interpretations in their application. This has created a number of grave injustices and has resulted in unequal treatment to women in similar circumstances, and thus to an uncertainty as to what their legal rights are in this matter. It is objectionable, not only to women who oppose the widening of this particular law but to those who would reject it entirely. The present Minister of Justice has stated his personal position on this matter. I do not happen to agree with it in its entirety, but I do agree that he is entitled to hold it. However, he does have an obligation, as does his government, to clarify the law—and I hope it has the courage to do so—in order that we may know how the law is to be administered.

May I just add here that I am extremely pleased at the quantity and quality of the women elected to the Thirtieth Parliament—and I do not exclude those in the Opposition Party. I am convinced that they are as bright and capable, and will make as great a contribution, as any of their male colleagues. I think they would want me to say that they were not elected merely as women, for women, but rather as members of Parliament to serve all their constituents. I am happy they are there and I think their mere presence, the mere fact that we have that many more, will mean that perhaps in some of these areas of law affecting women the government will be less likely to waffle, if I may use that word in this chamber, than it has in the past.

The Speech from the Throne noted that the volume of public business before Parliament increases each year, and that the government proposes to seek reforms of the rules and procedures of the House of Commons to enable its members to discharge their growing responsibilities more effectively. Well and good. However, I should like to remind the Prime Minister that this Senate, too, is part of Parliament, and that the members of this chamber are prepared to accept and discharge all responsibilities which would contribute to good government and to better service to the Canadian people. I think we have made a marvelous beginning in that respect today with the number of bills that have already been introduced in this chamber.

Let the appropriate committee of the other place begin to discuss its own reforms, and we should have a similar one at the same time. But there must then be a joint committee of both houses—unless, of course, the Prime Minister is considering abolishing this chamber—to consider how we can best work together. We must remember that we are indivisible, and that our strength lies in that fact.

I have one final comment to make. A very distressing event took place on the steps of Parliament yesterday—one no less than tragic for the native people of Canada—while we were taking part in the traditional pomp and splendour of the Opening of the Thirtieth Parliament of Canada. This, if they would believe us, is their Parliament as well as ours. I have flipped through the pages of previous Speeches from the Throne, and nowhere have I found any acknowledgment of our primary moral obligation to right the wrongs we have committed against our brothers and sisters. To be fair, the federal government has moved much more quickly in the past 10 years to slow the slide of our native people into destitution and degradation. But all of the patchwork panaceas are too little, and they may be too late.

I do not for a minute condone violence or armed threat. In my mind I know that that route is as useless as it is wrong, but in my heart I understand what desperation can make those people do. They are tired of platitudes and pious promises. I do not underestimate the difficult problems and decisions that our new minister has inherited, which are not made easier by the fact that the native people are as diverse as the rest of us and do not necessarily have the same needs or goals, but we must assume responsibility and leadership with other responsible governments to redress some of the wrongs which have been done and meet the legitimate demands of that large segment of our population.

The most urgent duty of this government is the settlement of the land claims of the native people, and that is the most complex issue of all. I gather the government proposes to delay action until it receives the report of Mr. Justice Berger of British Columbia on the Mackenzie River delta complex. The other day I had a letter from a member of his commission that is studying the question of family law out there. She mentioned that this problem of native land claims arose time and time again because the native people out there simply do not know what their future will be or how they will exist as family units unless they have some direction from the government. I would urge this government to move quickly and decisively in starting work on the land claims, and not wait for recommendations from one group or another, or even from their own departments. They can start to coordinate. They know it will cost money, and this is probably what makes them delay so long. I ask that they start now. It has crossed my mind that, faced with this very complex constitutional situation, with the problems that are involved, perhaps some of the distinguished members of this Senate could be of immense help in settling some of the constitutional issues.

I should like to light a candle here today. To paraphrase the concluding invocation in the Speech from the Throne: May we all be guided by wisdom, inspired by the opportunities we have been accorded as members of the Senate of Canada, and given the strength to meet the challenges we face.

[Translation]

Hon. Ernest G. Côtteau: Honourable senators, it is with great apprehension and deep respect towards the authority vested in this august house that I rise to second the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. When I was invited to take part in this debate, I first expressed my great surprise, then my doubts as to my ability to do justice to such a great honour, for I have no parliamentary experience nor any knowledge of Senate procedure. A certain lack of self-confidence is surely justified in my mind as I now undertake to give my first speech.

[English]

Honourable senators, on May 8 last I accepted the honour of becoming a senator with the determination to serve my country to the best of my ability with what few qualifications I possess. I had no pretensions then, nor have I any now, and for me to function at all I must remain myself. As a consequence of this my speech may in no way compare with that of Senator Neiman, who has so ably moved the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

With your leave, honourable senators, I shall confine most of my remarks to the part of Canada that is known to me. If I can judge by the spirit of friendship and good camaraderie that seems to exist among honourable senators, I would venture the thought that should I fall into grievous error in my brief discourse I shall receive your indulgence and understanding.

If I may, Madam Speaker, I should like to add my voice to that of the mover of this motion, and convey to you my congratulations on your appointment to the high office of Speaker. From your past record I have every confidence that you will enjoy success and good health throughout this Thirtieth Parliament.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Côtteau: I should also like to offer my sincere and hearty congratulations to Senator Perrault on his appointment as Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Sir, may you enjoy many years of good health and continued success in your new office.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Côtteau: Senator Neiman has already paid deserving and justified tributes to those other senators who have either assumed new responsibilities or given way to others while continuing to serve their country. In every respect I want to associate myself with Senator Neiman's remarks in reference to Senator Martin, Senator Fergusson, Senator Grosart and Senator Choquette.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Senator Neiman.]

Senator Côtteau: Honourable senators, as I am practically a complete stranger to you, and as I was not ushered into this chamber on the strength of my brilliant success and glorious achievement in public life, I feel I should tell you a little bit about myself, my home area with its approximate location, part of its history and what I consider to be its importance in the Canadian context.

I was born in Nova Scotia, more specifically in the southwest part of Nova Scotia which, in political geographical terms, is called the federal riding of South Western Nova. This is an area which comprises the four imposing counties of Annapolis, in part, Digby, Yarmouth and Shelburne, in part. It is in this part of Nova Scotia that I have lived for the most part of my life.

Before I continue with my remarks about my native Nova Scotia, I want to bring into the focus of my speech a certain aspect of its population which has led to my presence here.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I understand and accept the principle whereby it is my duty, as well as my pleasure, to put my services at the disposal of all my fellow citizens, regardless of ethnic origin, colour or religion. Having lived for 60 years in a society that encompassed those various elements, I have always strived to respect the rights of others, and believe that I have at all times contributed to maintaining peace and good will in that society. I shall endeavour to continue to do so in the Senate.

You well know, honourable senators, that my presence here with you I owe mostly to the fact that I am a Nova Scotian of Acadian origin. Senator Ambroise Comeau of Metaghán River, of the riding of Digby in Nova Scotia, was appointed to the Senate in 1907, as a result of long consultations between the Acadian citizens of Nova Scotia, the Hon. W. S. Fielding, then minister from Nova Scotia in the federal cabinet and other members of consequence in the cabinet such as, for instance, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. It was agreed at the time that it would only be fair for an Acadian from Nova Scotia to be appointed to the Canadian Senate. The practice has since survived, for which the Acadians are most grateful. They see in the Senate the defender of minority rights in Canada. I should therefore be remiss in my duty if I did not speak of my fellow citizens the Acadians of Nova Scotia.

According to the last census, the population of Nova Scotia now numbers 788,960 most of whom are of English origin. Acadians account for about 80,000 more than half of whom give English as their first language. All this is to say that practically speaking Nova Scotia is an English province. Acadians realize that, and they have no thought or ambition of wanting to make that province a French province. Consequently, we have no social unrest coming from the French minority. Nevertheless, ever since their early days they vindicated their rights to their culture and faith in full freedom. That is why they survived in spite of circumstances of sometimes severe hardships, and they are now recognized as deserving citizens.

Acadians were slow and old-fashioned in making progress due to isolation because they settled in Acadian towns along the seashore in the four corners of the province. They were also often the victims of diffidence due to lack of education which sometimes held them back behind the rest of society. But that is part of the past. Acadians no longer live in the past.

It should be recognized that Acadians developed in the past twenty years. Thanks to financial assistance the federal government, through the Department of the Secretary of State, made it possible for Nova Scotia since 1970 to promote bilingual education in our high schools and our only French college—Collège Sainte-Anne—which undertook the necessary steps to accelerate the improvement of the French language in Acadian communities. The French language is indeed the strongest characteristic of Acadians. So it is essential that it be safeguarded.

Along that line I quote from the Graham Report of the Royal Commission on Education, Public Services and Provincial-Municipal Relations in Nova Scotia as follows:

We heard arguments both sound and eloquent in favour of stronger and more efficient efforts to make available to Acadian students the possibility of acquiring the capacity to communicate and think in French. Progress in that direction was considered essential to the preservation of the French language and the Acadian culture in Nova Scotia.

We are convinced of the soundness of those arguments. It is fair and reasonable that Acadians expect from their schools that they contribute seriously to maintaining and furthering that language and that culture that they preserved for close to four centuries, and in spite of extreme difficulties. It is obvious that Nova Scotia would suffer an incalculable loss if the heritage of the Acadian culture were to disappear.

I conclude my remarks on the subject of Acadians by saying that I do not agree with those who predict the disappearance of the Acadian culture. The Acadian people, due to their tenacity and courage, have adapted to modern life conditions and have earned the right to be placed on an equal footing with all the other peoples who form the Canadian mosaic.

[English]

Honourable senators, I am grateful to the mover for her analysis of the Speech from the Throne. In my view, she has brought out what I consider to be the most salient points, and in no way would I want to supplement her remarks. However, I do feel that of all the points mentioned some are of particular interest to me.

For instance, I am pleased to note in the Speech from the Throne the concern shown by the government for Canadians in all walks of life, particularly with respect to the problem of inflation. The matter of inflation is of prime importance to us in the Maritimes where our level of earning is below that of other provinces, and where the escalation of prices is creating hardships to many. Although I do not believe it possible for the government to legislate an end to inflation, I do believe that its concern and its active participation and, perhaps more important, its leadership in fighting it will come as a great help to the country as a whole.

I was particularly impressed by the mention of fisheries and transportation, because they do relate closely with the problems which afflict Nova Scotia—in particular, the southwestern part of Nova Scotia.

The fishing industry takes first priority with me, because in the counties of Shelburne, Yarmouth and Digby it is the main resource. These counties accounted for 43.5 per cent of the total landed value of fish in the entire province of Nova Scotia in 1972. In that year, according to the statistics in the ninth annual report of the Nova Scotia Department of Fisheries, the values of fish landed in those counties were:

Shelburne	$10,905,000.00
Yarmouth	$10,794,000.00
Digby	$ 7,544,000.00

Total	$29,243,000.00
-------	-----------------

The total value of fish landed in the province for that year was $67,091,000.

While the landed value appears to be on the increase over the previous years, we in southwestern Nova Scotia are greatly concerned that there is a dwindling trend in the landed weight of fish. To illustrate this, I quote a paragraph from the same report:

The history of Nova Scotia fisheries in the last three to five years has been one of rising prices in export markets (chiefly in the United States), strong demand abroad and at home, and a need to increase, in one way or another year by year, the effort to maintain catch levels. Although the figures show that Nova Scotia's annual catches of fish never before totalled as much as have been caught annually since 1965, the annual totals since 1968 show a declining trend and for some species the decline has been severe.

I trust that this will illustrate to you, honourable senators, the reason for my concern. Any threat to the fishing industry in Nova Scotia is a threat to the basic economy of my area, and therefore it is with great appreciation that I witness in the Throne Speech some considerable evidence of government concern for the protection and the control of our fisheries.

Much is needed in the way of control in the area of our offshore fishing. The fortunes of our fishermen are being threatened by the massive fishing effort of foreign fleets operating off our coast, sometimes, according to reports by local fishermen, within our territorial waters. Headlines in the provincial press, as recent as September 17 and 18 last, report extensive damage done to a local fisherman's equipment by what are presumed to be foreign trawlers. A similar incident, but with greater damage, occurred in July last.

Needless to say, this situation poses a problem which has very serious connotations. I am pleased to tell you that this matter has been brought to the attention of the federal officials who are conducting an investigation and who, hopefully, will be able to bring forward a solution.

While the Conference on the Law of the Sea, held recently in Caracas, did not produce all the immediate relief and solutions to the ills facing the fishing industry that many of us had hoped for, I still hold the optimistic view that it laid the groundwork for the establishment of an international law which will give Canada exclusive fisheries jurisdiction out to 200 miles off our shores. Only then will we be in a position to exercise proper and adequate control of this most vital industry.

Honourable senators, these are some of the problems which confront us in South Western Nova. We also lack wharfing and harbour facilities. In late years the number of fishermen has grown, and in many instances the facilities have remained the same and are naturally deteriorating rapidly. It is my hope that the federal government, through the Department of the Environment, will see fit to make an in-depth study of this situation and resolve it without further delay.

A step in this direction has already been taken with the appointment of the Honourable Roméo LeBlanc, the minister responsible for fisheries operation in the Department of the Environment. The appointment of Mr. LeBlanc to this very important position gives a new dimension to the proper development of the fishing industry on all our coasts, and I have every confidence that he will provide a new direction and give a more meaningful purpose to one of the real "bread and butter" industries of Nova Scotia. It will be my pleasure to do my utmost to enhance the fortunes of fishermen.

I would not want to leave you, honourable senators, with the impression that every citizen in South Western Nova is a fisherman. We have a modest agricultural industry, although not as affluent an industry as in the Annapolis Valley or the counties of Cumberland and Colchester where the soil is of better fertility than ours. We also have forestry, but again not in major proportions. A large sector of our working force is taken up by the trades, small businesses and, of course, the professions.

The second point I wish to emphasize is that of transportation, already brought out by Senator Neiman. The Speech from the Throne states that the first objective of the government in dealing with inflation will be to increase the supply of goods and services. Among the many measures mentioned as ways of achieving this aim is the improvement of our systems of transportation. I quote from the Speech from the Throne:

A key factor in increasing supply is transportation. More generally, transportation is vital to Canada providing for the flow of people and goods that link and bind our regions. It is at the heart of our ability to function as a domestic economy, and as a trading nation. Transportation must be an instrument of national purpose, designed to achieve broad social and economic objectives. While the scale of Canada is one of its greatest assets, equally, it poses challenges of distance and communication virtually unique in the world. These problems are particularly real for the provinces and regions away from central industrial Canada.

Honourable senators, my area is a region away from industrial Canada, and transportation plays a vital role in our economy. Improvements are needed in our ground, air and marine transportation systems. The towns of Digby and Yarmouth are terminals for ferry services. Digby has a ferry link to Saint John, New Brunswick, and Yarmouth has ferries to Bar Harbour and Portland, Maine. Our proximity to the United States facilitates the flow of visitors into our area and enhances our tourist trade, and also causes a tremendous input into our economy. One of the ferries operating out of Yarmouth is the M. V. Bluenose, a government-owned ship which is now showing signs of age and obsolescence. It would be my hope that the government will seriously consider plans to replace this ship in order to assure the continuance of this most vital service. There is a great need for improvement in the facilities of air and ground transportation, and I shall work toward these improvements as time goes on.

In an age when the entire world is constantly being challenged by numerous and most complex problems, I feel that Canada has been able to cope with its share of problems with a great measure of success. This has been made possible by the close co-operation of government, labour, the private sector and all Canadians. The Speech from the Throne promises to continue the efforts to keep the country healthy and strong. For this reason it is my pleasure and honour to second the motion for the adoption of an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne as moved by Senator Neiman.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the Question Period:

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, yesterday a question was directed to this side by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition with respect to the days on which the motion arising from the Speech from the Throne will be considered. It is the intention to deal with this motion on consecutive sitting days, unless emergency legislation intervenes.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, could I direct a question to the Leader of the Government? He has said that we will consider the motion on consecutive sitting days. May I ask if that means Tuesday to Thursday, because under our rules these are not what would be regarded as consecutive sitting days? Secondly, can the leader inform the Senate what he has in mind with regard to possible emergency legislation, which I think was the phrase he used?

Senator Perrault: It has been the practice of the Senate to meet Tuesday to Thursday inclusive. That would be the interpretation which would be placed on "consecutive sitting days." We will be in a position to announce the business of this house tomorrow afternoon, at which time we will be pleased to provide appropriate information for the consideration of all honourable senators.

It was noted in the Speech from the Throne on Monday that a very difficult situation has arisen with respect to the movement of grain from west coast ports, and the government has in mind the possibility of some extraordinary legislative action, should it be necessary, to expedite the shipment of grain from the west coast.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Administrator's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Senator Neiman, seconded by Senator Côtteau, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I resume the debate at this time in the unavoidable absence of Senator Flynn, who will be with us again shortly to make it clear, in his own very special and effective way, that the official Opposition in the Senate will, in spite of some recent disappointments, continue to discharge its duties to the Senate and to Parliament and the public of Canada. I know that honourable senators supporting the government, some of whom confront us across the aisle and others who increasingly surround us in this last bastion of democracy in this place, are as equally concerned as we are that we perform our function here in keeping with the high traditions of this chamber. We will try not to disappoint them. We congratulate our friends on their good fortune on July 8, and assure them that we will do what we can, in collaboration with our colleagues elsewhere, to bring that good fortune to an end as soon as is reasonably possible.

Senator Langlois: Wishful thinking!

Senator Grosart: We begin a new session of a new Parliament with some new faces in new places. I refer particularly, of course, to Her Honour the Speaker, or, as I prefer it, le Président of the Senate, or perhaps it should be la Présidente of the Senate; I am not sure which. We need, I think, to decide on a proper form of address, and I hope that in due course we will do so. I confess that when Senator Fergusson was our Speaker I had great difficulty in bringing myself to address her as "Madam Speaker." Although she ruled us at times with a properly firm hand, such was her personality and charm when she occupied the Chair that a mere "Madam" seemed inappropriate to me as a form of address. Besides, perhaps from my younger days, there were some connotations of that word that I tended to shy away from.

Senator Walker: Speak for yourself.

Senator Grosart: Now, of course, we have a new problem. Will it be "Mademoiselle Speaker" or "Ms. Speaker"? I do not know, but I rather hope not. Admittedly Her Honour has the vivacity, the décor, the chic and the intelligence that English-speaking Canadians at least associate with a Mademoiselle from Montreal. But again I have the feeling that "Mademoiselle Speaker" would be inappropriate, and I find even more problems, of course, with "Ms. Speaker".

Senator Walker: What about "beautiful Speaker"?

Senator Grosart: "La belle Speaker"—an excellent suggestion from Senator Walker, who speaks much better French than I do. It may not be generally known that she is now the holder of a very distinguished diploma in music, and I would hope we might find a more euphonious address than "Ms. Speaker," because, speaking for myself only, I cannot picture her on the barricades of the Women's Lib movement shouting defiance at the very harmless male chauvinists whom she will have to govern here.

Your Honour, our compliments to you on your well-deserved, most popular and very rapid promotion from the back benches to the presidency of our Senate. You have our assurance of the fullest co-operation from this quarter and our very best wishes for the success that we are quite sure you will achieve.

I am told you accepted the high honour with some reluctance, having in mind the very great distinction which had been brought to the office by the previous Speaker, Senator Fergusson, and we can all sympathize with you in that. I am sure I can safely say, even in the presence of former distinguished Speakers of this place and the other place, that Senator Fergusson has made a unique and lasting contribution to the prestige and distinction of the office of Speaker of the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Grosart: An even more rapid promotion from the back benches has come, again deservedly, to Senator Perrault, the new Leader of the Government. We are all aware of his wide experience in the legislature of British Columbia and in the House of Commons. We are glad to know, however, that he is still a young man. I can assure him that those of us who are, or are getting to be, oldtimers here are delighted with his appointment; first, because we have already had an indication that he is going to be an innovator, perhaps even a reformer of some of our procedures and practices here; and, second, because his appointment seems to indicate, to me at least, some confidence on the part of the Prime Minister and those who advise him in these matters that he is looking to this Senate for a renewal of its vitality in response to the challenges of change that are around us. I can assure Senator Perrault that his colleagues here, old and new, young and old, will respond to that kind of leadership.

Senator Perrault assumes his duties at a most appropriate time in the history of the Senate. I think we would all agree that the stage has been well set by some of his predecessors in that office, if I may mention only two who are still with us, Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) and Senator Martin, who in their years here as Leader of the Government, set the stage for a new and important role for the Senate—a role which I am sure we are about to assume.

We have been told that Senator Martin is to be called for further distinguished public service. The Prime Minister has said so. It is hard to see how he can add very much to the laurels he has already achieved in this Parliament, in Canada and certainly in countries around the world, as those of us know who have had the opportunity to visit other countries where we are continually asked, "How is the great Senator Martin?" We in the Senate know that he has served us well in five crucial years of our history—more crucial, perhaps, than some of us realized who were not fully aware of the challenges he had to meet from certain quarters in respect to the Senate, its leadership and its continuation as an essential part of the Parliament of Canada.

Senator Martin, we are proud of our association with you and of your association with us, and we hope to share some of the pride in your ongoing accomplishments in whatever great role you are called upon to fulfil in the years ahead.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Grosart: We in this group extend a most warm welcome to the two new senators from Nova Scotia, Senator Côtteau and Senator Barrow.

Senator Côtteau, a distinguished representative of the glorious Acadian tradition in Canadian history—a current as well as historical glory to our country—has, as seconder of the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, already given notice of the high standard we may expect from him in contributions to the debates of this house. I notice that he has a very distinguished record as a teacher of science, and I have no doubt that Senator Lamontagne will be after his talents very shortly to serve on the Special Committee on Science Policy. Senator Barrow will also bring vast experience—useful experience—to our deliberations, from his background on the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, the Bank of Canada, the Industrial Development Bank, Dalhousie University, regional development activities and many other public service roles.

It is my very pleasant duty now to congratulate Senator Neiman, the mover of the motion for an Address in reply. I found her speech most unusual, most refreshing and most useful. I am sure she has already received congratulations from both sides of the house, which she most certainly deserves, on this exhilarating speech introducing the motion. I thought it unusual because Senator Neiman apparently found it quite unnecessary, and probably unrealistic, to indulge in the usual paeans of praise for the measures indicated in the government's long list of generally vague proposals to deal with the economic and social problems confronting the country.

I found her speech refreshing because of the candour with which Senator Neiman dealt with what she called—and I think I am quoting her correctly—"significant omissions from the Speech," on matters such as blind and disabled pensions, the egg marketing fiasco and the slow implementation of the report on the status of women. She said in regard to the latter that only one-third of 167 recommendations had been implemented over all these years. I also found refreshing her reference to what she called—and again I think I am quoting her correctly—"the patchwork of panaceas" in regard to the rights of our native people, and so on.

Of course, I found her speech most useful, because it makes my own task this afternoon so much easier. Honourable senators, I found myself reading and re-reading the Speech from the Throne to see if I could not possibly find something good to say about it, just to balance the apparent lack of enthusiasm of both the mover and the seconder for the material that had been put by others into His Excellency's Address. Unfortunately I find myself in general agreement with Senator Neiman's statement that there was nothing startlingly new in it, and, again, that it will be performance not just promises that Canadians will be looking for from this government this year, and the next, and the year after, if by accident they are still in office.

I congratulate Senator Neiman on what is certainly the most objective and realistic speech that I have yet heard on such an occasion.

I accept her warning, and it was a sound warning, that we must not talk ourselves into a recession; but I cannot escape the conclusion that the Speech from the Throne indicates that the government seems to believe it can talk us and itself out of the recession, which is obviously a fallacy.

The situation today is serious. It demands tough, courageous and prolonged action—far more than the measures indicated in the government's proposals in the Speech from the Throne. On the other hand, I find in the Speech indications of some measures which may have the very opposite effect to the government's intentions. They may have the effect, it seems to me, and according to some very well-informed observers, of actually aggravating the situation.

It is fair to say that the government has at long last officially recognized that inflation is our most serious problem, in spite of a long series of attempts to minimize the problem—a minimization which has caught up with us, as it has with other countries, and some of the blame for which we must lay at the door of the government, which at one time, when inflation started to roll, told us that they had the problem "licked." The Speech from the Throne stressed that the government now finds it "necessary to deal with its causes and mitigate its effects," but I think it is obvious, on even a casual reading of the Speech, that the proposed measures and legislation deal far more with mitigating the effect than with dealing with the root causes. Of course it is fair to say that no government anywhere in the world has come up with the answers, except, perhaps, the Russian and Chinese dictatorships.

● (1420)

On the other hand, honourable senators, I was very much disappointed that the government failed to spell out the real seriousness of the situation. It seemed to run away from its duty to tell the people how vast the dimensions of this problem are. There is no doubt in my mind that Canadians generally are willing to face hard facts; they have done it before in critical times in our history. But we cannot expect them to face up to facts unless the government tells them what the problems are and what must be done to alleviate them. I find no indication whatsoever in the Speech from the Throne of the spelling out of the full dimensions of this very serious problem. To indicate just how grave the problem is, the Conference Board of Canada only last week published some very telling figures. The Conference Board is headed by Dr. Arthur Smith, former head of the Economic Council, and both organizations are amongst the handful of realistic assessors of the nation's economic and social state of health and are very widely respected as authoritative sources of information. For example, we are told:

The Government does not intend deliberately to generate slack in the economy in order to combat inflation.

Whether that is a wise policy or not, and there is some doubt about it, it is certainly about as gratuitous a statement as could be heard from any government, in view of the conference's estimate that real gross national product will increase next year by only 1.2 per cent compared to 4.1 per cent for this year and 6.8 per cent for last year, while unemployment will increase from 5.5 per cent this year to 7 per cent in 1975.

Yet, honourable senators, we have a government which tells us that they are not going to deflate the economy entirely. To some extent, at least, they have done an excellent job of deflating it already.

We are further told in the Speech from the Throne that:

The policy of the Government on inflation has been to pursue appropriate fiscal and monetary policies—

I am sure we are not expected to believe that the fiscal and monetary policies to date have been appropriate to the circumstances. If they have been, why is the problem so much worse now than when they started to apply these policies? The evidence is abundant that in many instances the fiscal and monetary policies of the government have been singularly inappropriate. Again, honourable senators, it is fair to say that this situation applies to every government in the world with the possible exceptions of those I have mentioned earlier. Experts, in and out of government, in the western world at least, have been consistently off the mark, and there I am referring to experts in business, labour, universities and elsewhere.

But if there is one necessary measure to contain inflation—and here there is almost universal agreement—it is the drastic curtailment of government spending at all levels. We are told in the Speech from the Throne that the government “will exercise restraint in its own expenditures,” and “will urge that provincial and municipal governments take similar steps.” Now, this sounds very promising at first glance, but on second glance it is very clear that there is no promise whatsoever about reduced government expenditures this year. The words are “will exercise restraint.” I presume that means that, like a man who is overweight, they will exercise some restraint in their appetite, but it takes more than restraint to reduce weight. I cannot find any economist who believes that there is the slightest hope that government expenditures at the federal level and at other levels, provincial and municipal, in 1975 will be lower than they are this year or were in any comparable year in our history.

Northcote Parkinson, the author of the famous Parkinson's Law, a highly respected economist, said recently:

Inflation is caused mainly by government spending. No one else can influence it. The cause of inflation is simply too much money and this is caused solely by too much government spending.

Now, that may be an exaggeration, but certainly it is an exaggeration of a basic truth.

There is a claim of appropriateness in the inflation context for the monetary policy of the government. Again, the claim is doubtful. Far more confidence would be engendered, in my view, if the mistakes of the past had been admitted—and, perhaps, defended, because mistakes in particular contexts and time-binds can be justified for the time being. As long as the government insists, however, as it appears to do in the Speech from the Throne, that its monetary and fiscal policies have been appropriate, then there is not much hope that we will have a change to perhaps appropriate policies that will begin to solve the problem of inflation.

Mr. Arnold Hart, the Chief Executive Officer of the Bank of Montreal, who should and does know a great deal about money, has this to say about the effects of some of these policies:

—inflation, interest rates and money supply have been going up together—

One obvious result is that:

—more and more investment has been financed by the printing presses and less by the normal and non-inflationary process which involves saving.

It must be pretty alarming to honourable senators, as it was to me, to hear that the result of some of our monetary policies has been to get the printing presses rolling to create money, because it certainly has somewhat ominous echoes of a great world calamity that happened not so long ago that I cannot remember it.

Mr. Hart goes on to say:

The chances of government spending restraint now seem remote. The monetary authorities will have to do most of the steering with one hand tied behind their backs.

So much for the appropriateness of the monetary policies we have had to date. That is certainly not a description of the effects of an appropriate monetary policy.

Now, I am not criticizing the government for not having the answers to all our problems, but it alarms me that the whole tenor of the Speech from the Throne seems to suggest that the government has the answers. We have this long list of measures to be taken, 68 of them according to my count, when the most elementary political arithmetic will indicate that there is not the slightest hope of those 68, or even half of the 68, being implemented by legislation or other measures within 12 months.

There is mention of a new housing policy, which is unquestionably necessary, but why so late in the game? Housing starts are actually down this year, when demand is at its highest, from 238,000 last year to 234,000 this year, and the industry estimate is for only 172,000 starts next year. That is how much confidence the housing industry seems to have in the proposed measures.

The government speaks of industrial unrest. “Unrest” is hardly the word for it, when I find in the very next sentence:

Agreements reached through collective bargaining are being abrogated.

“Abrogated”—that is putting it mildly. In the last few months, at least four collective bargaining agreements have been violated by illegal strikes and physical violence on the picket line, and there is more to come, according to warnings we are being given by union leaders.

I am by no means anti-labour—far from it—but I cannot subscribe to any theory that if you do not like the law or if your solemn contract proves irksome you are entitled to break the law or tear up the contract.

The Prime Minister was very firm in an interview yesterday dealing with the native people who were on the Hill the other day. “They had better remember,” he said, “that my government will never negotiate under the threat of violence.” That was not in the Speech from the Throne. Perhaps it should have been, and with much wider relevance than to our poor protesting Indians.

Of course, there are the usual swipes at the business and industrial community. No doubt some of them are deserved, but I find great inconsistencies in the announced policy approaches to the essential role of business investment in the productivity of the economy.

As a matter of fact, honourable senators, the one bright spot in the whole prospect for the year ahead is the likely high level of business investment in our productivity. This is, of course, a function of the comparatively high earnings of companies in the last two or three years, but that is where the money comes from, the money that we must have to build up the capital formation which, in the words of the C.D. Howe Institute—when I mention that distinguished name, I am sure honourable senators opposite will agree with my estimate of its validity—“now reduces the costs, including environmental costs, of attaining a desired standard of living in the future.” I see some evidence in the Speech from the Throne that the government seems to have forgotten this essential fact. I emphasize those words, that capital formation reduces the cost of creating a high standard of living.

It goes on to say that:

Canada's potential as a nation will be determined largely by its capacity to invest in capital formation and to allocate this capital wisely among a host of pressing demands.

Business investment is not, of course, the only input to capital formation. There is the private sector—that is, private savings—there is foreign investment, and, of course, government investment, which is a good thing in itself, so long as it is not merely an exercise in robbing Peter to pay Paul to such an extent that the private sector of the economy is unable to develop the necessary funding to create jobs and to improve the standard of living.

The fact of the matter is—this knowledge is not generally realized—that we have been running a fantastic backlog of investment capital formation for at least the last decade. The level of investment from savings is at about the level of 22 per cent of GNP. All the evidence is that it must rise to at least 24 per cent. It seems like a small percentage, but it represents a lot of money if we are to maintain our present productivity. But the prospects are not as bright as I am sure we would all like them to be.

We know that this lack of capital in the past has caused the shortages with which the government is so rightly concerned in the Speech from the Throne. Our hope of building up our capital formation quickly to reach these desirable ends is not very great.

Again, the Conference Board estimates that real per capita income will increase only 1.5 per cent next year compared with even the unsatisfactory level of 5 per cent this year and 6 per cent the year before, while corporate profits are estimated to decline next year to 4.4 per cent from 31 per cent this year and 35.7 per cent last year.

I see in today's newspaper that the Prime Minister says he is going to induce corporations to restrain or contain their profits. At the same time, the consumer price index is expected to increase to 12 per cent from 11.1 per cent this year and 7.6 per cent the year before. Where are the savings to come from to keep our economy rolling?

I hope Senator Neiman will not accuse me of doing the very thing I said I would not do, which is to suggest that I might be talking us into a recession; but it does seem to me that the government now has a mandate and a majority to face the facts, and to face them with confidence and in a climate of public understanding from which alone will come public cooperation in the fight against inflation.

Personally I am glad that the government has a majority in the House of Commons. Naturally I should like to have had the composition of that majority other than it is, but I do believe that it is in the best interests of Canada to have a government in office which has the muscle to govern wisely, and we hope well, and to accept the heavy responsibilities that go hand in hand with a mandate such as the government now has.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I may seem critical, but I know that honourable senators will understand that it is my proper duty, on an occasion such as this, to point out the inadequacies as I see them in the measures proposed for our collective Canadian future.

I recognize it is not the custom of the government to spell out in detail in the Speech from the Throne the precise contents of legislative and other measures that it intends to initiate in the days immediately ahead.

There are inevitable generalities, even platitudes—even what Senator Neiman so well called “waffle,” after which she added, “If I may use that word.” Senator Neiman, you may certainly use that word, and I am sure you will have occasion to use it often about the Speech from the Throne and the measures that will come before us to implement it.

I have to admit—it would be unfair not to do so—there are many good things in the Speech from the Throne. I welcome the reintroduction of the Registered Home Owners Savings Plan, the elimination of the earnings test on Old Age Pensions between ages 65 and 70, increases in war veterans allowances, and particularly the firm assurance in the Speech that there will now be consultation on the part of the government with the provinces and the people of Canada.

It has not been a distinctive feature of the policy of the present administration to consult the provinces regularly in the spirit of cooperation, or to consult the people in that same spirit; but we can now hope there will be a change of heart and we shall not have the kind of legislation proposed in the last budget speech to increase the federal take from resources, a measure which is patently unworkable. I am glad to congratulate the government on the announcement by the Prime Minister, that it will “backtrack”—that was the word used—from the position it took at that time. It is good to know that the government is prepared to admit mistakes and correct them.

There is also a promise of measures to improve technological innovation in Canada. Some of us who have had an opportunity of examining that particular situation over the years will have some reservations about it, because the first announcement of the major change in the government's attitude to the funding of research development in industry was made at least six or seven years ago. Three years later the government's funding in industry had dropped by a point, and then we had another announcement that it was going to be “contracting out” government research and development to industry, which simply has not happened to any appreciable extent. We now have the promise that it will start again, and perhaps it will. I have my doubts.

Then, of course, there is the large section on transportation. We are to have a new transportation policy. I do not know whether this is Mark III, IV or V for the government. The admission by the responsible minister some time ago that the transportation policy in Canada is a "mess" was an honest admission, but one of no great credit to a government which had appointed a former distinguished cabinet minister to take over the responsibilities of the new commission, and appointed another distinguished cabinet minister to oversee it. That has just not worked. Perhaps we should call it Mark LXXIV—and hope that it will work better than the others.

We on this side, of course, as good parliamentarians, understand that there are political as well as social and economic constraints to government action. The recent election has, thankfully, removed one such constraint that existed for a while on the left of the government in the other place. The headline in my Ottawa paper of last night read, "Trudeau emphatic: Gov't. won't lurch to left." One might even hope that he might roam a little to the right.

In the months ahead we shall be receiving the legislation and other measures indicated in the Speech from the Throne. We in this group will welcome and support such when it appears to give practical realization to the evidence of good intent, which is the major theme of the Speech from the Throne. We do not doubt that good intent. We will be watchful, however, that it leads not in the traditional direction of most good intentions, but in the opposite direction for the benefit of all Canadians, of whatever estate and wherever they live.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, may I, first of all, offer my warmest congratulations to the newly chosen Speaker of the Senate. Madam Speaker has established an enviable, indeed a great, record in the field of journalism and public service in this country, and she has consistently demonstrated qualities of courage, good judgment and balance which will serve us superbly well in this place. We welcome her appointment.

At the same time, I echo the sentiments expressed by those who have preceded me in this debate when I say that we were served superbly well by the retiring Speaker, Senator Fergusson. Senator Fergusson worked with a rare degree of diligence and dedication and, in the process, in the view of all of us, enhanced immeasurably the reputation and image of the Senate, and made us even prouder to be members of this place.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: She has certainly set an example for all those who follow in her stead. Together with Senator Fergusson's countless number of friends and colleagues in this chamber, I wish her well.

As I assume my new duties as Leader of the Government in the Senate, I assure you that I do so deeply conscious of the great stature of those who have occupied this position in the past years. All of us are honoured to have with us here two of the former Leaders of the Government in the Senate. Between 1964 and 1968, Senator John Connolly, provided outstanding leadership on this side of the house.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: His contributions to this nation, which continue, have been unfailingly distinguished, ranging from law and education to his effective efforts to represent our nation abroad, and they stand as a great example to all of us.

[Senator Grosart.]

My immediate predecessor, Senator Paul Martin—and I have had the privilege, as have many of you, to have known him for a great many years—has established one of the finest records of public service in the history of Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: As honourable senators are aware, Senator Martin was elected to the other place in 1935, serving there until April of 1968 when he was appointed Leader of the Government in the Senate. It would be impossible for me to chronicle his great contributions to this nation, not only as Minister of National Health and Welfare but as Secretary of State for External Affairs and in his several other posts, including that of Leader of the Government in the Senate.

I am deeply conscious of the qualities, the contributions and the abilities of those who have preceded me, and I am conscious, as well, of the superb contributions which have been provided in this place by Her Majesty's loyal Opposition and leaders of that group. As a neophyte, I can only hope to aspire to emulate the high standards which have been established down through the years on both sides of this chamber. In the process of attempting to be useful and effective in this post, I hope I can call upon the collective wisdom and abilities which I have found here in great abundance.

Many years ago when I was first elected to the legislature—and many of you have been elected to various governmental bodies—I learned, as my first lesson, that no one party in Canada, no one group of men and women, possesses a monopoly on virtue, good ideas, constructive concepts, nor does it monopolize the desire to do constructive things for the people of this country.

I know we all enjoyed listening to the mover of the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Senator Neiman, in her address yesterday, further enhanced her reputation as a very clear and cogent thinker, one who can express herself clearly and eloquently on all the issues facing the people of Canada today. She gave further evidence of her value as a member of this chamber.

A maiden speech, whatever the assembly, is always a traumatic experience, one which all of us have gone through. For that reason Senator Côtteau deserves special commendation for a thoughtful and able dissertation in his seconding of the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. All of us listened to him with real interest, particularly to his delineation of some of the problems which afflict the province of Nova Scotia and, particularly, the southwestern part of Nova Scotia.

The activities of this chamber will be greatly enhanced by his presence and by the presence of his colleague, Senator Barrow, also from the great province of Nova Scotia. Both honourable senators have made a distinguished contribution in their home province, and we are delighted to have them with us.

I do not think any of us really expected that the Deputy Leader of the Opposition would shower the government with compliments and good wishes on the Speech from the Throne. I have heard many Throne Speech debates, and I have yet to hear anything but expressions of dismay from the other side of the chamber when a Throne Speech has come under discussion. That is a feature of our parliamentary democracy, and a good feature. It that saves governments from becoming too complacent and from making the mistake of assuming that all is right and they have no challenge whatsoever.

Certainly the Speech from the Throne reflects some of the lessons drawn from the recent federal election. The Canadian people made known in a most emphatic way that they want majority government; they want government, at this particular traumatic time in the history of the world, which will act decisively, and will act with a sense of direction on a broad range of fronts. The Canadian people saw through much of the rhetoric of that election. The Canadian people know that there are no simplistic solutions to the problems affecting Canada or any part of the world, no instant magic; that if we are to make this a better country, if we are to overcome the problems that face all of us, it will take leadership on the part of the government, and leadership on the part of trade unions, business, agriculture and all the rest of us; that true progress is not an unearned increment.

I think the Speech from the Throne reflects very much the government's view that there must be a united national effort, drawing on the best of all Canadians to overcome our problems; that we cannot afford at this time selfishness in any one section of our economy. The people of Canada want their representatives to meet effectively the serious problems we face, and that the world faces. There is concern about world inflation, and no one can be complacent about a problem which, if left unheeded, could ultimately manifest itself in social anarchy. All parties were told in the recent election that the people of this nation recognize the problem and the acute danger of inflation. The Speech from the Throne indicates a positive and realistic response by government. The solutions it suggests do not constitute, of course, a total answer, because, as Senator Grosart correctly pointed out, a Speech from the Throne endeavours only to give the general direction of government policy and does not detail completely the full extent of a government's efforts to combat inflation or to implement any other program.

Because world shortages fire the flames of inflation, major efforts will be made to increase the supply of goods and services. A view accepted by the Canadian people during the election was that at a time when world shortages of money, oil and everything else are causing prices to skyrocket, merely the imposition of short term controls would achieve nothing in the final analysis.

The Speech from the Throne tells us that those least able to protect themselves are going to be given more assistance; they need help. As honourable senators are aware, one of the most perverse aspects of inflation is that the strong, the fleet, the able and the adept are often able to protect their economic position, and indeed may enhance their economic position, during a time of inflation, while the weak and the unprotected—those who have no bargaining representatives; no business or labour representatives, or any other kinds of representatives—those on fixed incomes, and, even more demoralizing, those thousands of good tax-paying citizens who have attempted to provide for themselves through prudence and sacrifice down through their lives, when a dollar was worth a dollar, are the most tragic victims of an inflation left unfettered and unhampered. So Canadians will welcome the proposals contained in the message of Monday that measures will be advanced to assist the unprotected and the weak, to soften the impact of soaring oil prices on Canadian consumers, and to cushion the economy against disruptive increases in the price of other commodities.

Despite the rhetoric of the recent campaign, the overwhelming majority of Canadians are aware that inflation and its evil effects are far from being a domestic problem alone. It is a domestic problem in part, but in essence it is not a domestic problem. Indeed, our people are aware that in comparison with the rest of the world Canadians can count themselves among the fortunates of the world. But none of us, regardless of party affiliation, is satisfied with merely maintaining the status quo and telling the rest of the world, "We are doing better than you are," because this may not be saying very much. All of us want to do better, and we, as parliamentarians of all persuasions, are determined, along with this government, that we will not rest content to compare smugly our inflation fight with that of other countries—not while there are those in our midst who day by day see their security eroded.

In his speech Senator Grosart made reference to the need to reduce government spending. The determination of the government to exercise restraint has been spelled out very carefully in this Speech from the Throne, because it states:

For its part, the Government will exercise restraint in its own expenditures with particular emphasis on improving effectiveness and efficiency in its existing operations while controlling expansion of new activities which, although desirable, would contribute to inflationary pressures. The Federal Government will urge that provincial and municipal governments take similar steps.

Of course there has to be a restraint on government expenditures. I assure honourable senators that there is a firm intention on the part of the government to do this. However, honourable senators should also bear in mind that combined municipal and provincial expenditures greatly exceed expenditures at the federal level, and Senator Grosart's remarks should well be directed to provincial administrations of Conservative persuasion, Liberal persuasion and NDP persuasion. We can make effective this general proposal in the Speech from the Throne only if they cooperate with the efforts of the federal government to exercise restraint.

When we look at the total expenditures of the federal government in the 1975-76 fiscal year we are told that they:

—are expected to incorporate the costs of certain major new measures, including payments to equalize prices of petroleum products in Canada.

In that very same paragraph we read:

Federal expenditures on goods and services, as opposed to various transfer payments, have remained relatively constant as a proportion of Gross National Product for some years, and their proportion was lower in 1973 than it was in 1961.

In 1961 there was a government in this country under other political direction. A similar trend in provincial and municipal expenditures did not occur during the comparable period of time, 1961 to 1973.

So I return to the suggestion I made earlier, that if we are to overcome our problems in Canada it must be by a combined effort on the part of governments at all levels, of labour, of management, of cooperatives, of those in agriculture and so on. There are no simplistic solutions. Perhaps the members of the Opposition would, in the course of this debate, constructively suggest to the government those areas where major cut-backs can and should be made in order to reduce federal expenditures. Perhaps they will be helpful in that way.

Would they reduce payments to the senior citizens in our society? Or to the war veterans? Should there be a cut-back on provincial assistance under the Canada Assistance Act? Should we reduce benefits under the Canada Pension Plan? Should there be a cut-back in regional economic expansion programs? I think the government must be told in very clear terms by the official Opposition where the reductions in expenditure are to be made. This must be done in order to render valid the kind of criticism which we often hear from the other side of the house.

We are told that "labour disruption" is another critical problem, and I think that all members of this Senate are troubled by the degree of misunderstanding and difference which exists between labour and management in this country. But I would remind our friends in the Opposition that most labour-management relations in Canada are under provincial jurisdiction, and that the numbers of days lost in labour-management disputes are substantially greater in the provincial sector than in the federal sector. I would also remind them that this government has undertaken a series of important measures in the past five years to improve the relationships between labour and management. Indeed, ways are being examined to facilitate still further the settlement of labour-management disputes in the federal sector. I suggest to the members of the Opposition that the federal record has been a good one in the entire field of labour-management relations.

Honourable senators, there is a reference in the Speech from the Throne to procedural improvement in Parliament. In the words of the Administrator's message:

The view is widely shared within and without Parliament that the rules and procedures of the House of Commons should be adapted to enable Members on all sides—supporting and opposing the Government—to discharge their growing responsibilities more effectively.

I suggest—and I know this view is shared widely in this chamber—that we should be no less dedicated to the idea of improving the procedures in this place in order to assure that the Senate will continue to be an even more vital and relevant part of Parliament.

I have served in a provincial legislature and I have served in the other place. Let me say that, in my view, the members of the Senate yield to no other body in Canada in the matter of ability, talent and their concern for the needs of the Canadian people. I think others who have served in other assemblies will agree with that judgment. Surely, our task must be to assure that the talents and abilities which exist in all parts of this house—the collective capacities and the collective wisdom which are to be found on both sides of the aisle—are employed as effectively as possible. This may well require a review of our procedures and our rules, and an assessment of our responsibilities; and in my view it includes an examination of the difficulties facing the Opposition in the Senate at the present time. I do not believe that any assembly under the parliamentary system can be effective unless there is a vigorous Opposition, and they must be assisted in their efforts to challenge the actions of the government and the measures which are brought before this house.

The other day the Throne Speech made reference to "conflict of interest." I know there is not a member of this house who would ask to be exempted from any conflict of interest standards which apply to another sector of Parliament and the Public Service. Disquieting and unhappy events in recent months involving elected officials and conflicts of interest, primarily in other countries—certainly, in the nation to the south of us—have increased public demand, and I think with justification, for elected members at all levels to give clear evidence that they consider their responsibilities to be of paramount importance in order that their public trust not be prejudiced or violated in any way. Like Caesar's wife, all elected members must be beyond suspicion and must appear to be beyond suspicion.

Honourable senators have expressed to me their satisfaction that several government measures were given first reading in this house yesterday afternoon. This is but the beginning of a policy which will see a substantial number of government bills originate in this place in addition to those which are inspired by members of the Senate themselves. In past years the Senate has demonstrated an unflinching capacity to give careful, thoughtful and constructive attention to legislation—which, of course, is its first responsibility—and I have no doubt at all that we in this place will continue to contribute positively in that way. But, honourable senators, I know that you agree with me when I say that much more can be done in this place. It should be noted with satisfaction by all members of the Senate that the reports and inquiries initiated by the Senate have invariably been of great value and worth to Canada and have received widespread praise from the people.

Many reports have been prepared, the most recent being the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, chaired by Senator Goldenberg, on Parole. That report is of tremendous credit to the Senate.

Without attempting to list them all, I might just mention the following reports: the report by the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media, chaired by Senator Davey; the report on Canada-Caribbean Relations by the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, chaired by Senator Aird; the report on Information Canada by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, chaired by Senator Everett; the report on Tax Reform by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, chaired by Senator Hayden; the report of the Special Joint Committee on Divorce, co-chaired by the late Senator Roebuck; and the report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy, chaired by Senator Lamontagne.

Senator Benidickson: And the report on Poverty in Canada!

Senator Perrault: Yes, of course; the report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Poverty in Canada, chaired by Senator Croll.

You see, honourable senators, there is always a danger in naming names and listing reports. One usually omits one of special importance, and I apologize to Senator Croll.

These reports give clear evidence that the Senate, in addition to its legislative activities, can make an enormous contribution through study and inquiry. When the Speech from the Throne talks about parliamentary reform, perhaps we should do some basic thinking about why the Senate came into existence in the first place and what kind of things we can do best. The Senate was formed to reinforce provincial and regional representation in Parliament. Indeed, without assurances to the provinces that they would be given strong regional representation in this chamber, Confederation would not have been brought about.

I express the hope that during the next few months it may be possible for the Senate to initiate a series of regional studies, the findings and recommendations of which can be made available to the Canadian people as an inspiration to legislative action. I am not unaware of the challenge of implementing this proposal—the problems of costs, logistics, staffing, and so on—but I cannot conceive of a more useful or valuable function of the Senate than to have certain honourable members, with the enormous talents which they possess, as a committee or a sub-committee, visit the areas of Canada, and find out what Canada is all about in the years 1974, 1975 and 1976. Let us go back to the regions of Canada which sent us here in the first place, to visit small towns as well as large cities, to hear views, to enter into dialogue, to examine problems, to accept briefs and, finally, to report to the people with recommendations.

I want to tell you, honourable senators, that I think we should all be encouraged by the Speech from the Throne when it says:

The Federal Government believes that it has the responsibility of playing the leading role in bringing Canadians together to discuss their common problems and challenges and to develop proposals for their solution. The Government intends to fulfill this leadership role with vigour and determination. These meetings will form part of a major effort by the Federal Government to enter into a dialogue with all segments of the Canadian community.

I hope that members of the Senate of Canada can engage, in a very major way, in that dialogue with the Canadian people referred to in the Speech from the Throne.

It has been said that Canada is a political paradox, a paradox that defied the rules and norms of nationhood, but yet we came into being. Flight engineers and scientists have said, "You know, the bumble bee defies every standard of aerodynamics; he is not supposed to be able to fly, but he manages to do so." In 1867 Canada overcame all the rules and norms of economics and of political science and became a nation, and we have been flying pretty well for over one hundred years.

Of course, inevitably there are certain stresses and strains within Confederation—we feel them out West—but, you know, there is one great benefit that comes from being a member of Parliament, and that is the opportunity and rare privilege to visit all parts of our great country. I was born and raised in the province of British Columbia, but the greatest experiences of my life have been in seeing other provinces and territories like Newfoundland and the Maritimes, and la belle province de Québec.

Je suis né en Colombie-Britannique, la grande province bilingue de l'ouest, l'anglais et le chinois.

I shall attempt to improve my French as time goes by.

I realize that Ontario, which some presume to be the heartland of affluence in Canada, has its share of problems, too. It has its areas of deprivation. You talk to people in northern Ontario, you talk to the urban poor in Toronto, and you know that no part of Canada is without its difficulties.

And then there are the Prairie provinces. My grandfather homesteaded on the Prairies. Perhaps it is time to re-examine Sir John A. Macdonald's old concept of the Prairies as being the granary of Canada; with all the manufactured goods put together in eastern Canada, and the West being the suppliers. Perhaps we should take a new look at that policy.

Then there are the difficulties to be found in British Columbia, which is closer physically to the Soviet Union than it is to our nation's capital. That is a literal fact.

Therefore, we have to engage in some dialogue, and I hope to discuss with all of you how we can best talk with the Canadian people, and listen to them, in 1974, and find out what they think we should do about their problems. If we in this place can improve and enhance communications between Canada's regions and the central government, it seems to me that the Senate of Canada will have made yet another notable contribution to this country.

We need a greater understanding of the North. Perhaps we should start there. Senator Laing is one of the most eloquent proponents of this kind of action, and down through the years he has been a source of great political inspiration to me as a fellow British Columbian. We certainly need a greater understanding of the North, of its problems and its people, ranging from environmental problems to the problems of the cultural shock facing many of its indigenous peoples. We need a study ranging from transportation to the future political institutions of the North.

We need to have an understanding of the Maritimes, and their desire since 1867 to become full economic partners in Confederation. I have attended hearings and meetings in the Maritimes, and I think I understand better now some of their aspirations.

We need an understanding of Quebec, whose people share equally with every other part of Canada a desire for economic and cultural opportunity and advancement.

We need an understanding of Ontario, which, despite its statistical affluence, as I said, has its areas of deprivation and need.

We also need an understanding of the West. If I may return to the West again, I was born a westerner whose family had its cultural and ethnic roots in Conservative Ontario and Liberal Quebec—a product of Canada's two founding cultures. Although, as a westerner, I believe there are legitimate problems and grievances which should be considered by government, I reject absolutely the irresponsible and divisive chatter about western alienation and western separatism. The fact is that this government has made a major effort to understand the problems of the West—a contribution as great, in my view, as that of any government in history. I would, therefore, like to see a committee of this house visit the West to meet with its people, and discuss with them their problems as they perceive them.

Suggestions have come forward from honourable senators about other committee work they would like to see done. I know that honourable senators want this to become one of the most productive and, yes, perhaps one of the most innovative periods in the history of the Canadian Senate.

In conclusion, may I say that I look forward to working with all of you, whether you serve on the government side or in some other section of this house.

On motion of Senator Desruisseaux, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the Notice of Motion for Adjournment:

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, October 8, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before the question is put, I should like to make the customary short statement as to what is in store for us next week. Next week we will continue with the Throne Speech debate and will likely commence the debate on second reading of at least three of the five bills now on the Order Paper, and, quite possibly, on all five of them. We will probably proceed first with Bill S-2, an act to amend the Supreme Court Act and to make related amendments to the Federal Court Act, Bill S-3, an act to provide for a continuing revision and consolidation of the statutes and regulations of Canada, and Bill S-6, an act to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act. We will not necessarily take them in that order, however.

We will then take Bill S-4, an act to amend the Customs Act, and, possibly after that, Bill S-5, an act to enable Canada to comply with a Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft.

As I have already informed the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, I wish to make the commitment that before we go into the debate of any of these measures I shall first make an announcement to the house to inform the house as to what bill is going to be debated the following day.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I thank the Deputy Leader of the Government for his statement and explanation. By the way, perhaps I should ask the Leader of the Government if I am correct in referring to the Honourable Senator Langlois as the Deputy Leader. I do not believe that such an announcement has been made. As a matter of fact, in the last session we waited a long time for clarification of the position.

Senator Choquette: There used to be three under the former administration.

Senator Grosart: As I say, we waited a long time for the clarification of the duties of the distinguished senator on the other side who from time to time informed us of the business in the house.

Senator Perrault: I can confirm that he is the Deputy Leader.

Senator Grosart: I am glad to hear that the Leader of the Government has confirmed that Senator Langlois is the Deputy Leader and I congratulate him.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Grosart: On the statement Senator Langlois just made, can I take it that there will be consultation with the Leader of the Opposition before a decision is taken in any particular sitting to introduce a bill?

Senator Langlois: Definitely, yes.

Senator Grosart: Thank you. I believe I know the reason for this, and I can say in general that I see no objection from this side. However, I would have to reserve the right of the Leader of the Opposition, when he returns, if he sees some objection to this procedure. I say that personally I see no objection, but I am not the Leader of the Opposition.

Motion agreed to.

SENATE REFORM

NEWSPAPER ARTICLE—QUESTION

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I direct a question to the Leader of the Government, of which I have given him notice, but I should say very short notice—only a few minutes before the second bell. The question arises out of a report which I find in the Globe and Mail of today's date, which reads as follows—

Senator Greene: Not a very reliable source.

Senator Grosart: I did not hear the interruption.

Senator Greene: I was doubting your sources.

Senator Grosart: Well, it is the Globe and Mail of October 3, 1974. I quote:

Mr. Trudeau also proposed to limit the tenure of appointments to the Senate and suggested terms of seven years. Appointments would be renewed if the senator had served his country well, the Prime Minister suggested.

I leave out one paragraph, which is merely information. The next paragraph reads:

The Prime Minister also proposed that the Senate should have a right only to delay legislation passed by the Commons rather than to veto it. This 'suspensive veto' already exists in the British Parliament, Mr. Trudeau said.

These reforms of the Senate were put forward because they do not involve the provinces and so do not require their consent, Mr. Trudeau said. A more radical reform of the Senate awaits agreement on constitutional changes.

My questions to the Leader of the Government are as follows:

1. Has he been consulted on this announcement? I must say, of course, that I do not for one minute deny the right of the government to introduce such motions in the other place.

2. Does he agree in general with these so-called reforms of the Senate?

3. Does he agree particularly with the statement that these changes do not involve the provinces, and so do not require their consent? It seems to me to be a most extraordinary statement, and, if I know anything about the Constitution, is completely at variance with the Act as it stands.

4. Has the Leader of the Government given any undertaking in this matter on behalf of the Senate?

5. Finally, will the Leader of the Government give consideration to arranging an appropriate opportunity, as soon as possible, for the Senate as a whole to be given an opportunity to express its views on this statement, made in such an extraordinary manner, about the future of this chamber?

Senator Perrault: The deputy leader has posed a series of very important questions indeed. They are important to everyone in this chamber. Because of the importance of these questions I would think it appropriate to suggest that I take these questions as notice. I will provide a full reply at a later sitting.

Senator Grosart: Could I further ask the Leader of the Government if he could undertake to make his reply at the next sitting? I ask that because this is a matter where the reply should not be delayed too long.

[Senator Grosart.]

Senator Perrault: I agree with the deputy leader that there should be an early reply, and I shall endeavour to have that reply on Tuesday.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Administrator's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Senator Neiman, seconded by Senator Cottreau, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, Madam Speaker, we are most appreciative of the excellent choice made when you were chosen as our new Speaker. A better choice could hardly have been made. We feel assured of the continuity of the graceful and dignified representation of the Senate to which we have become accustomed. We wish you well in your new duties as our Speaker.

Senator Muriel McQueen Fergusson has well earned her rest. She has been very busy indeed in the last few sessions, and we are appreciative of the extent to which we have benefited from her masterful handling of her task as Speaker. We appreciate greatly her outstanding participation as our representative in many civic and diplomatic functions. She deserves to be well remembered by the people and by the Senate of Canada. Thank you, Senator Fergusson, we are indeed grateful for your worthy contribution.

May I express my personal gratitude to the former Leader of the Government in the Senate, the Honourable Paul Martin, for a job well done. As a loyal Leader of the Government in the Senate, Honourable Senator Martin achieved many worthwhile goals for us. His resignation as leader should not be taken as signifying his retirement, but simply as a necessary step to freeing himself completely to enable him to undertake other important duties on behalf of Canada. I am sure all honourable senators will agree with me in wishing this good friend success, good health and Godspeed.

The choice of the Honourable Ray Perrault as the new Leader of the Government in the Senate is an excellent one. Young, experienced in civic matters, a brilliant debater, a sterling speaker, as we witnessed yesterday, a good achiever, Honourable Senator Perrault offers us high promise of excellent management of the government's affairs in the Senate. He assumes his duties assured of our goodwill, our assistance and our cooperation.

Honourable senators, need I remark my pleasure in noting the renewal of the mandate of the Honourable Jacques Flynn as Leader of the Opposition in the Senate? During these last few years he has performed his duties very ably. He was brilliant in the use of tactics and all appreciated this cultured but astute debater, who, in spite of the small number of senators representing the Opposition, together with his colleagues kept our sittings lively and interesting and helped to keep the people of Canada well informed.

Senator Grosart: Hear, hear.

Senator Desruisseaux: We will miss the sparkling remarks and comments and, indeed, the criticism to which we have become accustomed from Senator Choquette, as Deputy Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Grosart: I doubt if you will.

Senator Desruisseaux: Well, at any rate, that is how I feel about it. I know many others feel the same way. But I welcome very much Senator Grosart as the new Deputy Leader of the Opposition. It can truly be said that his reputation as an excellent debater has preceded him. I congratulate him on the assumption of his new duties.

The Senate is fortunate indeed in being able to count amongst its members two new distinguished colleagues, Senator Barrow and Senator Cottreau. I fully concur in the remarks made by those who have already spoken in this debate about their being summoned to the Senate. Their contributions here will be highly valuable. I congratulate them and I wish them both a long and fruitful career.

I am sorry I was not present when tributes were paid to a recently deceased colleague. I mourn the passing of this personal friend, a most distinguished, able and esteemed colleague, the Honourable Romuald Bourque. His lifelong contributions to his city, to his province and to his country are his best eulogy. His wise and timely advice, his counsel, his broadness of view, his love for peace and good understanding, will remain in our memories. We regret the passing of this friend and I join in expressing to his family our sorrow and our very deepest sympathies.

The proposer and seconder of the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, Senator Neiman and Senator Cottreau, made excellent presentations. They are to be commended for their clarity and their comprehensibility. They made valuable contributions indeed and their views were most refreshing. I congratulate them and hope they have a long life with us.

A Throne Speech announcing some 68 pieces of legislative projects, in addition to many projects which we have been advised will originate in the Senate, proposed without duress or pressures from any quarter, without fear of losing support that would cause harm and damage, presented in simple, concise language, was invigorating indeed. Policies can now be said to be the policies of the majority government. It can be backed up by the guarantee of a stable Parliament. It is, I think, the opportunity to streamline many of our legislative projects and many of our laws.

I want to congratulate the new Leader of the Government and the Deputy Leader of the Opposition for their remarkable speeches yesterday. It augurs well for us and for a most interesting session. The verdict of the people of Canada is clear. My interpretation is that we witnessed with the election the rejection of any policy of total socialism, of interference in everything, and of controls of wages and prices. In my opinion it was the unconditional approval of our free enterprise system.

[Translation]

Perhaps at the risk of overtaxing your patience, but owing to their importance and our concern under the circumstances, I will take the liberty of dealing desultorily with certain points of our economy.

First let us say that a recent review of assessments made by government and bank economists indicate that our economy can be favourably compared with that of other industrialized countries and has very little to envy them.

In short, the real net increase of the Gross National Product during the current year can reach approximately 4 to 5 per cent and that being so, we rank among the most prosperous countries. Even if for 1975 only a 1.2 per cent increase in the constant strength of the domestic demand is expected, it is anticipated however, in spite of weak spots, that it will nevertheless rise from 4½ to 5 per cent in 1975. The housing requirements which also, in spite of a small decline, will perhaps exceed in 1974 the record year of 1973 still provide for 1975 some appreciable results, thanks to the measures announced in the Speech from the Throne, since only 10 per cent slump is expected in comparison with the record year of 1974. In addition, larger investments for industrial equipment and facilities which have not been cancelled up to now will largely compensate for overly generous estimates of foreign demand for our products which at the present time is receding and should be watched but which should begin its upward trend in mid-1975.

The effects of the higher cost of imported oil will not be as severe in Canada as in most other importing countries as it will be compensated for to a large extent by the higher cost of our own exports. In the first six months of 1974, we exported about two billion dollars' worth of oil to the U.S.A.; that is twice as much as in 1973 in the corresponding period. Forecasts for 1975 and 1976 are even more promising. That is definitely not a contributing factor in the depression foreseen in pessimistic milieux.

Economic forecasts indicate a marked deceleration in the purchase of Canadian goods by importing countries affected economically. We will have to excel in our external relations for our exports to resume their rising course. We will see a softening in the export of our food products, because of decimated reserves, the result of some of our crops and the increasing value of the Canadian dollar on foreign markets.

Our economic statistics also indicate a new surge in our imports which doubtless should be watched closely. Keeping in mind those factors, our economists still foresee somewhat lower employment, though stable, in the next few months. However, 1975 does not offer that guarantee. The weakness of the American and international economy is a source of serious concern to us, and far from reassuring. We have witnessed in recent months the swift movement of the great purchasing powers of our industrialized countries.

It is an important historical exodus and it will have consequences in the foreseeable future of the economy of all industrialized nations. I cannot share the view expressed recently that our economy will expand by only 1.2 per cent in 1975, in real net terms, and that our unemployment rate will reach an average of 7.8 per cent. I think that on the whole, factors indicate rather that there will be a decline only during the first three months of 1975 and that after a brief period of stagnation, the economy will regain a strong momentum in the later part of 1975, to continue progressively in the next few years. For its initial recovery, the Canadian economy will rely on outlays for the expansion of equipment and plants, on the productive expenditures of the government and on the sale of fuels to foreign countries. In this regard, it is impossible for me to view a world recession during our foreseeable economic period. Very recently, Royal Bank chairman Earle McLaughlin rightly remarked:

The world's financial system is going through a healthy sobering up period after a decade of extravagant growth.

It is an outstanding description I could not improve on and I fully agree with it.

The stock market is already undervalued. It seems that it cannot fall any lower. It seems more likely that its readjustment during the next few months will bring about a gradual increase in the value of stocks, which will considerably affect the world economy, and consequently the Canadian economy, in the foreseeable future.

Senator Bourget: Let us hope so.

Senator Desruisseaux: Yes, it would be a good thing.

Several industrial countries in Europe have already made economic readjustments. They are getting ready to bring back their economy to normal.

In my opinion, what we should fear the most is the inconsistency of American economic policies and the lack of satisfactory economic and monetary agreements between nations, aimed at taking the concerted action without which we can expect the worst. For its part, the inconsistency of the United States could well lead to an unforeseen disintegration of the economy to which ours is directly related, since our southern neighbours now buy more than 60 per cent of all our exported products. Any economic disintegration or weakening would of course have direct and immediate effects on our national economy. We must therefore immediately measure these effects, foresee their results, and bravely make the necessary decisions to protect the Canadian economy as much as possible in a world where the economy is now somewhat shaky.

[English]

I want to say something on behalf of those who have been fundamentally responsible for our prosperity during the last decade, the corporations and the corporate executives who created abundant work for us. They have been, and still are, the real builders of Canada. They, with the cooperation of our governments at all levels and of our people, gave us the necessary economic and technical leadership. They gave us employment for millions. They built up our growing domestic and foreign trade and they helped to place Canada among the leading nations of the world.

Recently, Mr. Rowland Frazee, the Executive Vice President of the Royal Bank of Canada, remarked optimistically at a Canadian investment seminar that "Canada will continue to set the world pace for real economic growth next year, probably outperforming every industrial nation in the process." He qualified his optimistic forecast—which also anticipated only marginal declines in the present rate of inflation and the high nominal rates of interest that go with it—adding a word of caution, "But keep in mind, we do not live in isolation in Canada, and all the world's economies are in a delicate balance situation."

Let no government forget that the growth of corporations has been Canada's growth. It is the corporations that have been the achievers in our nation, and it is these Canadian achievers who have been called corporate bums and rip-off artists. May I say, I was very proud to be a Canadian when I witnessed, with you, the direct rebuff given by our Canadian electors.

Let me underline an important but regretfully little known facet of our economy. Funds allowed to stay in companies and funds allowed to work for corporate expansion have been basic contributors to our past strong economy because of their immediate productivity. Most business people have now come to realize our increasing dependence on high productivity, which gives us more assurance of domestic and foreign industrial trade success and facilitates our competitive biddings. There is a price to pay for high productivity. More than at any time in the past, the government must allow the companies to be provided with sufficient capital investment to get the facilities and the machinery that will assure more productivity. They must receive the capital to develop in the most efficient way, and in ample supply, our energy, our needed materials and our natural resources.

From 1962 to 1973 there was a capital investment in Canada, both from domestic and foreign sources, of some $274 billion. Finding this huge necessary capital contributed more than any other single factor, in my estimation, to create the general prosperity we enjoyed in that decade. Of course, an important part of the capital required had to come from outside Canada. To retain our place in the world, to assure an ever-improving Canadian standard of living, to help maintain an acceptable rate of assured employment, to meet the ever-increasing money requirements for our social and welfare services to which we now find ourselves, our children and our children's children committed, to realize the dream of the next generous welfare legislation, the guaranteed income for all Canadians, we have to create to a much higher degree for our corporations an accessibility to the fantastic sum of productive capital investment that will be needed to stir the economy, provide government revenues and give high employment. It does not presently exist in sufficiency in Canada and will no longer be easy to obtain from outside Canada. In the next 11 years Canada will be in need of a minimum of some $336 billion in today's dollars, not taking into account any inflation over the coming years.

Because of their galloping expansion due to galloping demands, companies are now going into debt at an even faster pace than they are able to retain earnings. At the Canadian bankers' seminar held in Montreal a few weeks ago, the assumption was that Canada's needs for capital investment in the next decade would be over $500 billion, which even then, I understand, leaves a wide gap with the amount of capital that will become available for investment. Similarly, the New York Stock Exchange reported that, for the same period, the United States will need about $4.7 trillion, which would also leave a deficiency there of about $646 billion, if we take into consideration the business and personal savings forecasts used to make up these capital investments. The question is, where will we find the amount of money necessary to fund the future of Canada? Whom will we try to convince to accept the gigantic challenge involved? It would be a drastic mistake to adopt an indifferent attitude with respect to what must be considered an essential, namely, the capital required by corporations to assure continued economic and industrial development and the ability to meet continuing demands.

The main reason why corporations should not be drained of their profits is that these profits have been, and still are in great part, used for their capital expansion needs—and this despite present pressures on the government to plan rapid redistribution of any capital now available. The redistribution of wealth does not actually do as much for the promotion of a balanced, healthy economy—an economy on which the individual economy of people is directly dependent—as does productive capital investment. This has been demonstrated time and again in the world.

Investment for expansion originates first from net earnings after taxes and dividends. Anything more that is needed for capital expenditure must then be found outside. If, because of our taxation policies, corporate net earnings become smaller, if depletion allowances are cancelled or cut, making risk capital less accessible to resource developers, it will become increasingly difficult to raise this risk capital for expansion purposes.

Because corporation planning must be made years in advance, it is essential that government policy on the coming rules of the game on capital investment, be they foreign or domestic, and the government's attitude with respect to corporate taxation and depletion allowances should be known clearly now. We do know that the policy of curtailment of capital investment would tend to increase inflation, because it would help to create scarcity of supplies by making future expansion and production more difficult to realize.

[Translation]

Our most effective contribution to fight the worldwide inflation which is felt throughout Canada is to cut government spending and simultaneously reduce our national debt. Such an attitude is undoubtedly unpopular. But it is time that we see its positive effect and that we take the best possible steps to rectify the serious problems of today. From what the Minister of National Revenue and the Right Honourable Prime Minister said recently and from the indications contained in the Speech from the Throne, we are finally talking, for the first time in many years, but still timidly, of coming back to our senses and of not spending more than we can afford.

As has always been the case, those who benefit most from inflation are those who are the most indebted. The fact still remains that inflation is also detrimental to Canadians holding a purchasing power that is deteriorating and eroding before their very eyes. Indeed, it impoverishes nations, dampens their initiative and eventually generates increased unemployment. In the present context it is impossible for a nation to act alone. That was pointed out yesterday. Unilateral action to reduce inflation in a country can only bring trouble everywhere. A tight money program without consideration for what is happening elsewhere will inevitably lead to monetary difficulties everywhere. It is time for understanding and agreement. Government efforts should be further intensified in that respect. This has already started and the pleas made by Mr. Turner are sound, constructive and indicative of an immediate desire on the part of the government. Let it be said openly that there is an urgent need for a new "Bretton Wood" type of arrangement between developed nations, and any effort in that respect is constructive and productive and should be encouraged.

Honourable senators, despite the difficulty of the times, in the present circumstances the Canadian economy has become the envy of the industrialized countries of the Western World, for up to now we have not experienced the real shortages or major economic shocks which so many of the other industrialized nations have had to face. We enjoy, most fortunately, three big assets: oil, mineral resources of all types, and a quickly maturing manufacturing sector. We are the only western nation which actually exports natural gas and oil, and we are the only western nation which can become totally independent of oil importation. The sound and practical economic policies of the government, together with the shrewd foresight of certain corporations over the last few years, have played an important part in gaining these achievements.

During the great international energy crisis, Canada alone was able to avoid the drastic oil shortages which faced the western nations. We were able to achieve a near-perfect trade balance on oil, in part by following up on the generally spiralling oil export prices.

The picture of the future in Canada is indeed bright. According to the OECD, Canada has a growth rate unequalled among the industrialized nations. Truthfully, there is no major blow expected in Canada's balance of payments owing to any increase in oil prices. There are also other favourable factors which would justify continued general enthusiasm for the economic future of Canada and its people. Indeed, the readjustment period, which is often called stagnation or regression, which we have now entered into is not the kind of depression experienced in 1929. I believe it will be short-lived, a matter of at the most 24 months, including the downgrade slide of the economy, the recovery period and the resumption of the new economic uptrend. In reality, we are in a needed deep-breathing spell. We know we are presently in an excellent position to ride stormy weather, and that soon, when the fear of depression diminishes, we will resume quickly our uptrend economic development. There is no basic ground for economic fear in Canada.

Discounting the short-term considerations and looking at a longer trend, the government estimates on our mineral resources indicate that by 1980 the conservative output figures on copper will be up by 80 per cent from 1970; iron ore by 81 per cent; lead by 23 per cent; nickel by 30 per cent, and zinc by 55 per cent. Why, Canadian food items such as eggs, butter, apples, coffee and such items as refrigerators, automobiles and nylon stockings are still sold at less than one-half the price they are sold at in Russia. Canada's position as the extractor of large and varied natural resources is an exceptional one, both for trading and for pricing. The petrochemical industry has just finished planning fantastic development of plants and of products for exportation. They will now have to look again at these expansion programs with a view to going faster because of other sensational developments in their fields. The future is still Canada's. We are the land of opportunity for the foreseeable future in our world, and it is the general consensus that we remain here the freest land in the world.

The attitude taken by the Canadian government on inflation was the right one, in my belief. I realize fully that these views are not shared by most of those in the Opposition, and that the government is presently being pressured to change its views. I hope it does not. To me, it remains a fact that controls on prices and wages, wherever tried, did not work but produced shortages. We know that no one country is really independent in economics and that no country can control its economy alone. The world, it seems, is not yet smart enough to establish a general, workable, anti-inflation policy that would be operative. We may be able, in due course, to do so, but it will take precious time that we are unable to spare in these difficult times.

High wage demands are not the prime cause of inflation. They are a consequence. Inflated prices are caused by inflating the monetary and credit volume far beyond the GNP and the availability of supplies. This should be remembered in our considerations and in our dealings.

According to an OECD report, for the 12 months terminating in July, the rate of inflation of its member countries shows that even though some six member nations had a smaller inflation rate than Canada, 15 other important member nations had an inflation rate ranging from 11.7 per cent to 43.8 per cent compared to Canada's 11.3 per cent. I am not an advocate of inflation, but being realistic we have to admit that there are a great many things worse than the steady inflation we have been having these last few decades. Last year we paid the largest and most generous social welfare contributions in our history. We created, I believe, the greatest building boom in our history. We helped more than ever before the depressed areas. We undertook large environment expenditures. Even so, we still had a remarkable trade balance, and we still ended the year with, I believe, the largest per capita disposable income in our history.

I want to point out an important contribution that Canadians can make by themselves in fighting inflation effectively. The importance of the saving rate as a percentage of the GNP is known to be one of the great stabilizers of a nation's economy; yet, it is not encouraged as it should be in Canada. It is regrettable that at this difficult time Canada has the lowest per capita saving rate as a percentage of the GNP, except possibly the United Kingdom. A marked increase in the Canadian saving rate on the Canadian capital formation rate would help to increase our standard of living, would help create capital for investment, and would help fight inflation in the right way.

Now let me cite to you a labour situation that needs our attention, and which is not dealt with in the Throne Speech. In my province the construction industry is operating under one of the most corrupt and brutal systems in North America. This is now a proven fact. As stated by witnesses before a special royal commission instituted by Quebec, the industry is a jungle where tradition has allowed construction to set up an exclusive parallel state, having its own customs, its own laws, its own army for enforcement and its goons for violent positive action, permitting the participants to do whatever they want, unmindful of the social, economic and psychological effects, and this is tolerated by both the federal and the provincial governments. It is absolute permissiveness. Almost everywhere there is actual evidence of extortions, kick-backs, violence, vandalism, Shylocking and deliberate work slow-downs. As though this were not enough, together with this we find that nowhere else do we have these seemingly unnecessary elements of inter-union squabbling, which leads to additional rounds of violence and extortion—an international union against a Canadian union. Nowhere else do we find foreign-controlled unions testing in Canada labour policies that they like to try out, using threats of violence to force Canadian workers to join their unions.

Investigators have found evidence that some employers are being forced to pay off union stewards for "guaranteed productivity," and persons seeking work have been forced to take loans at 35 per cent interest from union representatives, even when they did not need it. There have been instances where persons who wanted to work have been forced by threats to join unions against their will and without having any choice in the matter. This has made them, in a way, slaves—and we are allowing it.

People in industry have become fed up with the goings-on, but they are afraid for their families and for themselves if they talk. Much of this repeats itself in other sectors in Canada. It is not good; it is gross corruption; it is the biggest political scandal of our times, and has been tolerated for too long by the lawmakers.

We have cancerous labour problems in Canada. It is important that we find methods of settling them soon. In 1973, according to Statistics Canada, two million days of work were lost because of strikes, and in the first six months of 1974, 5,200,000 days have been lost because of strikes and lockouts, resulting in a loss to workers of $200 million to $400 million. Most of these strikes and lockouts were unnecessary and uncalled for. Little was gained by either the workers or the employers when final settlement was arrived at because there was very little difference between what one party was actually ready to accept and the other party was ready to concede. Nevertheless, the resulting loss of potential in production contributed greatly to the general cost of products. The Canadian public has become disgusted and irritated, as survey polls have shown, and more and more the public, together with the workers and employers, favour a drastic revamping of our labour policies and of our labour legislation in respect to the relationship of parties when discussing their differences in respect to the periodical labour reports that have to be submitted, in respect to the collection, the employment of, the transfer directly or indirectly to foreign union headquarters of any workers' dues, in respect to the authority needed to use these dues for other purposes, in respect to the methods of voting and the quorum requirements at union meetings, in respect to the question of the leaders' salaries and their vote of approval for and their authorization of illegal or criminal tactics and methods to be used in strikes.

A new assessment of the function of labour tribunals, of the powers of enforcement and of the question of contempt of court is urgent. Legal strikes in essential and productive services, consideration of the losses suffered by and the hardships caused to workers together with the enforced loss of freedom to work suffered by large sectors of the general public should be restudied and reappraised. Cartel arrangements for the support of strikes should receive the same legal treatment as cartels in any other field. They have the same purpose in that they use concerted action and force to extract the maximum advantages, often unfairly, from the public which has to pay through the nose and put up with the consequences. The established procedures for the handling of strike or lock-out settlements should be reviewed, modernized and rendered more efficient. A new look at the merit of including indexing in collective bargaining contracts should also be made at this time. Indexing is really among the root causes of many of these strikes and should not be overlooked.

Lockouts, illegal sitdown strikes, slowdowns, illegal study periods, violence, vandalism, threats, property destruction, arson, sabotage, terror, reprisals, bodily assaults, criminal action and illegal tactics should all be punishable, and there should be no possibility of the withdrawal of a prosecution simply because a strike settlement is reached.

Our labour code and labour legislation have become antiquated. There is no provision in them for the protection of the general public. Stoppages in essential and protective services, because of strikes, do not receive the primary consideration they deserve. There has been no real attempt at concerted action to study the question of remedies for labour problems. It is inconceivable, honourable senators, that we continue to remain indifferent to the losses to our workers, and to the losses to the public generally. It is quite unacceptable to see Canadian workers being forced against their will to commit, on order, illegal or criminal acts simply because they fear reprisals against themselves or their families, or because they are afraid of the revocation or suspension of their union membership which is, seemingly, their one and only right to work. It is quite unjust that workers who want to work should be forcibly prevented from doing so. We might as well face the fact that there is no longer any freedom of action left to the workers in many of these instances.

It is becoming the general belief that government, at all levels, is failing in its prime duty. Government can reform our labour laws and provide our people with the right guidelines, but they seem to have the feeling that labour issues should be avoided as much as possible simply because they are controversial, and because any action taken might be unpopular with either side, or, for that matter, with both sides, and because labour problems are difficult to adjust. At times it seems that the general attitude is one of "the public be damned."

At the present time public pressure is mounting and there is considerable anger. The public wants to see better guidelines for the settlement of labour disputes. The public wants an end to illegal strikes and, where damage results, provision for such damage to be paid for by those who are guilty. The public wants no strikes in essential services, and it also wants the criminals and illegal operators connected with labour unions and employers punished without reservation. At the present time government is being blamed for its avoidance of basic labour problems.

A Gallup Poll published in early September showed that an astonishing 68 per cent of the union members want the members of the executive committees of the unions who give illegal or criminal orders prosecuted. They want those who approve or recommend criminal actions or illegal strikes, give illegal or criminal orders, or commit illegal or criminal acts brought before the courts of justice. Only 17 per cent were against their prosecution.

Even so, and in spite of the good intentions behind inquiries that I heard yesterday, I suppose it will serve no useful purpose to suggest again here that this would be an appropriate area of investigation for a Senate committee. It would be very useful to all to have at this time fair and constructive recommendations in connection, at least, with federal legislation. One of these days, however, the whole scandalous mess of inadequate, poor and out-of-date labour legislation will have to be cleaned up properly. I will take the next opportunity to point again to this loathsome problem about which, through choice, we do so little.

I shall not speak today on the constitutionality of a law passed in my province, or on some of the important bills that will come before us. I shall await the appropriate occasions to do so. I am conscious of the time I have taken today, and I apologize. I promise to be briefer in my discussions in the future, and I can only thank you for your patience.

Hon. Donald Cameron: Honourable senators, my first responsibility will be to join with those who have preceded me in paying a tribute to the very distinguished but all too short career of our former Speaker, Senator Fergusson. During the time she occupied the Speaker's Chair in this chamber she made a tremendous impression on those of us who were privileged to sit here under her direction, and as she travelled about the world as an official representative of the people of Canada, she did so with a graciousness and dignity which brought credit to herself and to Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Cameron: To you, Madam Speaker, I offer our very best wishes, and express the conviction that you will carry out your duties with credit to yourself and the Senate.

At this time I extend a welcome to our new colleagues in the Senate and tell them that, in spite of some of the things they may have read before coming here, this place is not nearly as black as it is painted.

My best wishes also go to the new Leader of the Government in the Senate. Senator Perrault comes with a distinguished career behind him, and has more than enough youthful vigour to enable him to launch into a new career in the Senate. I am sure that he will be very successful.

I would be remiss if I did not take this opportunity of saying a word of appreciation to our friend and colleague, Senator Martin. He came to the Senate in 1968 with the express hope that he might make this a more viable, vital place than it was previously. Those who have been associated with him here realize that he succeeded to a great extent in bringing that improvement about. He has had a very distinguished career in the Parliament of Canada, and I know that I speak for all honourable senators when I say that when he leaves us in the not too distant future we will miss him very much. We know, however, that he goes to another sphere of activity in which he will have the opportunity of representing Canada with distinction, and with credit to himself as well as the people who sent him there.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Cameron: Honourable senators, coming now to the Speech from the Throne, I believe you will agree with me when I say that it was one of the longest speeches we have had—certainly since I came here 19 years ago. It presented a bill of fare which will keep us busy and active in this chamber for many months to come. However, it is a challenging bill of fare, to which I am sure all members of this chamber will respond, as they have so well in the past.

As I listened to Senator Grosart yesterday I was reminded of a favourite uncle escorting his recalcitrant nephew to the woodshed. He seemed to say, "This hurts me more than it hurts you", and proceeded to administer a milder spanking than he usually gives the government. I hope this is an example of the amelioration that comes with age, and increased wisdom and generosity.

I wish to make one or two comments as a preamble to my remarks regarding the Speech from the Throne. Reference was made to the need for developing comprehensive programs with respect to resource development. In my opinion, as one who comes from a province in which this is a matter of major concern, where the provincial government is expected to take in revenues of over $100 million a year for the next 10 years from the development of resources, this represents a tremendous challenge and an opportunity—a challenge to expend those funds wisely and not extravagantly. I am sure that our friend Premier Lougheed will bring good judgment and wisdom to his task in dealing with these tremendous resources.

But this is only the beginning. Last summer some of you were in the northern part of Canada, and visited the tar sands. You saw something of the tremendous wealth that lies buried in an area of 250 miles in length by 40 or 50 miles in width. The tar sands are anywhere from three to as many as 250 feet in depth, and are covered by an over-burden of two or three feet to as much as 200 feet. It would be a good thing if all members of this chamber and of the other house had the opportunity of seeing the tar sands, one of our many rich resources.

As a matter of fact, I do not think Canadian parliamentarians do enough visiting to various parts of the country to familiarize themselves with our resources and what is being done about them, in order to be able to make a contribution in Parliament based on informed opinion.

In participating in today's debate, I want to confine my remarks to one segment of the Speech, namely, transportation policy. I shall begin by reviewing briefly the history of transportation in Canada, and then turn to some of the problems which are particularly challenging today.

[Senator Cameron.]

The Canadian Pacific Railway had its beginnings in 1871 when the then Prime Minister, Sir John A. Macdonald, promised the construction of a transcontinental railway to induce the remote colony of British Columbia to join Confederation.

I am sure that some people in central Canada are not sure whether British Columbia has even yet joined Confederation, but, as a near neighbour of that very rich and exciting province, I assure honourable senators that Alberta usually finds itself lined up side by side with British Columbia in the battles which take place on matters affecting central Canada.

For three years after Sir John A. Macdonald made his commitment to British Columbia the federal government negotiated with various syndicates to meet its pledge concerning construction of the CPR. Failing in this, the government undertook in 1874 to do the work itself. However, progress was so slow that negotiations with private groups continued, and in 1880 an agreement was reached with the Pacific Railway syndicate. It became apparent, as construction progressed, that the syndicate had taken on more than its financial resources could handle at that time.

Early estimates had placed the cost of construction and equipment at $100 million, although long before the road was half finished it became clear that the estimate was not sufficient. Salaries of construction crews had risen to the point where the syndicate's finances could not pay them. The company then turned to the federal government for aid, and a loan was provided on condition that the Pacific Railway syndicate put up some of its unsold and unpledged lands as security. In 1886 it had to give 6.8 million acres to Ottawa as partial payment for the loan. Nevertheless, this arrangement allowed the railway to be completed in 1885.

In addition to this loan, the CPR received very generous concessions from the government towards the construction of the railroad, and tremendous land grants. The original concessions consisted of $25 million in cash, 25 million acres of land, and freedom from taxation for some years on land holdings and corporate revenues. That is, lands granted to the CPR were to be free from taxation for 20 years or until sold, and properties used for railway purposes were to be free from taxation forever. It would be interesting to have a dollar value placed on this latter concession, but I have not been able to see even an estimate of what that value might be.

I propose to read from The CPR: A Century of Corporate Welfare, by Robert Chodos, as follows:

Largely because of the almost limitless aid provided by the Government to get the railway started, the CPR was at least a moderate success from the beginning. The total value of that government aid is impossible to estimate. There was $25 million in cash. Large portions of the transcontinental line was built by the Government (i.e. between 1874-1880) and turned over to the company; those sections cost the public treasury $37.8 million. There were the lands: initially 25 million acres of land 'fairly fit for settlement'; then when the railway decided to extend its line to the western end of Burrard Inlet, fourteen miles beyond the original Pacific terminus at Port Moody, it demanded and got an additional grant of 6,000 acres from the Government of British Columbia, land so fairly fit for settlement that it is now the central part of the City of Vancouver.

There were other concessions made to the CPR. Apart from the tax concessions already mentioned, there were concessions in the area of railroad equipment and competition. I quote further:

All necessary equipment for building the railway would be admitted into Canada duty free. And the Government would for twenty years prohibit any competing road from being built south of the CPR's main line or within 15 miles of the American border, ensuring the company a virtual monopoly of western traffic (this monopoly clause was cancelled in 1888). This meant not only that the Dominion would not itself charter competing railways but that it would also use its constitutional power of disallowance if any province had the effrontery to do so—as, in the event, did Manitoba.

These then were the original grants and concessions given to the CPR for the construction of the railroad. They gave the company a substantial economic base from which to develop into the huge conglomerate we know today.

Before dealing further with the CPR grants, let us first look at the Hudson's Bay Company and its position during this same period. Along with the Grand Trunk, the most important spiritual forerunner of the CPR was the Hudson's Bay Company. I quote from Canada: A Political and Social History, by E. McInnis:

Throughout the vast domain that stretched from the shores of the Hudson Bay to the islands fringing the Pacific Coast (nearly a million and a half square miles), the sole effective authority at mid-century (1850) was that of the Hudson's Bay Company. Its charter gave it full ownership of all lands drained by the rivers flowing into Hudson Bay—a grant that the company resolutely interpreted as including the valleys of the Red and Saskatchewan rivers; and beyond those extensive limits the company had enjoyed a monopoly of trade since 1821.

Those boys certainly knew how to interpret a concession to get the most value out of it.

By the end of the 1850s there was growing pressure by the government to have these Hudson's Bay Company lands made part of the Dominion. Negotiations between Canada, the company and the British government over this issue took place during the 1860s and a settlement was reached in 1869. Robert Chodos, in his book, writes:

The great fur-trading company sold its lands to the Dominion government for 300,000 pounds in 1869 (retaining the areas around its trading posts and one-twentieth of the total for itself), and by 1885 millions of the most fertile acres of those lands had been handed over in turn to the Canadian Pacific as a grant for building the railway.

The amount of land retained by the company adjacent to its trading posts totalled 45,000 acres. In addition, under the terms of the agreement allowing it one-twentieth of the land, the company retained seven million acres. The company both sold and developed this land over the years through its land department based in Winnipeg.

By 1934 two million acres, of the seven million acres it retained under the 1869 agreement, scattered through Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, remained unsold. There are no accurate figures of the amount of money received from the sale of its land. However, considering the fact that portions of this land were located in urban centres, the company quite likely made a considerable profit on its sales. Today the majority of the remaining two million acres has now been sold, but no figures are available of the value received from those sales.

Let us now return to the CPR and its lands. The company received large sums of money from sales of most of the 25 million acres granted it by the government. According to Robert Chodos:

The company's prairie lands were valued at $1.50 an acre when it gave back 6.8 million acres in 1886 as partial payment of an emergency government loan; by 1916, however, the company estimated its net proceeds from land sales at $68.25 million, and carried its unsold lands in its accounts at $119.25 million.

Today, through its subsidiary, Marathon Realty, Canadian Pacific still owns roughly a million acres of land, including some of the most valuable urban land in the country. Marathon Realty was created by the CPR in 1963 to bring expert management to the non-transportation real estate it owns. As one who knows some of the people who are in charge of Marathon Realty, I can assure you that they have been very astute and shrewd in their management responsibilities.

The philosophy behind the development of the company's lands underwent a transformation between the early 1900s and the establishment of Marathon Realty. In the early years, the company could afford to dispose of its lands at relatively liberal terms to encourage settlement, thereby creating traffic for the railway. With the virtual completion of western settlement in 1930 this policy changed. The company began to look at the long range value of its land holdings.

Robert Chodos further says:

The million acres it retained in 1963, when Marathon Realty was incorporated, made it one of the largest landowners in the country. About half of this was rural land on the Prairies, which it rented out to farmers. The rest of it was urban land, much of it inherently very valuable and some of it made even more valuable over the years by tax advantages left over from the great days of railway handouts.

It is difficult to place a total value gained by the CPR on its land sales and rentals down through the years. We are, however, able to show the net income from real estate sales, rentals and related operations since 1964, the year after Marathon Realty was formed. The yearly net income is set forth in Table I. I would ask that these tables be included in Hansard.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Source: CPR Annual Reports. 1964-1973.

I will just summarize the returns for 1973 alone. Gross rentals and other income, $35.3 million; expenses, including income taxes, $30.6 million; net income, $4.7 million.

It is difficult to obtain an exact breakdown showing how much revenue is obtained from rentals and how much from land sales. As can be seen from the table, all revenue is lumped together under one heading. The table does, however, point out that Canadian Pacific is obtaining a healthy return on its overall real estate operations.

At one point, the CPR used much of its urban land for railway purposes, but by the 1960s most of it was far too valuable for that. Marathon Realty became more than just a land company; it entered the lucrative field of real estate development. This is dealt with also by Robert Chodos, who says:

Marathon owns 21 shopping centres across the country (most of them in the West), five industrial parks, and a number of residential properties, but it is best known for its massive downtown complexes, among which Palliser Square is one of the less ambitious. Project 200, in which Marathon is the senior partner, was supposed to change the face of the Vancouver waterfront (the central part of which has been owned by Canadian Pacific since the original land grant in the 1880's)... Canadian Pacific built Place du Canada, one of the endless series of multi-use complexes in downtown Montreal, and owns a six-block area immediately to the west which it plans to redevelop at an announced cost of $300 million. The development plan calls for demolishing Windsor Station and replacing it with a modern building to house Canadian Pacific's head office and a new, smaller passenger terminal. In Toronto, Marathon owns a 50-percent share of the most grandiose development project ever conceived in this country, Metro Centre.

We wish them well in this development. It is imaginative, and represents a tremendous potential for the future.

From this we can see the enormous magnitude of Marathon Realty's operations. The real estate company arm, created from federal government land granted to the company in the 1880s, now enjoys a considerable profit from its undertakings. It is highly likely that without the original land grants the real estate subsidiary would not enjoy its present success.

[Senator Cameron.]

In addition to profits made from real estate sales and development, the CPR has also received substantial returns from minerals and resources. The lands left over from the original grant to the CPR contained valuable minerals and resources, and they wisely extracted the mineral rights of what land they sold to the poor persons who settled the western Prairies after 1904. In the 1940s some of that land attracted the great international oil companies, and the first oil strike in Canada was made on Canadian Pacific land at Leduc, Alberta, on February 7, 1947.

I remember that night very well. We had a group of railway real estate people in for a short course on the day that Leduc No. 1 came in. As you might expect, the boys were feeling pretty good. One of the officers at that time remarked that if Leduc No. 1 developed as encouragingly as it promised, the company would have fur-lined comfort stations throughout the length and breadth of Canada.

Senator Benedickson: Some of them are still pretty poor.

Senator Cameron: It received revenue on its oil lands in the form of royalties from the companies that had developed them. J. L. McDougall comments on this in his book, Canadian Pacific: A Brief History, saying:

The modern period in the oil and gas business began in 1947 with the discovery of oil at Leduc. In the next decade the Company acted chiefly as an owner of mineral rights (i.e. on the lands left from the original land grant). It gave leases to oil companies and received in return rents, reservation fees, and production royalties. By 1957, net income came to $8 million. But was a policy which tended to leave the initiative to others the best long-run policy? The conclusion was that it was not. In 1958 the Company set up Canadian Pacific Oil and Gas Limited to hold its mineral rights and to pursue an active policy in exploration and production. This meant, of course, that it would have to commit funds for rights in the lands of others in order to assemble compact blocks for development.

In the fall of 1969, Canadian Pacific Oil and Gas merged with Central-Del Rio Oils to form Pan Canadian

Petroleum. The 1969 Annual Report of Canadian Pacific, at page 4, says:

The integrating of the two companies created one of the largest independent oil companies in Canada and the joining of their capabilities opens up wider possibilities for exploration and development. Together the companies hold oil and gas rights in nearly 20 million net acres of land, mainly in Western and Northern Canada, but also in Lake Erie, offshore Nova Scotia and in the North Sea. Their combined net reserves are estimated at 190 million barrels of oil and natural gas liquids, 1,420 billion cubic feet of natural gas and 4.5 million long tons of sulphur.

Not a bad property to hold.

Table II shows the net income Canadian Pacific received from its oil and gas subsidiaries between 1965 and 1973. It should be noted that the figures for the years 1965 to 1970 include oil, gas and other mineral operations, where as the figures for 1971 to 1973 are just for the oil and gas operations. Canadian Pacific did not show its earnings from minerals separately until 1971.

the United States), exploration extends to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, the east coast of Nova Scotia, the Grand Banks of Newfoundland, the North Sea, offshore Tunisia, offshore Italy, Sicily and the Italian mainland. Pan Canadian is still fairly small; however, it is one of the more lucrative stars on the Canadian Pacific horizon, with a 1972 net profit of $15.2 million on a gross income of $47.2 million.

The CPR has been able to parlay the original land grant into a sizeable oil and gas company with worldwide operations.

The company's early involvement in mineral development came about largely because of the Crow's Nest Pass Agreement of 1897. Under the terms of the agreement, the CPR agreed to build a railway line from Lethbridge to Nelson, B.C., crossing the Rockies through the Crow's Nest Pass; the government agreed to subsidize the line to the extent of $11,000 a mile, which worked out to a total of

Because the table is a fairly lengthy one I will say only that for the year 1973 the gross operating revenues from oil, gas and other minerals was $75.3 million. Their expenses, including income taxes, amounted to $54.1 million, and their net income was $21.2 million. So those of you who have shares in the company must be doing fairly well.

These figures point out the fact that Canadian Pacific has gained considerable revenue from its oil and gas operations over the years. Naturally, not all of this revenue was received from oil and gas finds on the original lands granted to the company, although it did receive royalties and rents from companies using this land. However, Canadian Pacific was able to use these original land grants as a base from which to expand its oil and gas empire.

I should like to quote again from Robert Chodos' book:

In most of its activities, Canadian Pacific has used its initial holdings, usually obtained through government favours (e.g. the original land grant) of one sort or another, as a base for further expansion. Pan Canadian Petroleum, for instance, has now expanded far beyond the original Alberta oil lands. Although Pan Canadian's production is still largely confined to Alberta (with some in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and $3,404,720. The CPR agreed to reduce freight rates on certain specified commodities between eastern and western Canada, most notably grain and flour. This was the so-called Crow's Nest Pass Agreement.

The real advantage of the deal for the CPR, however, was that they would be able to tap the rich mineral lands of southeastern British Columbia with this railroad. The federal grant to the CPR allowed it the necessary funds to construct the Crow's Nest Pass line in an area for which other companies had been hard pressed to arrange financing. The most notable of those companies was the British Columbia Southern Railway which had been chartered by the province in 1888 to build a Crow's Nest line. This charter contained a land grant to the railway of 3,755,733 acres plus an additional land grant which covered most of the potential coal lands in the Pass area. The CPR bought the charter of the British Columbia Southern Railway, and with it acquired the railway's land grant of 3.75 million acres. It eventually sold most of this land for a net profit of $1.8 million, while keeping the valuable coal lands.

The CPR realized that to make the Crow's Nest line profitable it must encourage enough traffic for it. To this end, in 1897 it worked out a deal with the Crow's Nest Pass Coal Company, which also had rights to coal lands in the region, whereby it agreed not to mine its coal lands for ten years in return for the promise that the coal company would ship considerable amounts of coal and coke over the Crow's Nest Pass rail line. By 1901, the line was carrying 112,000 tons of coal and 199,000 tons of coke a year.

Even more important than this was the CPR's acquisition of a copper smelter in Trail. In 1898 the CPR purchased, from entrepreneur F. Augustus Heinze, this smelter and a narrow gauge railway from Trail to the Mines at Rossland, and a standard gauge railway from Trail to Robson. In addition, the CPR acquired 270,000 acres of land in the vicinity of the smelter and the railroads. This agreement formed the core of Cominco, the CPR's highly successful worldwide mining operation with operations in Spain, Greenland and Australia as well as in Canada. Canadian Pacific added a lead furnace to the smelter, one of many expansions to take place over the years. It also began buying up mines in the area to supply the smelter with ore. The final result of this was that the CPR was eventually able to secure total economic dominance of southeastern British Columbia. Not only was the CPR the chief carrier of the mineral output of the Kootenay region, but it was also one of the major producers of that output. Again I quote from Robert Chodos:

When Canadian Pacific estimated for the MacPherson Commission (in 1961) the revenue it had received from Cominco since the latter was formed as a company in 1906, the total came to almost $250 million; since then, it has gone up to well over $300 million.

We can see from this that the CPR was able to "cash in" on the building of the Crow's Nest Pass line by exploiting its early advantage in the area to build a highly profitable mineral operation. The Crow's Nest Pass Agreement of 1897 allowed the CPR entry into the mineral-rich section of southeastern British Columbia.

Just to summarize this part of the history of the line, I should point out that today the CPR is not merely a railroad company; it is a conglomerate controlling a number of enterprises. I will not expand on that point now, however. Needless to say, the CPR would have entered some of these activities without land grants or concessions to build railroad lines. However, these grants and concessions cannot be discounted as playing a vital role in the growth and prosperity of the CPR. They no doubt made it much easier for the company to prosper and grow.

As we have seen, the land grants played a direct part in the growth of Canadian Pacific's real estate and development operations. In addition, these lands provided the base from which its oil and gas operations could provide excellent profits in the form of royalties, lease fees and, later, formation of its own oil and gas subsidiary. Also, the Crow's Nest Pass Agreement allowed the CPR to gain a foothold in the mineral rich region of southeastern British Columbia, from which it was able to buy up mines and railroad lines, and expand its mineral operations.

[Senator Cameron.]

While these are some of the more direct examples of how the early grants and concessions aided the growth of the CPR, there is another, more indirect aspect that should be considered. This is the fact that the initial grants helped place the CPR in a position from which it could expand and consolidate its position in a number of areas. The grants gave Canadian Pacific an economic stability that other railways did not have. This enabled it to buy up other rail lines and, in many cases, to acquire the land charters that went with them. An example of this occurred in 1905 when it bought the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway on Vancouver Island. As well as buying a 77-mile rail line it also received 1.9 million acres of timber and coal-rich land that was part of E & N's original land grant. Canadian Pacific was later to sell some of these lands and purchase shares in the British Columbia forest company, MacMillan Bloedel. It retained enough of the lands to establish Pacific Logging, a subsidiary for lumbering. This has been a recurring pattern with Canadian Pacific.

What is left of this original legacy to the CPR? As mentioned previously, there are approximately one million acres of land, some of it the most expensive urban real estate in Canada. The value of this land would be difficult to estimate. However, one needs only to survey the price of real estate to realize that such lands are extremely valuable today. As far as the return from minerals is concerned, this is also difficult to assess. But the land grants enabled the company to gain significant returns. It also provided a good base from which to expand its mineral holdings into a world-wide operation.

The real effect of the original grants has been that the CPR was given a solid basis from which to conduct and expand its operations far beyond that of just a railway company. Without such concessions the company would undoubtedly have had a much tougher time of it.

During the past few years there have been many criticisms of, and calls for changes in, Canada's transportation policy. This is especially true in the area of railway transport. This was brought to the fore in March of this year when the Minister of Transport criticized the existing policy and suggested that changes were needed. In this part of my speech I will examine the proposed new transportation policy, and some criticisms of it.

The proposal can be broken down into two parts—freight and passenger services. Let us first look at the freight aspects.

In 1967 the Government of Canada passed the National Transportation Act—sometimes referred to as the NTA—which laid down the principles of free competition among the various transportation networks. The act proposed that free competition among railroads, trucking and shipping companies would be enough of a regulator to ensure that fair rates were being charged for the shipment of goods. The Minister of Transport now has largely discarded this concept as a suitable policy for the shipment of freight, and I quote from the May 1974 issue of the magazine Canadian Transportation and Distribution:

In 1967, at the time of the NTA's creation, Marchand supported the Act. Now, after almost two years as Transport Minister, and based on his experience, he insists that the Act's concept of regulation through competition is wrong for Canada: "not entirely wrong, but partially wrong—"

He maintains that it is wrong for the following reason: in a country as large as Canada, with its population mainly grouped in sectors, the concept of competition works in highly-populated areas (Central Canada) where there is competition to control rates and service, but it does not work in sparsely-populated areas (the Prairies) where there is hardly any or no competition and government is powerless to make it work.

The Minister has said:

We thought that this experiment (the NTA) would bring results in all regions, this has not happened. I am sure the CNR does not have competition in certain regions. The same applies to the CPR. Sometimes they agree not to have competition (between themselves).

As will be seen, the government's proposed freight policy rejects this principle of free competition. The main aspects of this policy, as set out in the Globe and Mail of June 13, 1974, are:

Freight rates based on transportation costs rather than on competition is the centerpiece of the new policy. It would establish freight rates based on the real cost of the service, and abolish rates that vary according to the value of what is shipped. The present system, in which it is cheaper to ship some goods such as steel from Hamilton to Vancouver than from Hamilton to Calgary would also be abolished. This move to standard railroad freight rates would be implemented gradually and would not affect the historic Crow's Nest Pass Agreement or the Maritime Freight Rate Assistance Act.

The passage of a Transportation Information Act requiring railway companies to disclose to the Government all the railway cost information it needs to formulate freight rate policies, to prevent inequities and to monitor the industry.

A proposal to create a crown corporation that would buy freight cars to be kept in reserve for leasing to the railways when exceptional need arises.

The upgrading and strengthening of rail road beds, particularly in Western Canada, some double tracking and eventual electrification of rail lines. It would also involve new roads, tracking and overpasses, and a more efficient traffic routing system in port areas.

The exact method and costs of implementing this policy have not yet been fully disclosed. A more detailed proposal is expected this fall after a current study of the freight situation, undertaken for the Ministry of Transport, is completed. This would help us to make a more in-depth evaluation of the new freight policy.

Let us now turn to the new railroad passenger policy proposed by the government. The main element of this policy calls for the establishment of a Canadian passenger transport corporation, a crown corporation, responsible for the operation of all inter-city passenger train service in Canada. This would take passenger service out of the hands of the publicly owned CNR and the privately owned CPR. The Canadian passenger transport corporation would acquire the railways' passenger train stock—approximately 1,900 cars in the two systems—and operate an integrated passenger train service. The new passenger policy, as is set out in the Globe and Mail report, would also:

Set up through the CPTC "high quality passenger bus service in areas not now well served by either trains or buses."

Bring into service high speed passenger trains in the corridor linking Quebec City, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto and Windsor. High-speed rail service would also be extended to the Atlantic Provinces and between paired cities such as Edmonton and Calgary.

Luxury transcontinental excursion trains would be established to supplement existing faster services.

Develop, buy or lease the most advanced railway technology to build in Canada high-quality, high-speed passenger vehicles, systems, equipment and machinery.

Greater emphasis to be placed on passenger-auto "piggyback" services. That is, more trains made available to carry passengers and their autos on trips.

At the time this policy package was announced, it was stated that it would likely be implemented in three phases. In Phase I, legislation would be passed and existing services would be improved—for example, by increasing the number of train services. In Phase II, a number of high speed trains would be put into operation. These would include an advanced model of a high speed train developed by a consortium of MLW-Worthington, Dofasco and Alcan. These new trains would take about two years to be put into service. In Phase III, which will come on stream in seven to ten years from now, new concepts of train travel will be put into effect. They will require, for example, a track that has no level crossings at any point and capable of taking trains moving at 150 miles an hour.

The costs of such a program are sizeable. It has been estimated that it will cost in the neighbourhood of $600 million in federal funds for Phase I and II over a five-year period, according to the Financial Post of July 6 last. No estimate was made of what Phase III will cost.

Before upgrading present services and operating high-speed trains, however, the new crown corporation would first have to barter for the more than 1,900 cars and locomotives now used in passenger service. To date there have been no negotiations with CN or CP over the price of this equipment. However, estimates of the price suggest that the cost will be high. The Financial Post article says:

CN and CP officials are talking in terms of $300,000 each for the more than 1,900 cars in their combined systems. If paid, this in itself would use most of the $600 million estimated for the entire (i.e. Phases I and II) program.

It should be noted that in the case of Canadian National the purchase of equipment would only involve a "book-keeping transaction," a transfer, as this railway is nationally owned. It is a crown corporation owned by the Government of Canada and answerable to Parliament.

Also awaiting discussion is the arrangement under which schedules and equipment owned by the crown corporation would be run on CN and CP tracks. In other words, how much will it cost? Will the corporation buy the railways' existing trackage outright, or will it lease running rights for a fee? In either case no mention has been made of what these costs will amount to. Also, the cost of the upkeep of passenger stations has yet to be determined. These factors will likely be the subject of hard bargaining between the corporation and the railways in the months ahead.

Criticisms have been levelled at the cost of this new policy. The estimates suggested here may prove to be much lower than the final figure. This is because today's estimates are based on today's prices, while many of the proposals have a lag time of at least two years. Also, studies on which these estimates are based are not all finished. It is too early to tell what the exact cost will be.

Apart from the cost, there have been other criticisms of this policy. The first of these centres on the fact that it would merely be playing into the hands of the railways to nationalize passenger service. The passenger services of both railroads have been a money-losing proposition for a number of years. The federal government has been underwriting uneconomic passenger services with subsidies. Under the National Transportation Act of 1967, Ottawa underwrites 80 per cent of all losses. By taking over this service, it is argued, Ottawa is merely helping the railways rid themselves of a money-losing segment of their operations. The critics feel that Ottawa should not nationalize only the passenger segment of the railroads, but also their profitable segments—the freight and real estate operations—as well. Other critics feel that Ottawa should force the railways to use their own profits from lucrative freight and land development divisions to maintain and expand “adequate passenger services.” The net rail income of the CPR totalled $32 million in 1973, according to the annual report.

The Globe and Mail of June 20 last says:

The Canadian Pacific was established to unite Canada. Because it was recognized that the rail service would be a losing proposition, it was given vast tracts of valuable land on which it has developed profitable commercial, industrial and resource complexes. All these profitable endeavors it has split off from the railway services themselves, and been allowed to do so by a succession of governments. The subsidies they were supposed to provide to the rail services go into shareholders' pockets while CP asks and gets new subsidies. As for CN, it is a nationally owned railway system.

Mr. Trudeau is not talking about transportation policy. He is talking about bailing the railway companies out of a service they no longer wish to give.

Another factor that has worried critics is the form the new integrated passenger transportation service will take. That is to say, what routes will be maintained, what new ones will be opened up, and what routes will be abandoned? To date no specifics have been mentioned as to what new routes will be opened up. Until this is done, of course, no analysis of their location can be made.

The question of rail lines has been the object of a great deal of concern over the last few years, especially in the west. While no announcements have been made as to what, if any, rail lines might be abandoned, this could conceivably come about with the integration of train services. This being the case, it would do well for us to look at some of the possible implications of rail line abandonment on communities in the west.

One probable effect would be the weakening of the economic base of the community involved. This relates to those members of the local labour force who depend upon the railway for their employment. If railroad employment is cut out of a town, and employees are forced to leave the area to seek alternative employment, the economic base of the town could be severely damaged. To take the example of towns like Jasper and Edson, such a move would be a terrific blow to the economic base of those towns. The removal of this group of people would likely have an appreciable effect upon the regional demand for retail sales and services. Also, if the employees affected by rail closure were forced to move and offer their homes for sale, and there were no buyers, the local tax revenues would decline.

Another area which would show a decline if the railways were to abandon lines is that of municipal property tax assessment. In many of the towns on the rail lines, local tax revenues depend heavily on the assessment of railway right-of-way properties and buildings. For example, the town of Banff depends for 45 per cent of its tax revenue on income from the CPR. In some instances communities depend 100 per cent on the assessment of railway property and buildings for municipal assessment revenue. This is especially true of the smaller communities, which depend more on railway rights-of-way for their municipal assessment revenues than do the larger centres.

The end result of this weakened economic base is that there would likely be an increase in the rural-to-urban shift in population that has been taking place in much of western Canada. Some towns could literally die due to the removal of funds now derived from the railways.

Another impact of abandonment concerns those people who use railroad facilities. Abandonment would mean that the present users of rail lines would have to look elsewhere and to other modes for transportation services. Passengers would have to rely on private automobiles or buses more heavily than they now do. Also, it would mean travelling further distances to centres which have rail lines in order to use the passenger railway. Although the new policy stresses the implementation of bus services for areas with poor rail service, abandonment would make this mandatory if small centres are to have adequate passenger transportation. This, in effect, has the same result as the previous one, namely, that of shifting the population of smaller centres to larger growth nodes.

These, then, are some of the implications of rail line abandonment on small communities. There has been no indication to date that abandonments will take place, or how the transcontinental services will be integrated. But it would be well to consider carefully the effects that such moves would have when or if the time comes for implementation. Without a careful study of the implications of abandonment, many communities could be left without adequate transportation facilities and revenue in the future.

[Senator Cameron.]

Honourable senators, to summarize, we have seen here the government's proposed new policy for freight and passenger rail transportation in Canada. The new freight policy centres on basing freight rates on transport costs rather than the old policy of free competition. It also calls for the upgrading of the freight handling system. The new passenger policy calls for the establishment of a crown corporation to operate and integrate all inter-city train transportation in Canada. This, in effect, would result in a partial nationalization of the railway systems. In the case of the CNR, which is already publicly-owned, it would involve the shifting of the passenger service from the existing crown corporation—that is, the CNR—to the new one, the Canadian passenger transport corporation. In the case of the CPR the shift would be more dramatic. It would involve the nationalizing of the passenger services of a privately-owned company. The other railroad operations would be left with the company. In addition to this passenger service takeover, the policy also calls for a general upgrading over the years of the entire passenger train system.

What I have endeavoured to present here is really the bare bones of a proposed new transportation policy. The specifics have not yet been set down by the government in enough detail to allow for a thorough analysis of it. There are some questions that need answering before such an analysis can take place, and these include:

What are the real costs of this new policy likely to be (i.e. for both freight and passenger)?

What formula will be used in the new policy of basing freight rates on transport costs rather than free competition?

What new routes are proposed for the extended passenger service?

Will integration of passenger services mean abandonment of certain rail lines?

What type of fare structures will be charged for the newer, high-speed train services?

Without answers to such questions the policy will continue to be vague. More detailed proposals are expected to be released by the government this fall. These may provide us with a better basis for a policy evaluation.

There is also some question about the rationale of taking over only one aspect of the railways' services. It would seem more feasible to nationalize the whole system in order to attain overall control of the railways. More thought and study should be given to this before a definite policy is established.

These, honourable senators, are some of the issues we will be concerned with in looking at transportation policy in the days to come. I thought that this would be an appropriate time and place to make some of these suggestions, and I hope that in the days to come you may have an opportunity to study them, criticize them, and amend and enrich them.

SENATE CHAMBER

AUTHORITY TO PHOTOGRAPH PAINTING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, a request has been received by the Speaker of the Senate on behalf of Heritage Publishing Company of Geneva, Switzerland, who are in the process of publishing books on the various Scottish clans. They would like to include in these books a reproduction of the painting of the Royal Canadian Engineers landing in Europe, which is the painting to my left at the far end of the chamber. I understand that no colour transparencies or photographs of this painting are presently available.

Accordingly, permission is requested for a photographer to take a photograph of the painting at a time convenient to the Senate, and for publication of the photograph in the books produced by the Heritage Publishing Company. Does the Senate grant the requested permission?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, perhaps it should be pointed out that the crown copyright in these paintings is held by the National Gallery, and permission would be required from the National Gallery for reproduction.

SENATE REFORM

NEWSPAPER ARTICLE—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on Thursday last Senator Grosart asked a series of questions on the subject of reform of this chamber. I know that all members of this house have considered on many occasions ways in which the Senate can be made an even more effective assembly. No formal discussions have been held between the Prime Minister and myself on the subject of Senate reform, although we have had, quite understandably, informal and speculative discussions about the role of the Senate and the work of those who serve here. Consequently I am unable to comment further until and unless government policy with respect to this particular subject is developed and announced. Of course, I assure honourable members that along the way the views of all members will be earnestly solicited.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, October 3, consideration of His Excellency the Administrator's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Senator Neiman, seconded by Senator Côtteau, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, I think you are very well aware that I have never much liked those cosy comfortable pleasantries of mutual praise which take up so much time in the debates in this house. We complain often here that the press pays little attention to our deliberations. I think I can say to you that if we had less in this house of this stifling decorum, and engaged more in the cut and thrust of debate, the press would be beating a path to our galleries.

As you know, in Britain the best debates take place in the House of Lords, and there they actually have less power than we have here. Nevertheless, if you read the Times regularly you will see that the House of Lords gets space equal to, if not more than, that of the Commons, and that is simply because the debates are good. They do not waste their time in those comfortable phrases of mutual praise. They go on to the cut and thrust of debate in dealing with the question before the house.

Having said that, honourable senators, I must—

Senator Walker: Cut and thrust.

Senator O'Leary: —I must admit I have to sin against my own convictions by saying a word about the new Speaker of the house, Madame le Président.

I have known our new Speaker, and her reputation in my craft, for many years. But although ours is a cannibalistic profession, I did take a liking to her as soon as she came to this house. In fact, I listened to her speeches only to wonder how the good Lord, who knew how to create a creature of such grace and talent, could then have permitted her to betray herself into such a hideous political philosophy. However, that is all gone and past now, and I think I can say, having watched her since she took the Chair, that we in this house will find that the wisdom, grace, charm and good-natured impartiality of her beloved predecessor is not going to be lost to us.

And now, Mr. Leader of the Government, will you permit me to address a word to you, and about you? You have come to us not as a political novice. The great John Bright, when he wrote letters to his adversaries—or at least to some of them—always ended by saying, “Yours, with whatever respect is due to you, John Bright.” I think this is the proper attitude to take towards the new leader of this house. Or course, we will give him the respect due to his position and to himself, but nevertheless I am sure he is prepared to be on trial. So far as I am concerned, I will always want to hear him and listen to him, but he is out on suspended sentence.

I suppose somebody will soon ask, “Why don't you come to the Speech from the Throne?” Before I do that—and here I am again sinning against my convictions—I do want to say a word about our former leader, Senator Paul Martin.

Senator Martin and I have been political foes and warm personal friends for more than 40 years. I remember in the old days, when things in Canada were a little better than they are now, I used to be called upon in elections to go up to Pembroke, which is Senator Martin's home town, and tell the good people, as I always did, how much better off

Canada would be if we turned the Grit rascals out and put in my party instead. I always spoke in the old armouries in Pembroke on a Saturday night. I remember on two occasions, when Mr. Mackenzie King was going up to speak at noon and I was going up to speak the same evening, that I went up in his private car with him, with dear old Andy Thompson, who was a warhorse of the Liberal Party. But what I did find in Pembroke was that Senator Martin was a prophet in his own community, and that is a good sign.

Because I keep my pipelines, even with a Grit government, good, I happen to know where he is going, but wherever he is going, even if I am wrong, I feel certain that he will represent Canada with credit and distinction, and will certainly never let Canada down.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator O'Leary: Now I have to come to the Speech from the Throne. There is not much that can be said about it. Senator Grosart the other day, I thought, was a bit too kindly but, as usual, he said all that can be said about this Speech. He was ably backed up by Senator Neiman, who made one of the most extraordinary speeches I have ever heard from a mover of the motion for an Address.

Speaking again of the Speech from the Throne, they used to say of William Jennings Bryan that his speeches were somewhat like the River Platte, long and winding but never deep, and often not even meaningful. This is true of this Speech from the Throne. If you do not wish to take the word of Senator Grosart and some other Conservatives, I ask you to read what was written the other day in the Montreal Star by a highly respected Liberal journalist, Mr. W. A. Wilson, the Ottawa editor of the Montreal Star. Mr. Wilson said the Speech could be summed up as double talk and double think, there was nothing in it, that you could search it in vain for any evidence of the government's being prepared to grapple with the one vital issue before the country. This, I think, is true.

My own opinion of the Speech—and I have read it and re-read it—is that actually it is a hodge-podge of inconsequential things. They have placed in there a lot of tidbits, a lot of small things which I am sure are merely to distract public attention from the fact that the real vital issues of the country have been played down.

I searched in vain, for example, to find one word in it about the just society. What has happened to that? There is not a word about it in the Speech from the Throne and, incidentally, hardly a word about it in all the speeches of Liberal candidates during the last unfortunate election. More than that, not a word about “the land is strong.” When I find that this Speech is more remarkable for what it does not say than for what it does, and when I find all the war cries, slogans and shibboleths of the Liberal Party cast into discard, I think of a verse they used to sing in England a few years ago about a wayward lass who found out too late that men betray.

Oh no, we never mention her,
Her name is never heard,
Our lips are now forbid to speak,
That once familiar word.

No "just society," no "the land is great," no "free trade." Nothing but a procession of words and phrases, meaningless and inconsequential.

I am interested in foreign affairs. I would like to know what the government's policy is on foreign affairs. One had the spectacle the other day of Mr. Ivan Head, who seems to imagine himself as a mini-Kissinger, coming out to tell the country that the foreign policy of Canada was going to be changed. He said it is going to be an activist policy, an activist policy going leftward. What happened? The Prime Minister came out and said, "This man is not my Charlie McCarthy. He doesn't know what he is talking about."

This is what goes on in this government all the time. You never know what is happening because you never get them all saying the same thing at the same time.

I am sure all honourable senators remember the story of Lord Melbourne. Melbourne was leaving the Cabinet before they had finished discussing a certain measure. He said, "Gentlemen, what is it? I don't care what it is, but we must all say the same thing."

But they don't all say the same thing in this ministry. There is now the case of Mr. Whelan and Mr. Ouellet. Mr. Whelan came out one day and told Mrs. Plumptre that she was talking too much and didn't know what she was talking about, whereupon Mr. Ouellet, with a Gallic gallantry, let us say, stood up and told Mr. Whelan that he was talking too much and to leave this good lady alone.

It is true that Mrs. Plumptre had dropped quite a few handkerchiefs for Mr. Ouellet, but nevertheless this is the state of the Cabinet. You never know what they are saying, who is saying it, or who has authority to say it—and this is not good enough in a democratic country.

I want to say, before going any further, that the leader mentioned something about Senate reform and said he had not consulted the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister, however, did speak about Senate reform in the House of Commons. He said he was going to see to it in the future that when a Tory senator died he would replace him by a Tory. So Mr. Trudeau apparently does not believe in freezing prices and incomes, but he does believe in freezing the Tory minority in the Senate. If I die—and I will probably be one of the first—he will replace me with another Tory. So on that scale we are never going to get above the 17 members we have here now unless we have another election soon. That is a dangerous proposition. It is turning this chamber into a one-party chamber.

But there is something worse than that. The Prime Minister said that he had in mind a bill, a measure of some kind, whereby the Senate would be deprived of its right to kill bills. He would give us only suspensive power. What does that mean? Surely it means that at any time Mr. Trudeau could use his majority in the House of Commons to pass a bill abolishing the Senate, send it here, and the Senate would have to accept it. What else could it mean? If it doesn't mean that, it means nothing at all—unless his bill provided, as a special case, that the question of the Senate would not be included. But if he means what he seems to mean, he can within the next year, or the next two years, have his majority in the House of Commons pass a bill abolishing this house, send that bill over here, and this house could not reject it.

Senator Beaubien: What do you mean?

Senator O'Leary: Well, this is as clear as crystal, surely. If anyone doesn't know what it means, he must be pretty stupid. This is what it means. It can't mean anything else. We will only have, he says, suspensive power—the same as the House of Lords. So if we can only suspend legislation, we could not kill or reject a bill which might be sent over here, passed by his majority, to end the Senate forever. I do not know what else he could have meant. If the Leader of the Government in the Senate tells me he did not mean that, well and good, but he says he has not discussed the matter with the Prime Minister at all.

Honourable senators, I listened the other day with great care to the Leader of the Government when he introduced a number of bills in this house. I disagree with this. This house was never created to introduce and pass bills to help the other house. This house was created as a review body, a chamber of sober second thought, as they called it. It is not our business to be introducing bills, and I object to it. I also object to this chamber being turned into an investigative body. We are not going to be turned into a series of royal commissions. It was never intended that this would happen, and it should not happen.

The Leader of the Government spoke of our going out to the provinces and talking to them about provincial rights. Honourable senators, can you imagine a number of senators turning themselves into sort of nomads and going all over the country telling the provinces what should happen to them? What would have happened had such a delegation of senators gone out to tell that sort of thing to Mr. Bennett when he was Premier of British Columbia? What would happen if we went out and talked with Mr. Barrett, or even with Mr. Lougheed in Alberta, or with any of the provincial premiers? Do you think a delegation of senators would have gotten anywhere with Mr. Lesage when he raised his cry of "maître chez-nous?" Do you think a delegation of senators should go to Quebec and tell Mr. Bourassa what he should be doing about Bill 22? That is not a practical thing; it is not a sensible thing. It is not the function of the Senate at all.

We had the Honourable Lazarus Phillips as a member of this house a few years ago. I think he was the greatest senator I have known since I came here. When Senator Phillips was leaving this house he made a charming farewell speech. I would ask the Leader of the Government to read that speech, to read what Senator Phillips said as to what he found out about the Senate and what he thought was its true function. He did not say that the Senate should become a series of royal commissions; he did not say we should set up investigative bodies on this, that and the other thing. He said the real function of the Senate is to see that the rights and the liberties of the individual are protected.

Sir Clifford Sifton, who was a giant with the Liberal Party in days gone by, said that the real function of the Senate, the true function of the Senate, was to protect the Executive against the growing power of the bureaucracy, and that is true.

We say we review legislation here. But do we? How much review, how much examination do we give orders in council—and orders in council are the real administration, the real government of this country? Thousands of these orders in council are passed all the time. Do we look them over to see that they are in the interests of Canada? We do not. Do we look to see what delegation of power they contain—and we all know that powers are delegated to bureaus, commissions, and so on, and so on? This is really what we should be doing.

It is true that the Senate is here to protect, as far as possible, the rights of the provinces, but it is here mainly to protect the rights of the individual. That is our task, above all—that, and to see to it that powers being delegated to the bureaucrats by orders in council are not abused. We know that such cases have occurred. We have found out about them, especially in the Immigration Department, where delegated authority was abused, where those people took on powers they were never given at all. These are the things we should be looking into.

I am, of course, in favour of standing committees. But I do not believe that this body should be changed from what it was intended to be, namely, a review body, into an investigative house sending people all over Canada trying to discover things and reporting things. I think it was Mr. Disraeli who once said that royal commissions discovered what everybody already knew.

The other day the Leader of the Government told us of the great good that had accrued from investigations the Senate had carried out. I ask Senator Croll now whether all, or even most, of the recommendations of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty were accepted? There have been a few cases, of course, when we did influence legislation, but if anyone tells me that in the twelve years I have been in this house investigations carried out by this house, or by any special committee of this house, have really influenced in a meaningful way the legislation of the government, I will tell him that he has not read the story aright.

I would like to see this house with standing committees that would ensure that our bureaucrats—who, as we all know, are the real governors of this country—are brought before the Senate and made to explain why and how they get their ministers to present certain legislation. I know this is a fact in Ottawa. I have been here 60 years and I know something of how the civil service works. I know that when there is a change of government in this country and a new minister goes into his portfolio, certain gentlemen in the department, who may not like him or agree with him, keep back from him facts that he should have, and determine the character of the legislation in consequence. This is the sort of thing we should be examining, not running all over Canada trying to find out this, that and the other thing. To begin with, we are not equipped to do it, and we have no guarantee at all that our findings will be accepted.

I happen myself to have been chairman of a royal commission. Were my recommendations accepted? They are talking about accepting them now. My recommendations were not then accepted for the simple reason that Mr. Luce had great power with the Congress and the State Department, and there is scarcely any doubt that word came to us in Canada if we touched Time and Reader's Digest something unpleasant would happen to us in Washington. My honourable friend Senator Hayden knows something about this. I think he even introduced and defended it, and he always defends even a bad cause well. The fact of the matter is that Time and Reader's Digest made Mr. Luce an honorary citizen of Canada so that his papers would get the same treatment that Canadian papers received. Those two publications are not Canadian papers. Everybody knows this. They are getting those special privileges simply because they had power at Washington, and Washington had influence with us.

[Senator O'Leary.]

These are the sorts of things the Senate should be looking into. Why bother about carrying on these lengthy, interminable and costly experiments, with visits here, there and everywhere, giving people trips? I do not believe in that sort of thing. Let us have our standing committees. Let the standing committees carry out the work this Senate was created to carry out, the work of seeing to it that legislation does not injure the individual—or a province, for that matter. But let us not get this silly notion that we can send ten or fifteen people to British Columbia, Manitoba, Alberta, Quebec, or what have you, and tell them what we are going to do for the provinces. We have no power to do anything for the provinces. There are bound to be negotiations between the governments concerned, and to say that this Senate is to exercise its true function by going into the country and telling the provinces what we may do for them, and what we should do for them, is utter nonsense.

Honourable senators, I do not wish to go on for very long on the Speech from the Throne. However, I take this question seriously. I think this Senate is a great body. There is no question about it in my mind. I want to add quite frankly that not all the appointments made here by Mr. Trudeau have been bad appointments. He has made some excellent appointments. I am looking at three or four of them now who are very good. He did make some that are very bad. However, he is changing this house into a one-party chamber. If he goes on with his supposed or alleged intention of replacing a Tory burial with a Tory appointment, then for as long as he remains in power we will have only seventeen members in a chamber of 102. What sort of a democracy is that?

Rightly or wrongly, this house was set up as a two-party chamber. This may have been a mistake, but this was the structure. All along there were men who saw the weakness of that and tried to get rid of it. I have heard some unsophisticated journalists express surprise that Mr. Trudeau appointed a good senator like Senator Lawson, for example; they remarked what a change this was. My friends, Sir John A. Macdonald appointed Liberals to the Senate. He appointed people to the Senate who disagreed with him violently, such as Peter Mitchell. Sir Robert Borden appointed M. J. O'Brien, a powerful Liberal industrialist, to the Senate. Mr. R. B. Bennett, when he was Prime Minister, appointed Patrick Burns of Calgary to this house. Mr. St. Laurent appointed John Hackett, one of the most distinguished Liberals in the country.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh!

Senator O'Leary: One of the most distinguished Conservatives in the country. I think I should have said "liberal," because most Conservatives are more liberal-minded than people you find on the other side of the house. When I go—which will not be too long, my doctor tells me—I hope the Prime Minister will appoint a good liberal-Conservative in my place, not somebody who can play the fiddle, and not some professional person who knows nothing about the democratic process. I want a good partisan to take my place, and if they appoint a good Conservative he will probably be the best liberal in the chamber.

I am not going to keep you any longer, honourable senators. I have perhaps said too much. I think I will go home, go to bed and read a bit of poetry. Thank you very much.

[Translation]

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey: Honourable senators, first I would like to add my little contribution to the congratulations already extended in such masterly manner by several speakers who preceded me to our distinguished Speaker.

We just lost a first-class Speaker of quite extraordinary capacity, competence and charm, and it is already obvious that we have in her successor a Speaker who possesses exactly the same assets and to the same degree—a very worthy successor to our distinguished former Speaker, Senator Fergusson.

I join all the other senators who congratulated not only Her Honour our present Speaker but also our former Speaker, Senator Fergusson.

[English]

In the second place, I should also like to offer my congratulations to the new Leader of the Government, for whom I have a rather special affection, shall I say. I took some minor part in the 1972 election and appeared in his constituency. During that election I appeared in thirteen constituencies, of which we lost ten. I am sorry to say that one of the constituencies in which I appeared and which we lost was that of the present Leader of the Government, but there we came nearer not losing than in most of the others. So I have that rather special affection for him, because I do not think I did him as much harm as I did the others. I believe that he has already shown that he is going to be a very distinguished leader of this house.

[Translation]

I feel that, through his eloquence, he has already proved his French origin. Though he does not speak French, his eloquence is that of a French Canadian: who could say more?

● (2040)

I want also to pay my small tribute to what I suppose is my oldest friend in this chamber, our former Leader Senator Martin. I cannot really add anything to the words that have already been said about him, except to say that I perhaps feel a rather special regret that I understand he will shortly not be among us any more. Because I have known him so long and I have admired him so much, though I have criticized him on many occasions in the past very strongly—and, I might add, I don't take back a word of it; I think he was quite wrong in those days—I have a very special feeling of respect, regard and admiration for him.

Unlike Senator O'Leary I have no pipeline to the inner circles of the present government and I don't know where Senator Martin is going next. But like Senator O'Leary I am perfectly confident that wherever he goes he will do honour to himself, honour to the government, honour to this chamber and honour to the country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Forsey: I should like to express also my regret that Senator Choquette has laid aside the burden of the deputy leadership of his party, which he carried with such distinction. I remember in particular an occasion when he delivered a really masterly speech in criticism of the report of the Joint Committee on the Constitution. I was delighted to see the other day that when somebody said, "Well, we shall not hear so much from you now as formerly," or words to that effect, he said, "Don't be too sure. Just wait." I am glad to think that we will continue to have from Senator Choquette the same distinguished contributions as we have had in the past to the debates in this house. His successor, Senator Grosart, is, of course, a host in himself.

Senator O'Leary lamented the small number of Conservative senators in this house. I also lament it. I have again and again supported the Leader of the Opposition and other Conservative senators who have urged that the present government should appoint more Conservative senators, for reasons which they set forth with great cogency and distinction.

Senator Walker: They did that when they appointed you. You were a Conservative at that time. You have never been since.

Senator Forsey: I thank the Honourable Senator Walker for that, but I am afraid that my political complexion is a somewhat dubious one. I suspect that the Conservatives think I am an arrant traitor; the NDP likewise; and the Liberals suspect that I am either a hidden Conservative or a hidden NDP'er, and they are not quite sure of me at all.

Senator Walker: They may all be right.

Senator Forsey: They may all be right? Perhaps so. I remember once meeting a certain provincial judge in Quebec who said to me, by way of introduction:

[Translation]

I am a judge for one reason only, because I am a personal friend of Maurice Duplessis.

[English]

I remember a remark I made to the present Prime Minister, that somebody might say after my appointment:

[Translation]

"There is only one reason why he is a senator and it is because he is a personal friend of Pierre Trudeau."

[English]

I am glad to say the Prime Minister shook his head and said, "Je crois que non."

I simply want to say how delighted I am that Senator Grosart will be making his splendid contributions to the work of this house in this new position in which he will carry an extra responsibility and in which perhaps his words will acquire even greater weight than they have had in the past from their intrinsic merit.

That really concludes my list of congratulations and kind words, of which in general Senator O'Leary spoke with such scorn, though he hastened, of course, to admit that he was transgressing his own rule.

I should like, however, to say also how much I look forward to the contribution that will be made by our two new senators from Nova Scotia. We have already had from Senator Cottreau an excellent speech seconding the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, a speech in which he has displayed—

[Translation]

... the distinctive qualities of the Acadian people in Nova Scotia.

[English]

I also enjoyed very much the distinguished speech—perhaps I have used that word too often tonight; shall I say, with Senator O'Leary, the extraordinary speech?—of Senator Neiman, moving the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. It was a most refreshing change from the unending series of congratulations to a government which we usually get by the mover of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. It was a critical speech. It was a critical speech in the proper sense of the term. It was a speech which showed the kind of independence of mind which should characterize members of this house on whichever side of the aisle they sit. It was not an attack upon the government, but it was, on the other hand, not simply one of those sugary, syrupy, saccharine hymns of praise of everything that the government says and does, which sometimes, I am afraid, one is apt to get, perhaps simply out of a sense of courtesy, from movers of Addresses in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

Senator O'Leary trailed his coat in all directions. I was greatly tempted to follow him in some of these directions. I was greatly tempted to take up his challenge to make this house more one of the cut and thrust of debate. However, time is getting on. I am notoriously loquacious. I remember when I first came in here that at a very early stage my friend Senator Croll, perhaps regretting that he was one of those who introduced me formally, said to me, "You are too verbose. You're too wordy." I have tried to bear his words in mind since and to restrain my natural loquacity, but I have to be very careful or my tongue will run away with me.

There are just two points on which I should like to follow up what Senator O'Leary said. One is his surprising objection to the introduction of bills in this house. The British North America Act clearly envisages the possibility of bills being introduced in this house, because it specifically says that money bills cannot be introduced in this house. By implication, therefore, it surely assumes that other bills can be and will be introduced in this house. I was the more surprised by Senator O'Leary saying this, because I distinctly remember—my memory for past political events is not as all-encompassing as Senator O'Leary's, nor as faithful, nor as accurate, but even within my limited memory I can distinctly recall—that in the days when Mr. Bennett was Prime Minister of Canada a very considerable number of very important bills were introduced first in this house. My recollection is that an enormous, vast, voluminous and extraordinarily complicated, important bill revising the Canada Shipping Act was introduced in this house and received most of its consideration in this house and a relatively small amount in the other house. I am not absolutely sure of that last, but I know it was introduced here and discussed here at great length, and went through most of the serious process of consideration here rather than in the other house and before the other house ever saw it at all.

I don't think there is anything demeaning to this house in initiating legislation. I don't think there is anything demeaning in our saving the time of the other house by considering here bills which are not controversial in a partisan sense but are perhaps rather technical. They may be controversial as between experts in a particular field. Here we have such a vast reservoir of experience and of particular expertise that it seems to me some of these bills can be most profitably, most valuably considered here, and the time of the House of Commons can be available for bills which are rather matters of acrid public controversy and partisan controversy. That is the kind of thing which the House of Commons more particularly exists for, and if we can do up here much of what you might call the technical work on more or less technical bills, often of enormous importance, then so much the better. I can't see anything wrong with that at all. I suppose you can say that in that case it is the sober first thought rather than the sober second thought; but I doubt very much whether Sir John A. Macdonald would have been prepared to go to the stake for the single adjective "second." I think he would have taken perfectly cheerfully the fact of the Senate dealing first with legislation, more particularly legislation of the kind I have indicated. I really must go and look up the precedents and see just how much Sir John A. Macdonald's governments used to introduce here in the first place. I suspect there was a great deal of legislation introduced here in the first place then, if only because, in the first cabinet after Confederation, of the 13 members, five were in this house, and most of them held portfolios; and down to 1896 every single portfolio in the cabinet, with the single exception of finance, had been held by a senator, including the premiership, as we all know, on two occasions. So I doubt very much whether Senator O'Leary's political theory on this subject would stand the test of historical investigation, but I may be wrong. Anybody who ventures to question Senator O'Leary on a matter of history is putting his head into the lion's jaws.

The other thing that Senator O'Leary said that I want to deal with very briefly was this business of Senate scrutiny of subordinate legislation—orders in council, and that sort of thing. All I have to say about that is that this is to be one of the functions of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, and at this point I'm inclined to exclaim, Hinc illae lacrimae—"Hence these tears"—remembering all the trials and tribulations through which we passed as members of that committee last year. But I am happy to inform the house that once the committee is re-appointed, which I hope will be soon, thanks to the Trojan labours of our regular staff, and the six senior students of law whom we took on during the summer, there is an immense amount of material collected—enough, so our counsel tells me, to keep the committee busy once a week as far ahead as we can see, and certainly all through this session. So I wish to warn anyone who expects to be on that committee—and I haven't the faintest idea whether I'll be on it myself—but I wish to warn anybody who expects to be on that committee there will be plenty of work to do, and that the committee will have before it a most thorough documentation on an enormous number of orders in council and other regulations which, in the opinion of our committee staff, deserve the scrutiny of the committee, and, if the committee sees fit, the scrutiny, later, of one house or the other, or both. I wish to add only that I expect that a great deal of the work of this committee will in fact be done by the Senate members, partly because the Senate membership will probably be more stable, partly because the Senate membership will perhaps, in many instances, be much more experienced and expert in scrutinizing these things, and partly because perhaps we have rather more time to spend on a matter of this sort—and I quite agree with Senator O'Leary that it is of the most enormous importance—than the members of the Commons ordinarily have.

[Translation]

There were some matters I had decided—this afternoon—to raise tonight, but I have changed my mind.

I shall therefore limit myself to three subjects: perhaps one of them is of little consequence, which is not the case for the other two.

[English]

First of all, I want to raise the question again of the missing portrait of a former leader of this house, a dear friend of many years' standing of both Senator O'Leary and myself, and doubtless of other senators here, and leader of the party in which I was brought up and to which I returned for the years 1962 to 1967.

Senator Walker: Which one was that?

Senator Forsey: The Right Honourable Arthur Meighen.

Some 15 months ago a lunatic—I'm glad my words are privileged here, because the man might sue me, otherwise; but, well, shall I say an eccentric—burst like a bomb into the House of Commons, scattering papers and shouting loudly, and in the process of getting in there he somehow or other managed to damage very badly the portrait of Mr. Meighen, which was on the wall just outside the House of Commons chamber, and the frame of the portrait.

Last March 26 I addressed to the then Leader of the Government in this house an inquiry, about what was happening to restore this portrait, which was still missing, and I was told that the craftsmen required to do this kind of work were in very short supply, that the few who existed were extraordinarily busy, that they had a huge backlog of work but that he hoped the matter would be dealt with in due course, or words to that effect. It was March 27 that I got that answer. I went down this afternoon to refresh my memory and make sure I was not going to say something that was without foundation, and I found the portrait was still missing—the portrait of this pre-eminent parliamentarian, probably the greatest parliamentarian this country has ever seen—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Forsey: —and one of the very few to have distinguished himself equally in the other place and here. The portrait is still missing. I asked the people in the parliamentary library to find out for me when it was that this eccentric character burst into the House of Commons and did this damage. It was on or about June 21, 1973. Well, I don't know how few these craftsmen may be who are capable of repairing the damage. I don't know how large a backlog of work they have. But it seems to me very strange that a whole 15 months could elapse without this portrait being restored; and if the portrait had been so badly damaged that it cannot be restored, then I think the government of the country should approach the Meighen family and ask to be allowed to have a copy made of the portrait—the identical portrait—which, to the best of my recollection, is in the possession of the family in Toronto. I can't help—and here the old Tory Adam, I suppose, peeps out—I can't help suspecting, honourable senators, that if the portrait had been a portrait of Mr. Mackenzie King the repairs would have been performed with a great deal more celerity, and the portrait would months and months ago have been hanging in its accustomed place. This may be an unworthy suspicion, but I can't help feeling there may be some grounds for it, and I hope these rather bitter words will sink into the mind of the Leader of the Government, and the responsible people on the government side, and that this shocking gap on the wall over there by the other chamber will be filled, as it ought to be filled. I am really very gravely and deeply disturbed about this, and I cannot refrain from using rather—perhaps unduly—strong language about it.

I want to say something now, briefly, about this business of Senate reform.

We are to have shortly before us, I think—well, pretty soon, I suppose, anyway—a single bill on this subject; a modest bill, but a good bill; and on this I think I shall have the support of honourable gentlemen immediately to my right, because this particular bill simply embodies a proposal made by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition last session, and, I think, the session before, namely, a proposal to add two senators to this chamber representing the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories. So far so good. I don't think anybody is likely to object to that except possibly some people from the NDP, who think there ought not to be any senators at all, and who, when this matter came up once before, expressed themselves in most unsuitable and discourteous terms, saying—one of them—I think, that nobody in the Territories with any self-respect would accept a senatorship. I couldn't help wondering, again, in a cynical frame of mind, perhaps, whether it might not turn out that there were a number of people in the Northwest Territories who, by this test, would be lacking in self-respect and would be quite willing to accept a seat in this house. Anyway, here's this proposal. That's the only piece of legislation which so far has issued from the government on the subject of Senate reform. I think that is something all of us can accept without a tremor, and I think, indeed, with some pleasure. But the only other proposals were sketched out by the Prime Minister the other day, and I am inclined to agree with Senator O'Leary that they leave something to be desired. I don't think that I should go quite as far as he did in the matter, but I am dubious about them. I don't think really that there is any reasonable ground for the Honourable Senator Grosart's suggestion that the provinces ought to have been consulted about these changes. There is certainly, to my mind, no question at all that legally, under the provisions of section 91, head (1), of the British North America Act the Parliament of Canada can do anything it likes to the Senate by an ordinary act of Parliament, just as easily as it can pass an amendment to the Criminal Code or a bill dealing with trademarks or whatever you like.

But I am uneasy about two features of this proposal. One is this business of the suspensive veto. I admit that when the Joint Committee on the Constitution made its recommendations on the subject of the Senate, I did not dissent from them and the suspensive veto is in there. But sometimes one reflects after the event and begins to wonder whether one's initial position was altogether well-founded, and I personally should like to see a very great deal of very careful thought given to this business of the suspensive veto and especially in the regard that Senator O'Leary noted. If we are to have this chamber abolished, it seems to me that it must be only after a very, very careful process and it must be perfectly evident that this is really the will of the country. Very rarely, indeed, in many years has a government in the other place enjoyed the support of half the electorate. I think the only two cases in which, since 1917, the government won more than half the popular vote were in 1940 and 1958. So that the mere fact that there may be a large majority over there carrying something through the house does not mean necessarily that the whole country wants it. It does seem to me quite possible that you might find the other place passing a measure for the abolition of the Senate and a frightful outcry against this measure in large parts of the country. Then I think we should be perfectly justified in saying, "We won't pass this thing until it has been made perfectly clear, perhaps by a general election, that this is the real desire of the country." This house took that position on the Borden Naval Aid Bill of 1913, and I think it was, in retrospect, amply justified in doing so. So I think that this business of the suspensive veto needs very careful consideration and I am not as ready to open my mouth, shut my eyes and swallow it as I was a year or so ago. There is something to be said for it, but there is also something to be said against it.

As for this proposal of a seven-year term, renewable, so to speak, on good behaviour, the difficulty is, who is to judge the good behaviour? The danger is that it would be the government of the day which would make the decision. I don't wish to be unduly cynical, but it seems to me that there would be a temptation for any government of either party to say, "Well, that man has been pretty obstreperous; he has been a nuisance, and we don't think he ought to be re-appointed." There might also be a tendency on the part of some honourable senators, especially those coming near the end of their seven-year term, to keep an eye cocked over their shoulder to see how what they said and did was going down with the powers that be in office at the time. Perhaps I should not be so suspicious, but I have been careful to say that I think that this might apply to governments of both parties and I think also to senators of both parties. I am afraid there is a certain human weakness in most of us, and it might be open to temptation, and therefore I am a little dubious about that particular proposal also.

I should have been much more happy about the suggestions for Senate reform if they had incorporated some of the other proposals which were in the report of the Joint Parliamentary Committee on the Constitution, which would have added materially to the strength of this house and would not have been open to the kind of objections that this particular proposal is.

I don't know where it came from, and I don't know how seriously it is intended—it may be merely a kite that is being flown to test the wind—but I for one am prepared to look with a very critical eye at any proposal of this sort that comes before us, and I hope that nobody will accuse me, as I have occasionally been accused before by people in the party to my right, of being too eager to display my loyalty to the government. This is a subject on which I think we should all be prepared to show a good deal of independence of mind.

Now, finally—and honourable senators will be relieved to know that I am coming towards the end, although they may feel that I am like some of the old-fashioned preachers who said, "To conclude," and then, "In conclusion," and then, "Finally," and, "Now, my dear brethren, to say a last word," or something of that nature—finally, I want to touch on a subject of some delicacy and I hope that nobody will, at some point during my discussion, jump to the conclusion that he has heard the whole thing and start denouncing me as an arrant partisan or bigot on one side or the other.

The subject I refer to is the recent Quebec legislation known as Bill 22. I approach this with some diffidence partly because I have a foot in both camps, so to speak. As some honourable senators have heard me say before, I am a member and an officer in several capacities—an active member—of a French language United Church in which, I might add, I recently preached my twelfth French sermon. Protestant ministers of the French language are rather scarce and so when our minister goes on holiday the laity has to pitch in. So I think I have some feeling for French Canadians and French-Canadian opinion. On the other hand I am of almost purely English extraction, and I think I have some feeling the other way too, and I find that when I am discussing things of this sort with French Canadian friends I find myself, over and over again, saying, "Oui, oui, d'accord, mais . . .", and when I am discussing it with some of my English Canadian friends I say, "Yes, yes, I know, I see your point but at the same time I think you should allow for such and such; you must recognize that this is so; you must realize that French Canadians can't see the thing in that way; you must remember that they have certain claims that may be strange to you." So, I find myself doing a tightrope act, and I fear that before I have finished my discussion of this subject, not necessarily tonight, I shall be left almost without friends; I shall find myself in the same position as I once did after a speech I gave on a similar subject at Couchiching, when I received two extremely abusive anonymous letters, both in English, one of which said, "You have sold out to the French Canadians," and the other of which said, "You are inspired by hatred of Quebec." Well, I don't know, but I don't think either remark was justified.

Now, some may say that this subject, Bill 22, is purely provincial and should not be discussed here. I think not. I think it has national repercussions. The Government of Canada is trying to promote bilingualism across the country within the jurisdiction of this Parliament, and it is trying to encourage provincial governments within their jurisdiction to promote bilingualism as far as possible. And I think it has had some success in both respects—much more success, naturally, within its own jurisdiction than in the process of encouraging the provinces. New Brunswick, for example, has adopted an Official Languages Act based on our own and following the lines of our Official Languages Act very closely. Ontario has gone a considerable distance, and for those of us who remember Ontario as it was less than a generation ago, an extraordinary distance, towards providing French education for French-speaking children and towards providing government services in French for Franco-Ontarian citizens. Now, I know that much remains to be done, and I know there have been various difficulties about this in particular places, but at the same time I think considerable progress has been made, notably in these two provinces where the bulk of the French-speaking population outside Quebec lives. I am not always sure that French-speaking people in the province of Quebec always quite realize how much progress has been made, and how much has been done. I know that in New Brunswick certain very important parts of the Official Languages Act have not been proclaimed and that the Acadians have been protesting against this, and doubtless with reason. However, I discussed the matter not very long ago with the provincial ombudsman, whom I happened to meet, a man I have known for some considerable time, and he told me—and I have every reason from my knowledge of him to believe that he was telling me the truth—that these particular sections had not been proclaimed because the provincial government was reluctant to put them into effect in theory, to proclaim them, to declare they were in force when, in fact, the machinery for making them effective was not there; that it wanted to have the machinery ready to make them effective before it proclaimed them and that it was working as hard and as fast as it could to get this machinery ready. Now, of course, there will always be those who say, well, it is not going fast enough; there will be those who say it is going as slowly as if it were driving a snail ahead of it; and there will be those who say it should make greater efforts. But I think a considerable effort has been made and is being made.

To sum it up, I shall venture to say that in the predominantly English-speaking provinces and certainly within the jurisdiction of this Parliament, the movement has been toward bilingualism. In Quebec under Bill 22 the movement is away from bilingualism and I think Quebec's action is likely to slow down or even arrest progress in the other provinces, notably in New Brunswick. That is the main reason why I say that this legislation has national repercussions and, in my judgment, unfortunate repercussions.

Now, having said that, let me add at once that I have the liveliest sympathy with the essential object of the legislation. I can understand why French Canadians, especially French Canadians in Quebec, are disturbed by the decline in the proportion of Canada's population which is French-speaking. I can understand the feeling that the only sure defence is to fall back on fortress Quebec. I can understand the fear that immigrants to Quebec, particularly immigrants who are neither French- nor English-speaking, choosing to educate their children in English, may in time undermine the fortress. I doubt whether these fears are altogether justified. From this point of view, the worst population projections submitted to the Gendron Commission show that by 1991 Quebec would be slightly over 79 per cent French-speaking and the city and island of Montreal 62 per cent to 67 per cent French-speaking. Those were the worst projections, the most unfavourable to the French language. I am much more optimistic about the future of the French language in Quebec and in Canada than the people who drafted and passed Bill 22. Nonetheless, with the general object of the legislation and with many of its provisions I have no quarrel.

I think, also, it is worth noting that Bill 22 does not take away any of the language privileges guaranteed to the English-speaking population of Quebec by section 133 of the British North America Act. Let us look carefully at those. You sometimes hear it said that the British North America Act makes English and French official languages in Quebec. Well, it does not mention official languages; it does not use the term. It simply says as far as the English-speaking population in Quebec is concerned, this: first of all, any member that you elect to the legislature can take part in the debates in English. They may, or they may not; they are free to do it. (Incidentally, the Ontario legislature some years ago passed a formal resolution providing that any member of the Ontario legislature had the right to deliver his speeches in that legislature in French. It was passed unanimously though, as Professor Tom Symons points out, a few members apparently found it advisable to be absent when the vote was taken.) It says, first of all, that the English-speaking people in Quebec can speak English in the legislature. Second, it says that the records and journals of the legislature must be kept in both languages. Third, it says that the acts of the legislature must be published in both languages. Fourth, it says that in any pleading or process in or issuing from the courts of Quebec either language may be used. Now, Bill 22 does not touch any of those. There is the marginal question of whether, by saying that where the ordinary rules of construction do not yield a definitive result as to the meaning of a piece of legislation, the French version shall prevail in case of conflict between the two versions. As far as I can discover, however, from discussion with some very good constitutional lawyers of both language groups—I think I may even venture to mention one of them, the Dean of the Faculty of Law at the University of Ottawa, who has done two masterly articles on this subject in the local French-language paper, Le Droit,—I think I can say that this does not really invade, or infringe upon, privileges or rights of the English-speaking people in Quebec as laid down in the British North America Act.

It is argued also by Professor Frank Scott and six of his colleagues in the McGill Faculty of Law that indirectly the legislation will take away rights guaranteed to the Protestant schools of Quebec by section 93 in the British North America Act. On the face of it this argument looks pretty thin, because as we all know, or ought to know, I suppose all of us do know, what section 93 deals with is the educational rights of the "Protestant and Roman Catholic minorities of the Queen's subjects." There is not a word about French or English. Perhaps there should have been; according to some people the Fathers of Confederation, not being very bright in these people's estimation, when they said Protestant and Roman Catholic meant English and French. I should be interested to be able to call the spirit of D'Arcy McGee from the vasty deep, and ask him whether when he said "Catholic" he meant "French". I have my strong doubts. Anyway, what is guaranteed on the face of it is denominational rights, the rights of the Protestant and Roman Catholic minorities of the Queen's subjects. If there were any doubt about this, any doubt that it did not deal with language, one has been inclined to think, most jurists, I think—and I am here simply parroting, as it were, the words of constitutional lawyers of my acquaintance; I am not attempting to offer my own opinions—but most jurists have concluded that it was definitively settled by the judgment of the judicial committee of the Privy Council in the MacKell case, which quite clearly laid it down as far as Ontario was concerned that linguistic rights were not guaranteed.

However, Professor Scott and his colleagues, some of whom made a very thorough study of this over a period of some years, are convinced that the MacKell decision does not really apply to Quebec. They claim that there were one or more pre-Confederation statutes of the old Province of Canada dealing with education in what was then Canada East, which gave the Protestant school commissions of the time the power to determine the language of instruction. They therefore claim that section 93, paragraph 1 of the British North America Act indirectly guarantees this protection for the language of instruction in Protestant schools of Quebec, because it says nothing in any provincial law on education "shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law in the province at the Union".

Now, I have been meaning to go and look up those statutes. I have not done so; I should have. I don't know that I should have been very much further ahead if I had done so, because had I arrived at a conclusion different from that of Professor Scott and his colleagues I hope I should have had enough humility not to proffer my contrary lay opinion against their distinguished professional opinion, though I must add, of course, that very often you find constitutional lawyers of equal distinction arguing on opposite sides and I don't think this case is an exception. However, that is one point they make about this Bill 22. They think it might be held by the courts to be invalid in its education clauses because of this particular feature. I don't know.

They also say that any Protestant child in Quebec has an indefeasible right to go to a Protestant school, and if he arrives—suppose he is un petit chinois, and hasn't any English or French, and he and his parents, through a Chinese interpreter, say he is a Protestant, he is a Presbyterian, he is a United Churchman, or whatever it might be—the claim of Professor Scott and his colleagues is that no government official can come along and say, "No, you can't go there because you can't speak English." They say a Protestant child has an indefeasible legal right, regardless of his linguistic abilities, or lack of them, to go to a Protestant school in Quebec.

I think they may be on stronger ground there. I proffer that lay opinion with, I hope, suitable humility.

These distinguished lawyers also argue that there are three or four provisions of Bill 22 that are beyond the powers of the province. For what my opinion is worth, I agree with them, that the legislation cannot validly be applied to public utilities falling within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada. I don't think this makes very much difference, because if the railways, for example, are asked to print their tickets in French—I think they are probably doing it already—it would be a sensible thing to do. So I don't think any question will arise. But technically I think you could make an argument that if all interprovincial railways, or interprovincial airlines, under the jurisdiction of this Parliament said, "No, we are not going to obey this feature of the law. We are going to print our tickets only in English," they couldn't very well be got at. But, as I say, I think it is an academic question.

I am a little uneasy, because of some things which have been said in the last few days, about the position of public servants of the Dominion of Canada in the city of Hull. There has been some suggestion there that they would be obliged to conduct their business in French because of the provisions of Bill 22. I venture to doubt whether, in fact, the provisions of Bill 22 would apply to functionaries of the Government of Canada working in the province of Quebec. I should defer to legal opinion on the subject, certainly, but this would be my offhand lay opinion, that if anybody tried to say to somebody in one of the Dominion government offices in Hull, "You have got to conduct your business in French," he could answer, "No, I don't have to."

Now, on a lot of constitutional questions raised by these distinguished jurists I confess I have doubts. I am not by any means as thoroughly convinced of the invalidity of certain features of the legislation as they are.

I noticed the other day in another place a certain person said roundly that I had declared the whole bill was unconstitutional. I never said anything of the sort. I wouldn't have dared to say anything of the sort. I would not be so foolish.

Senator Walker: May I ask the honourable senator a question?

Senator Forsey: Yes.

Senator Walker: Is there anybody of any prominence in authority who does say that Bill 22 is unconstitutional?

Senator Forsey: Does anybody say that? I don't think anybody of any consequence has said that the whole thing is unconstitutional. I think there are some distinguished constitutional lawyers, notably Professor Scott, who have said certain features of it are unconstitutional. On the whole I am rather doubtful about the opinions that have been expressed on some of these things. I have a good deal of sympathy with their views, but on the whole I am rather doubtful about them.

In my opinion, the question of the constitutional validity of this act or any part of it should be tested in the courts by the aggrieved minority, and any other remedy should be invoked only after that has been done. I don't think it would be a good idea for the government to take a reference case on the thing, because that would be merely an advisory opinion and the provincial government could say, "It's just an advisory opinion. If an actual piece of litigation, if that is the proper word, came before the court, it might be convinced by the facts and the evidence before it, and the argument, that the advisory opinion had been too hastily formed and was not its final opinion on the subject."

This is, of course, rather unlikely. It seems to me that the English-speaking minority in Quebec is perfectly capable, financially and otherwise, of testing any feature of this bill in the courts. There are poor English-speaking people in the province of Quebec, but there are an awful lot of English-speaking people in the province of Quebec who are by no means destitute or even moderately poor. A lot of them are very well off and could perfectly well afford to take a case on this matter to the courts if they see fit. It seems to me that if they are seriously aggrieved and feel they are seriously—I think the French legal term is lésés—this is the thing for them to do. They should not expect somebody else to do it for them.

The objection to that, saying "Leave the whole question of constitutionality to the courts, and don't do anything else until that has been done," is that this might take a very long time, and by the time the final decision came down it might be too late to invoke some of the other remedies which, theoretically at least, are available to the English-speaking minority.

I don't think that is a very serious matter in fact, because the only extraordinary remedy which would be theoretically available, available only for a very limited time, is the Dominion government's power of disallowance, and I think I may say with some confidence that it is highly unlikely, to say the least, that that particular power would be invoked in this particular case.

As far as the education provisions are concerned, if the aggrieved minority is not happy about those, even if the decision of the courts goes against it, it can always avail itself of paragraph 3 of section 93; which says:

Where in any Province a System of separate or Dissident Schools exists by Law at the Union or is thereafter established by the Legislature of the Province, an Appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any Act or Decision of any Provincial Authority—

Any act or decision of any provincial authority.

—affecting any Right or Privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic Minority of the Queen's Subjects in relation to Education.

There is no time limit upon that, and it applies, as honourable senators can see from what I have just quoted, not merely to the legislation itself but also to any regulations, directives, decisions, or whatnot, by any administrative authority under the legislation.

That brings me to one other consideration about this bill. One of the most objectionable features of it, I think by common consent of the Parti Québécois on the one hand and the English-speaking minority on the other, is the enormous scope left to administrative discretion.

I went through the bill in its final form and counted 17 different places—and they were on matters of substantial importance—where it says, "The minister shall make regulations," or "the Régie shall make regulations", or some administrative authority shall decide. Power is placed in the hands of public servants, officials, functionaries, and this was strongly objected to during the proceedings on the bill in the Legislative Assembly of Quebec both by the Parti Québécois and by the English-speaking people who came before the committee, and I think by the two English-speaking Liberals who broke party ranks on the thing.

Of course, some administrative discretion is inescapable, but I think both the Parti Québécois and the English-speaking opponents of the bill are right in arguing that the degree of administrative discretion, indeed the kind of administrative discretion, provided for in this act is dangerously wide.

I think that explains to some extent the very widespread alarm in the English-speaking community about the ultimate effects of this legislation.

Rightly or wrongly many people in that community believe that the real effect of this legislation will come from the decisions made by administrative bodies, administrative officials—not merely ministers but civil servants—and rightly or wrongly they suspect that a great many of those civil servants, and especially in the Department of Education, are in what I might perhaps be permitted to call imperfect sympathy with the point of view of the English-speaking community, imperfect sympathy with the rights of the English-speaking community, as the English-speaking community at least sees them.

I am coming very near the end of what I wanted to say. There are certain features of the act which appear to be merely vexatious and oppressive; for instance, the provisions which require that the public administration, which specifically includes universities—an extraordinary provision that, universities as part of the public administration—that the public administration shall have, as its language of internal communication, French. There is provision that in the case of English-speaking universities they could also have an English version, but it seems quite clear that McGill, for example, would have to have all its internal communications in French. Doubtless, there would be an English version, too, but there would have to be a French version, and in case of conflict between the two, the French version would prevail. I cannot see—and this is certainly the opinion of Professor Scott and his colleagues, and appears to be well founded—I cannot see that that can do the French Canadian or the French language any good at all. It seems to me it will merely be an added expense and an infernal nuisance to McGill and, doubtless, to the other English-language universities in the province. I think it is a very unfortunate and foolish provision, and one that cannot really have any good effect at all.

Finally, let me deal with the contention that Bill 22 merely does to the English-speaking minority in Quebec what the other provinces have done to their French-speaking minorities or, in fact, rather less than the other provinces have done. That would be more accurate, because it doesn't take away, as I noted, any of the rights of the English-speaking minority under section 133 of the British North America Act. Manitoba, in 1890, took away all the rights supposedly guaranteed to the French population of that province by the original Constitution of Manitoba. Curiously, although the legislation expressly stated that this was to apply only in so far as the jurisdiction of the legislature extended—which was practically an open invitation to anybody to challenge its validity—curiously enough, nobody did challenge its validity until 1916 when a French Canadian argued in a certain case that he should be allowed to present his case in the French language on the ground that the act of 1890 was invalid. His challenge was turned down by the court of first instance, and he did not appeal. It seems to me a most extraordinary thing that this never came up before and that it was not carried through to a conclusion. But I suppose that in the 1890s the French Canadian people in Manitoba were so preoccupied with the school question, and when that was settled in the way it was, half-settled, settled by the fragile and inadequate Laurier-Greenway compromise, they rather despaired and decided it was hopeless to try to do anything. The courts had failed them, as they felt; the Dominion Cabinet had failed them. It had issued a remedial order which had been disobeyed: the Province of Manitoba refused to restore the separate school system pursuant to the remedial order. It had tried to put a remedial bill through the Parliament of Canada, but obstruction by the Liberal Opposition led by Wilfrid Laurier, supported by some bigoted Ontario Conservatives, succeeded in preventing that bill from getting through. So they said, "Well, what's the use? No use; throw in the towel." Anyhow, it wasn't challenged successfully; only once, halfheartedly.

But surely by 1974 we have got past the point where we say, in effect, "You kicked our people in the teeth in 1890; now we are going to kick your people in the teeth 84 years later." That doesn't seem to me to be a civilized kind of argument, and I am glad to see it has been used only by certain supporters of Bill 22. I do not think this is the way we make progress; I do not think it is the way we promote national unity; I do not think it is the way we defend the rights of the French Canadians or the French language.

I don't find it very convincing to say that Québec, in Bill 22, is only following the example of other provinces. That statement is not altogether accurate, and to the extent that it is accurate, Quebec is following the bad, old example of the other provinces instead of the new, better example. It is moving in the opposite direction from the other provinces. To the extent that the statement is true, it simply means, I think, that Quebec is discouraging the other provinces from moving further in a new and better way, which some of us, at least, hoped they were following.

To sum up, I am sorry that this bill was passed in its present form. I think it is, in many of its features, unjust and oppressive. I think the degree and kind of administrative discretion it provides for is dangerous to the liberties of the subject. I fear that the legislation will work to the economic disadvantage of Quebec. I hope the question of the legal validity of certain parts of the legislation will be tested in the courts. I also hope that on reflection, and after experience, the Legislature of Quebec may so amend the act that it will be shorn of its objectionable provisions and made more effective for its good and essential purpose of strengthening the position of the French language in Quebec without, at the same time, prejudicing its increasingly favourable position in the rest of the country.

I hope I have escaped the charge of being a fanatic or a bigot on this subject. I have tried to express myself with care and in a judicious, if not judicial, spirit. I really think this is something on which, shall I say, a former member of the English-speaking minority in Quebec has a right to be heard, and I should feel that I was not performing my duties in this Senate and my duties as a former member of the English-speaking minority in Quebec, and as a citizen of Canada with a foot in both camps, if I did not undertake some such discussion of this matter as I have engaged in tonight.

Hon. John Morrow Godfrey: Honourable senators, I do not think I can add anything of value to what has already been said about Madam Speaker; her predecessor, Senator Fergusson; the new Leader of the Government and his predecessor, Senator Martin; and our two new senators, Senator Barrow and Senator Côtteau. I will merely say that I agree with and heartily second all the nice things that have been said about them by those who have preceded me in this debate.

I feel that this is an appropriate occasion to make the following brief comments on one matter only. Like many millions of my fellow Canadians, I looked forward with keen anticipation to the recent renewal of the Russia-Canada hockey series. I had hoped and expected that our players had learned a lesson from the series two years ago, that they would remember they were representing their country, and that it was of vital importance that every one of them behave in a sportsmanlike fashion. In international sporting events, particularly when a team is representing their country, how you win, in my opinion—Vince Lombardi to the contrary—is just as important as winning.

I saw the game in Toronto and, along with nearly everyone else I have talked to who was present, I saw the Russian team score a goal which was disallowed—honestly, I believe, although mistakenly—by the Canadian referee. I would have been a very proud Canadian indeed if on that occasion someone in authority on Team Canada had immediately stepped forward like a man and a sportsman, and conceded the Russian team the goal that they obviously and actually scored.

My feelings of regret over this incident, however, were nothing compared to my feelings when I heard about the fight after the sixth game in Russia. As a Canadian, I was ashamed of the conduct of Rick Ley who brutally, and without provocation, attacked one of the stars of the Russian team after the game had ended in a defeat for the Canadians. I have talked to many fellow Canadians from all walks of life and of all ages about this since, and they, without exception, felt exactly the same way I did about it. They felt that by his inexcusable conduct, Ley unjustifiably damaged, in the eyes of the world, the reputation of Canada, and in their opinion he was a disgrace to his country.

Here again, whoever had the authority had a chance to redeem the fair name of Canada. He should, without any prompting from anyone, least of all the Russians, have immediately sent Rick Ley packing back to Canada, where he belonged at that particular moment.

I feel that I should say this just in case anyone outside Canada, and particularly the Russians, think that Canadians as a whole approve of the childish, unsportsmanlike, outrageous and stupid conduct of a hooligan like Rick Ley.

I would also like to say that in my opinion Tom Brown, the Canadian referee, who did not allow the Russian goal in Toronto, completely redeemed himself in the seventh game. It was obvious to anyone who saw the replay on television of the disputed goal, which included a picture of the clock in the upper right hand corner, that the goal was scored an appreciable length of time after the clock registered zero and the game was over. Here again, the Canadian coach did not do Canada proud when he threatened not to play the last game unless this post-game goal was allowed.

Some commentators have claimed that the Canadians lost the series in the committee room. That, in my opinion, is a lot of baloney. A fine Canadian hockey team lost to a superb Russian team on the ice, and nowhere else. While it was disappointing, there is no disgrace in that, and we should have no hesitation in admitting it.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, my name is not on the list of those to speak and I know it is late, but I cannot sit back and say nothing after listening to what I feel has been a very unfair and unjustified attack on Team Canada as it represented this country in Russia during the recent hockey series. I feel it would be wrong to adjourn this evening leaving unanswered the almost insulting words of my honourable colleague about the performance of Team Canada.

I say this because I personally have toured Europe with a hockey team. I had that privilege a few years ago when I was Mayor of Saskatoon, and accompanied our very fine team, the Saskatoon Quakers. That team played the national teams of some countries, and I saw European hockey. I saw the kind of antics that went on when the referee was not looking, and sometimes when he was. I saw the frustration of our players. I saw the bodies of some of our fine young men in the dressing room afterwards with the black and blue marks of the stick butts, the spearing and all the other things that provoked those young athletes into emotions which certainly they themselves regretted, and which we all regretted, but which, believe me, are the result of the kind of provocation that makes a man sometimes lose control of himself. I can understand it because I have seen it.

I merely wish to say to honourable senators that I am proud of Team Canada. I am proud of what they have done. I agree that the best team won, but I would not want this body, those honourable senators who are here, to feel that our people who represented us acted in a way that was a disgrace to Canada. I suggest that they did what every good red-blooded young Canadian would do. They could only take so much and then they had to explode. I am proud of these boys.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to clear up a misconception. I was not criticizing Team Canada, and I thought I made that clear in my last remarks. I was criticizing one man, Mr. Rick Ley, as far as the players are concerned. I did deprecate other things. After the game was over Rick Ley admitted that he had no provocation; he went after that Russian. I still say that the people I have been talking to deprecated it in every way, and thought he was a disgrace to the country.

On motion of Senator Rowe, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ON THE QUESTION PERIOD

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I would just ask the Leader of the Government what is contemplated so far as the work before the Senate is concerned. We have, if I am not mistaken, eight or nine bills.

Senator Langlois: We have ten bills.

Senator Flynn: Ten? Even better. I do not object to that. On the contrary. I would, however, appreciate, as far as we are concerned on this side, knowing when it is envisaged that these bills will be dealt with.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is the intention of the government to initiate action on these measures, hopefully, commencing tomorrow. I think honourable members are aware of the special emergency legislation which has been introduced in the other place, and the progress of that legislation will largely determine our schedule in this assembly. We hope to have further information this afternoon, and it will be immediately communicated to the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: For clarification, may I ask if the government intends to proceed with some of the legislation now on the Order Paper, or the emergency legislation which the Leader of the Government has mentioned? Is it the intention not to proceed with the debate on the Address in reply to Speech from the Throne at the same time?

Senator Perrault: I should think that in the circumstances priority would be given to the emergency legislation, and that that debate would demand the total time of the house until brought to its conclusion. Then we would proceed, hopefully, with the Throne Speech debate, but at the same time consider having a portion of our day's activities devoted as well to the expedition of legislation.

PRINTING AND DISTRIBUTION OF GOVERNMENT BILLS— QUESTION

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I have a question to ask the Leader of the Government. Yesterday there were introduced Bills S-7, S-8, S-9 and S-10. I did not find them in my file here and asked one of the pages to obtain those bills for me. He has just reported to me that he has talked to Distribution, where he was informed that they are not printed yet and therefore are not available. Surely this is not so?

Senator Perrault: At this time there are severe demands being made on the facilities which produce copies of bills. I wish to assure the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, however, that every possible effort will be made to expedite the delivery to his desk of the bills in question.

Senator Grosart: But may I ask the Leader of the Government if it is to be the practice to introduce bills here before copies are available to senators? This would seem a most unusual way to conduct the business of the Senate.

Senator Perrault: This is quite a common practice for bills which are given first reading and it is true not only in this chamber but, as honourable senators are aware, in the other place also.

NATIONAL PRESS GALLERY

INVITATION TO RECEPTION—QUESTION

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, the question period may not be the right moment to raise this matter, but would the Leader of the Government care to make a statement concerning the reception that the National Press Gallery is holding between 6 and 8 o'clock this evening for all members of Parliament? This matter came to my attention only through attending our national caucus this morning. I received no other notice of it, and I thought that in case other senators had also not received this invitation, it should be pointed out that all members of this chamber have been invited to this function. I think it would be an excellent thing if as many senators as possible were to attend.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, all of us are, of course, aware of the fact that members of Parliament serve either in this chamber or the other chamber; but all of us are members of Parliament. If a general invitation has been issued to members of Parliament to attend a reception of this kind, I would think it involves every member of this chamber.

Senator Croll: They presented it to caucus.

Senator Grosart: Could I ask the Leader of the Government whether he thinks, if we are not invited, that we should go.

Senator Perrault: I think that is a decision which must be made by the individual members of this assembly.

Senator Flynn: No coercion.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, in answer to Senator Grosart, and speaking on the basis of having attended my own caucus this morning, I thought it was made quite clear at that caucus that members of the House of Commons also had not received individual invitations. It is simply an invitation put out by word of mouth to all members of Parliament. I do not think that members of this chamber should feel they are being treated differently by the press corps in not being invited individually. This had not even come to the attention of many members of the House of Commons.

Senator Grosart: I wonder if I could suggest to the Leader of the Government, to clear this up because it could be very embarrassing, that he find out through the usual channels if we are invited and notify us later.

Senator Flynn: I know we are not welcome, but I should like to know if we are invited.

Senator Perrault: As a firm believer in private initiative, it seems to me that those senators who are interested in attending should make inquiries on their own behalf. However, I shall endeavour to clarify the situation to the best of my ability.

Senator Walker: It would be an opportunity for the press gallery to see most of us for the first time.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, I hesitate to belabour this subject, but I wish to say that the chairman of our caucus interrupted the proceedings later to say that he had made inquiries and had found out that the invitation was specifically to all members of Parliament, including senators.

Senator Flynn: But we are not bound by your caucus.

Senator van Roggen: I know you are not bound by our caucus, but that situation has been cleared up.

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, you see what happens. The honourable senator rises and says that all members of Parliament are invited "including senators." This is exactly what we object to. We are all members of Parliament. Let me say also that I cannot understand Senator Grosart. Any time we have a chance to freeloader on them we should take it. They have freeloaded on us often enough before, so let's go.

Senator Walker: But aren't they selling tickets for the drinks?

TIME MAGAZINE

BRIEF PRESENTED TO MEMBERS OF HOUSE OF COMMONS—QUESTION

Senator Davey: Honourable senators, you may not be aware of the fact—as would seem to be the case in the situation dealt with in Senator van Roggen's question—that Time magazine has within the last few days sent an extremely elaborate and expensive brief to the members of the other place. To the best of my knowledge this document has not been received by members of the Senate, and I just make the observation in passing that it is an interesting omission on the part of Time.

Senator Argue: They know not what they do.

Senator Walker: You won't have to make a speech this time.

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Administrator's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Senator Neiman, seconded by Senator Cotreau, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. Frederick William Rowe: Honourable colleagues, I join with those who preceded me in this debate in extending congratulations and good wishes to you, Madam Speaker, to the new Leader of the Government in the Senate, to the continuing Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate and to the other party officials on both sides of this chamber. I join also in expressing my appreciation of the contribution made to the Senate by your predecessor, Madam Speaker, Senator Fergusson, and by that dean of Canadian statesmen and public figures, Senator Paul Martin.

I welcome the two new members of the Senate and I congratulate the mover and the seconder of this motion. I know I shall be pardoned if I congratulate in particular my Newfoundland colleague, Senator Petten, on his appointment as Government Whip. I congratulate him not only because of this honour, but because of his willingness to assume this responsibility, which entails duties that are often difficult and sometimes thankless.

Senator Flynn: Usually.

Senator Rowe: I am sure that his honoured father, who sat with distinction in this Senate for so many years, if he were alive today would be happy and gratified that his son is filling this post.

The election that was held this past July proved two things, if nothing else. First, that the people of Canada wanted a stable government; and, second, they felt that the best person to lead the country in these difficult times was our present Prime Minister. They are difficult times. I suppose that all times are difficult in the life of a nation, but these are perhaps more difficult than we have known and experienced. I am not being unduly partisan when I say that the results of the election were of great satisfaction to me in a number of ways, but primarily in that the Canadian people confirmed my feeling regarding Prime Minister Trudeau.

It was also a source of pride to Newfoundlanders—I am sure honourable senators will pardon this little bit of parochialism—that our representative in the Government of Canada, the Honourable Donald Jamieson, received the highest percentage of votes in the entire nation—a tribute both to his ability and to his dedicated efforts to serve both his native province and the country as a whole. I am sure that our colleague, Senator Carter, who laid the groundwork in that district, and who served the area so dedicatedly for something like 15 or 20 years, must be happy at the result, knowing that in one sense the groundwork that he laid is still there and that his efforts are still bearing fruit.

Honourable senators, in speaking to the Throne debate, the big problem is not to find something to say but to select topics from a multitude of topics that concern us all, particularly when we have a new Parliament and a new administration.

Senator Flynn: Or what not to say—to select what not to say.

Senator Rowe: I thank the honourable Leader of the Opposition, and I am happy to see him back in his place after an absence of several weeks.

Like most Canadians, I was happy to see that the Throne Speech made reference to transportation problems, but before dealing with that subject, I want to say a word—I would like to say much more but perhaps I should await a more appropriate time—about Senate reform, with special reference to the points made by Senator O'Leary in this chamber last night. Senator O'Leary appeared to be very much concerned, I think unduly concerned, over the statement by the Prime Minister during the course of the debate on the Throne Speech in the other house. I have before me the remarks of the Prime Minister, which appear in Hansard of the House of Commons for October 2. I gained the impression from what Senator O'Leary said that he feels in some way or another that the Prime Minister has made up his mind about what he is going to do, and that whether we like it or not it will be shoved down our throats.

In my opinion, those fears are entirely groundless. Here is what the Prime Minister said:

Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a word about the Senate. I know that it is not for me to say too much about that subject, but I think that it would not be more than good neighbour policy to suggest that at least a few reforms should be considered, reforms which would in no way interfere with the authority of the provinces—

The Prime Minister went on to suggest a couple of reform measures that came to mind, such as Senate appointments for a definite period of seven years, with the possibility of reappointment. In my view, those remarks by the Prime Minister were extremely temperate and reasonable. I do not think they contained anything to suggest otherwise, and I hasten to say that I have not discussed this subject with him. I have not had any conversation with him since he made that speech. I did not hear his speech, but I have read it, and I do not see anything to indicate that he has taken up a dogmatic, arbitrary, almost dictatorial position on this subject. I am quite sure, knowing the Prime Minister as I do, that he has an open mind on this subject and is prepared to let the people of Canada, in the final analysis, decide what the future of this house is to be. They will have to decide, too, whether there are to be changes, whether there is to be reform. I, for one, feel there is need for reform, for changes. We are operating under a Constitution drawn up over 100 years ago, and times have certainly changed since then. I will deal with this subject further at a later date.

I doubt whether there is anything pertaining to our Constitution or the parliamentary practice in Canada about which there is so much misinformation and outright ignorance as there is about the constitutional role and, indeed, the actual operating process of this chamber. It is a matter of almost consternation when one reads supposedly reasoned editorials in some of our leading newspapers which reek of ignorance—ignorance in the true sense of the word of not knowing what they are talking about. People talk about the House of Commons eliminating this chamber. Under the Constitution, the House of Commons can no more do that than I can. In any event, we will talk about that at a later date.

I mentioned earlier that the Speech from the Throne made some reference to transportation problems in Canada. Since becoming a member of this body, I have tried not to be too parochial. I have tried to steer myself away from the natural tendency, having been in public life in a province for over 20 years, to be concerned about provincial matters almost to the exclusion at times of national matters. However, there are two aspects of transportation in the province of Newfoundland which concern all of Canada and about which I want to say a few words today. One of these comes entirely under the jurisdiction of the federal government, that being the railway system in Newfoundland—the railway about which there have been so many jokes and which, when the joking is over, is a very important issue in the life of Newfoundland and of Canada.

The question is what to do about that Newfoundland railway, some 700 to 800 miles of a railway system. That question has aroused a great deal of acrimony, bitterness and frustration in recent years. There are those who argue that it was the moral and perhaps the constitutional duty of Canada to change that narrow gauge system to a wide gauge system when Newfoundland became a province of Canada in 1949, thereby making it conform to the rest of the railway system in Canada. Those people argue that the Government of Canada failed, certainly morally and perhaps constitutionally, in its duty. The CNR does not own that railway; rather, it is the constitutional responsibility of the CNR, given it by the Parliament of Canada, the Government of Canada, to operate that railway. They say that CNR was permitted to downgrade that railway to the point where fewer and fewer people were willing to use it, and then when people were not using it in large numbers the CNR had the excuse to eliminate the passenger service completely and substitute a trans-island bus service, which the critics say is uncomfortable, uncertain and fraught with all kinds of potential dangers, especially during the severities of winter. These people claim that if the railway were made broad gauge, a fast and efficient service could be implemented and many of Newfoundland's transportation problems, both freight and passenger, would be solved.

Another school of thought says that the decline of rail passenger service in Newfoundland was inevitable once a modern highway was built. It is argued that the present bus service is faster, smoother, more frequent and generally more convenient for the public and that—and here we come to the crunch—to change between 700 and 800 miles of track from narrow to broad gauge, with all its implications, would cost between $400 million and $500 million. There are many people who say sincerely that if Canada can invest an additional $500 million or $600 million in Newfoundland, there are projects of far, far greater priority than making the railway wide gauge. I am not going to argue the merits of that issue now. Whichever side is right, there are other aspects of the railway in Newfoundland that need emphasizing. In Newfoundland there are transportation problems, because of the fairly rapid increase in population, and particularly because of industrial development of one kind or another, development which is bound to accelerate since it is almost certain that there will be major oil developments off the Newfoundland and Labrador coasts in the months and years ahead. Already the Trans-Canada Highway, running for nearly 600 miles from St. John's to Port aux Basques, is proving inadequate in certain areas. The route of this highway almost parallels the route of the railway. I am not an engineer, but I have been informed by the most competent persons on this subject that the present narrow gauge railway could be upgraded at relatively reasonable expense, to permit the introduction of a high-speed passenger train service of a dayliner or similar type.

Let me take one example. The present Trans-Canada Highway is severely taxed in the 60 miles between the industrial area centering on Grand Falls, where one of the great paper mills of the world is operating, and the great international airport of Gander. That is one of the areas where the Trans-Canada Highway is being severely taxed, as I know personally, having represented that area for many years. A passenger train service between those two points, utilizing the present railway route, could serve the needs of thousands of travellers without entailing—and it seems to me this is a very important consideration in these days—the drastic ecological and environmental devastation—that is the only word I can think of for it—that would result from building a second major highway in that area, or across Newfoundland.

The principle I have just enunciated with respect to the Grand Falls area and Gander would apply with perhaps greater force in the area between Cornerbrook and the two airport towns of Deer Lake, 30 miles to the north of Cornerbrook, and Stephenville, the increasingly important industrial centre, which now has one of the two largest liner board paper mills in the world, about 50 miles to the south of Cornerbrook. Again, the railway is there. It is not something that has to be built. It is there, and I suppose the same principle could be applied with respect to the area from St. John's running out towards, let us say, Come-by-Chance, about 90 miles, I believe, where we have one of the great oil refineries of the world and where a second and larger refinery is now being contemplated. Undoubtedly, there will be other industrial developments in that area as well. Again we are talking about a stretch of the Trans-Canada Highway which has been overtaxed. Anyone who has driven out over that stretch of highway, as I do almost daily when I am in Newfoundland, at least over part of it, knows that that section of the road is almost like a city street. For 50 miles you may as well be on a main street in Toronto.

I mentioned earlier that a second transinsular highway—at least I implied this—would involve massive expenditures to acquire the right-of-way and would destroy thousands of acres of forest land and, indeed,—and I hope nobody smiles at this, because it is true—of potential agricultural land as well. I suggested here last year, and I repeat, that the time is long gone when we can afford to be extravagant with our agricultural land in Canada. We cannot keep on indefinitely putting thousands of acres of that type of land under asphalt and concrete. We just cannot do it, with an increasing population and a world population increasingly dependent on Canada for food.

The present railway right-of-way, the 800 miles of it, is owned by the Government of Canada, and, apart from minor acquisitions of land to eliminate some of the curves and grades, the railway could be upgraded without major expenditures for land acquisitions and without any of the major assaults on the ecology of Newfoundland such as I have said earlier would inevitably result from a new highway. I repeat that you need only look at what has happened 15 miles outside of St. John's in the building of a new arterial road leading down to the harbour of St. John's and you will see what can happen. It is quite a view, not a beautiful view but an ugly view, a frightening view. I am all for the new road. I know we need it there, but nobody can look at what is happening in the building of that road without being appalled at the devastation that apparently has to take place in building a highway.

It would not be fair to mention names, but I can say that I have been told by some of the most competent authorities in the world to make such a comment that the upgrading of that entire railway—not putting in the broad gauge system but just upgrading the present system—would cost between $70 million and $80 million. Moreover, since it would not need to be upgraded all at one time, the expenditure of that money could be spread over a number of years.

The population of Newfoundland is now well over 500,000. Newfoundland's importance to the nation, generally, is far out of proportion to that population. When you think of our fisheries and the riches there—at least they were rich until a few years ago, and they may still be if they are not being destroyed, but nobody knows how much of our fishing industry has been destroyed by countries such as Russia, Germany, Japan and a dozen others as well—but when you think of our fisheries and our mining resources and our mineral resources and potential oil developments and the present oil developments in Newfoundland, it becomes obvious that Newfoundland's importance to the nation is increasing daily.

I suggest to this chamber, I suggest to the House of Commons and to the Government of Canada and I suggest to Canada at large that it would be shortsighted economically in the long run, and certainly morally unjustifiable, if the existing railway system in Newfoundland were not improved and upgraded to a point where modern, fast and efficient service in specific areas, and, eventually, along the entire route, could be instituted.

I should like to say a word about the second aspect of transportation in Newfoundland. Here again I am sure that no honourable member will accuse me of being provincial in my thinking. I should like to talk about the Strait of Belle Isle, which separates the island of Newfoundland from the mainland, and in doing so I should remind you that Newfoundland is one of the great islands of the world, one of the ten or eleven largest islands of the world. The Strait of Belle Isle separates that island from the mainland of Canada and, incidentally, from one of the two component parts of the province of Newfoundland, namely, Labrador, which in area is two and a half times the size of the island of Newfoundland. Incidental to the importance of the Strait of Belle Isle, it also separates the island of Newfoundland from the province of Quebec. Blanc-Sablon, on the boundary of Quebec and the province of Newfoundland, is just over nine miles away from the nearest point on the island of Newfoundland.

I regret that it would not be proper for me to mention names, but I want this house to know that I have discussed this matter with a great many world authorities, and in saying that I do not in any way intend to sound boastful; but I have discussed it with the leading authorities in the world on these matters, and I am told that Canada has, in Labrador, the greatest single resource complex on the face of this earth. That resource complex involves fisheries, hydro power, forestries, minerals and oil. The greatest single hydro development in Canada, and in the world, actually, is taking place on a river in Labrador, and it is only half done. When the lower Churchill is developed we will then have a dozen other major rivers there, including the Eagle River, Paradise River, St. Lewis River, Hawkes River and a half dozen others which can be developed and must be developed and which can produce more power even than the Churchill. Remember that the Churchill, when it is completed, will produce ten million horsepower, but these other rivers in southeastern Labrador will be able to produce even more power than the Churchill. You may say, "How is that? Why is that? Why can the rivers in Labrador produce more power than, say, the St. Lawrence River?" The answer is simple. There is a tremendous volume of water there, of course, but not nearly so much water as in the St. Lawrence River; but the point is that whereas the St. Lawrence River flows over a long stretch, falling down a few score of feet, or at most a couple of hundred feet, all the water in Labrador flows from the watershed on a plateau 1,000 to 2,000 feet in height, and that water must go over that plateau and down into the Atlantic Ocean.

In Churchill we have one site which produces six million horsepower and another site which produces four million horsepower, and, for the same reasons we have all that other potential power there as well.

So, as I say, we have in Labrador the greatest single resource complex in the world. Another consideration of that complex is the vast quantities of unpolluted cold water. I hope my adjectives are being heeded, because these vast quantities of unpolluted, fresh, extremely cold water are important. The word "cold" is becoming increasingly important in the scheme of things. We have probably the largest, single, untapped forest area in Canada. We have minerals and we have offshore oil in Labrador, and we have a strategic position relative to the continent of Europe, and industrial North America. Take a look at it on the globe some time. There is that complex. And one imperative in that complex is the building of a tunnel under the Strait of Belle Isle and the nine miles of water there.

One of the great arguments for a tunnel right now is that the only way to bring power into the island of Newfoundland, from the lower Churchill, is by means of a tunnel. It is impossible to put in power lines, and keep them there, on the bottom of the Strait of Belle Isle, one of the most turbulent bodies of water in the world, with tides running at the astronomical speed of eight knots. The pack ice conditions there are as severe as anywhere on earth, and there are scores, even hundreds, of monstrous icebergs, each weighing millions of tons, grounding in those relatively shallow waters and going up and down the strait at the fantastic speed I have mentioned. I have seen icebergs—and there are others here who have seen them—ground and topple over, and bring up tons and tons of silt and mighty boulders weighing tons in themselves.

How could we put power lines down across the Strait of Belle Isle under those conditions? There is only one way to bring the power across, and that is by means of a tunnel. The tunnel is coming—I believe the preparations are being made for it right now—but the big danger is that the tunnel will be of minimal dimensions, designed to carry only the power lines. In my view, honourable senators, that would be a tragedy. We need a tunnel under the Strait of Belle Isle to carry the power lines, but one also capable of accommodating vehicular traffic, as in the Alps, either independently or by means of an electric railway. Such a tunnel would, at one blow, eliminate the most serious disadvantage from which Newfoundland suffers, namely, its insularity—the fact that it is an island. Such a tunnel would end that insularity and would serve to knit together the two component parts of the province of Newfoundland, and it would, of course, join Newfoundland to the mainland, a consideration that is often overlooked. It would mean that the province of Quebec, would no longer be an isolated peninsula, as it is now, on the eastern side of Canada, jutting out toward the Atlantic Ocean.

The tunnel would be a part, for want of a better word, of a thoroughfare from British Columbia right across Canada to the Avalon peninsula, to Cape-Spear, the most easterly part of Canada and of North America. I suggest that such a tunnel would help to knit Canada together, just as the Canadian Pacific Railway helped to do that. There was no economic justification for such a railway a hundred years ago, just as there is no economic justification for a lot of other things we have done in Canada; but there have been other considerations. Economics is not the only consideration.

Senator Walker: How much would this cost?

Senator Rowe: That, of course, would depend on the size. Nobody knows for sure. I put that question to one of the men very closely connected with some of the surveys being made—one of the most distinguished engineers in Canada, who is a Canadian, by the way—Dean Bruneau, head of the engineering school at Memorial University. Frankly, at this point, they do not know how much it would cost, but inasmuch as the water is not very deep in the Strait of Belle Isle—the depth varies, of course, but it is not particularly great—and in view of the fact that the distance itself would be a maximum of ten miles—and there are innumerable tunnels in the world ten miles long and more—from an engineering point of view there is no great difficulty, and the cost would not be out of line.

I was going to come to the question of cost, and I may as well say this now. Here is where it becomes a national issue. To build a small tunnel, to carry only the power lines, is something which I presume the great corporations and the government of Newfoundland might well manage, possibly with federal grants of one kind or another. But I am quite sure that if we are thinking in terms of a vehicular traffic tunnel, then the Canadian government has to come into the picture. The point I am trying to establish right now is that this is a matter of national concern; it is not something that would be done for the benefit of the island of Newfoundland alone. Incidentally, this tunnel might very well be more economical than would at first meet the eye, for the provision of ferry services between Sydney and Port aux Basques, and between North Sydney and Argentia is, relatively, one of the most expensive responsibilities that the Government of Canada has assumed. As Newfoundland's population grows, and as its industrial development increases, this financial responsibility must increase proportionately.

Obviously, once a tunnel is built under the Strait of Belle Isle, and connects with the road system now being built, or which is contemplated in south and westerly Labrador and in Quebec—there is a road system being planned, and the work in part is being carried out at this moment—once a tunnel is built to connect Newfoundland with the Quebec/Labrador road system, then quite clearly a lot of the traffic which now has to use the ferry services, and traffic which will continue to increase, will be siphoned off by that tunnel, so that there would be economic savings.

The tunnel has to come. Let it not be said that this generation possessed less imagination and less courage than those who, a hundred years ago, undertook the impossible and uneconomic project of putting a railway through the Rocky Mountains.

I was very much interested in the magnificent speech which our colleague Senator Neiman made in opening this debate, and to hear her views on justice in Canada. I want to say a few words upon that subject.

On previous occasions I have expressed my sense of frustration—a sense of frustration which I think is shared by a lot of other Canadians—at our failure to adopt a Criminal Code that is in line with civilized, modern thinking. Under the term “criminal code” I would include our whole approach to anti-social, or what we consider to be anti-social, behaviour. I do not intend to go into detail on this matter; I assume there will be a more appropriate occasion later in this session. At least, that is the inference I get from the Speech from the Throne, and from the Prime Minister’s remarks in the house.

Senator Neiman referred to one example of our irrational approach, and that is the treatment of women who have been subjected to brutal sexual attack. The conditions she described are very real. They are taking place every day under our eyes. She pointed out the obvious indignities visited upon these unfortunate persons. I am thinking of women who have been attacked and assaulted.

But the indignities that are visited upon them in the legal process that follows when these women seek justice in our courts, are so enormous that many women prefer to have the culprits, the psychopaths, or whatever they are, go free rather than undergo some of those ordeals. Most of us have known these facts for years; some of us have talked about them, and have publicly drawn attention to the absurdities, the inconsistencies, irrelevancies and the outright injustice involved, and yet year after year nothing changes. I repeat, honourable senators: year after year nothing is done about it.

I do not want to preach a sermon, but it seems to me that we have to remind ourselves that assault is assault, a crime is a crime, and the victim is entitled, no matter what type of personal life she may have led, to justice. Let me be brutally frank about this. What difference should it make whether the victim of a brutal physical, sexual attack has had a previous sexual history or not? What difference does that make? What has it got to do with it? What difference does it make if the victim is a prostitute? Isn’t a prostitute entitled to protection under our law? You only need to read some of the accounts of cases being dealt with in our courts these days to realize that, as in so many other approaches to behaviour that we do not approve of, we are all victims, or at least many of us are victims, of our own puritanical and medieval concepts. This applies particularly where sex in any form is involved. Far too many of us, philosophically, are still Salem witch-burners; we are still Spanish Inquisitors. We are in the same stage of development as were our cousins who, down in New England only 200 years ago, burned women for being witches, or who in Europe burned thousands at the stake in order to save their immortal souls.

How else, then, if what I say is not true, can you explain a mentality which will put an 18- or 19-year old girl in jail for two or three years, or even up to seven years, for using a drug, possessing a drug, or fooling around with a drug which, while it is not harmless—and I want to say that I do not regard marijuana as harmless—is certainly no more lethal in its effects than tobacco or alcohol? What is the mentality that will do that to these young people, while a person under the influence of alcohol can get into a car and go out and slaughter five or six innocent people on the highway in a split second and, under our laws, get two or three years in jail for doing so?

All this happens while the great tobacco companies, completely amoral in their approach to profits, are free to seduce our children and grandchildren by means of lying and vicious brainwashing propaganda involving sex, youth, athletic prowess, nature and everything else. They use all the influence that Madison Avenue and the other Madison Avenues can bring to bear on these matters. Why are these companies permitted to seduce our children and grandchildren into a habit which will inevitably shorten their lives, and which statistically will cause one out of every 20 of them to die an agonizing death from emphysema or lung cancer? What have we done about that? But no, the great enemy of our society is that 19-year old youth in Gander with a bit of marijuana stuck into the plaster that he had over his broken leg and who, under the law, had to get and was given a seven-year sentence.

Surely the ineffectiveness and the irrationality of so much of our penal system—which, incidentally, (and many Canadians don’t realize this) is one of the most severe of all democratic countries—must be apparent to everyone who has an open mind. And yet the months and the years go by, and little if anything is done to remove these anachronisms, because that is what they are—these inconsistencies and these absurdities. We fail in the most important job of all, and that is to treat these people, the so-called culprits, in any rational or humane way. I hope to talk in greater detail about this at some later date.

Honourable senators, I have one other item that I want to make reference to, and it is something completely separate from what I have been speaking about up to now. I want to say a few words about developments in the United States of America. We in Canada have to be concerned about what happens in other countries, and let me say now that as a Canadian I am very proud of Canada’s record in assisting the less fortunate nations in the world. For that matter I think we can be legitimately proud of our foreign policy generally during the past two or three decades.

Senator Flynn: Did you say “days”?

Senator Rowe: Two or three decades, certainly since World War II.

Senator Flynn: I asked that because someone suggested there was a change recently.

Senator Rowe: That may be so, but there is one aspect of our foreign relations that events of recent months should make us consider more seriously than we have in the past, and that is the things that other countries can do to Canada. Perhaps the most dramatic and drastic example of this was the action of the Arab countries last year in respect of oil. But I am not thinking of that so much as I am of the less tangible things, such things as are exemplified by the role that the CIA, allegedly acting for the American government, and sometimes in fact acting for the American government, and sometimes, I have no doubt, acting without the American government’s knowledge—the things done and the role played by the CIA since its formation following World War II.

Let me say at this point that I happened to have the pleasure of knowing some of the men connected with the forerunner of the CIA, the OSS in World War II. I knew the philosophy underlying its activities, and I knew the philosophy underlying the formation of the CIA which was, as we know, a continuation of the OSS and designed to acquire for the American nation the information that that nation needed from time to time for its own defence and in order to carry on its legitimate activities all over the world. So I have nothing to say against the idea of the CIA in so far as its original intention and design was concerned.

● (1500)

Two years ago in this chamber I expressed my fears regarding the development of a fascist psychology in the United States, and I did it at a time when if I had mentioned the word "Watergate" to anybody he would have thought that I was talking about some power development or, perhaps, vaguely about a fountain pen we used to use 20 years ago. I do not think very many took my words seriously at the time. The fact is, of course, that in recent years—we discovered most of this during this last year or year and a half, although some had some idea earlier of what was going on—fascist elements in the United States have reached right into the White House, and have come dangerously close to undermining the American Constitution and, for that matter, the American way of life.

When we consider the power that was in the hands of men with the mentality we saw demonstrated on television, we have cause to shudder. I will not mention any of their names—they are all now either confined or under indictment—but I had the feeling then when I saw them that those men would have been completely at home in Germany in 1939.

However, there have been far more serious manifestations of this fascist philosophy, or psychology, than we comprise under the term "Watergate". Irrefutable evidence has come out that the CIA spent millions of dollars, and made tremendous efforts in other ways, to overthrow a government which, whatever we might have thought about it, was a legal government. There are 140 governments in the world, and we do not agree with all of them. Of course, I refer to the legal government, put in power by the people of Chile, which an American organization, acting secretly and covertly, spent millions upon millions of dollars to overthrow.

They admit, by the way, that they spent $8 million. Is there anyone, do you think, in the United States Senate today who believes that? Do you think there is anyone in the House of Representatives who believes that $8 million is all they spent? They spent that money in bribing officials and trade union leaders, in fomenting strikes, in undercutting the whole economy of Chile, and in encouraging—let us not close our eyes to it—political assassinations and the subsequent murder of thousands of people. They did that in another country, supposedly a friendly country, a neighbouring country; at least it is in our hemisphere.

We know that the CIA has interfered in other countries. It has come out publicly. We know they interfered in Honduras and in Cuba, and we know what they did in the Dominican Republic. We know what they did in Vietnam and, let us not forget, in many other eastern countries besides Vietnam.

This interference on their part has not consisted of getting information, of reporting back to their government what was taking place—matters that might be of interest to their government—this interference has taken the form of undermining and destroying governments, sometimes successfully. And mark this, honourable senators, in every case it has taken the form of undermining and destroying liberal or left-wing governments, and instituting and creating in their place right-wing dictatorships. Inevitably these dirty tricks involved attempts at—and in some cases successful attempts—or the encouragement of political assassination.

I would suggest to this house that what we have heard and learned about the CIA in this last year or so represents only the tip of the iceberg—and only one-eighth of the volume of the iceberg is visible. In case anyone considers my view to be alarmist, let me say that it is shared by many persons far more distinguished than I could ever hope to be. Many of the leading senators and public figures in the United States have said this publicly, just as I have now done so.

Perhaps the most infamous statement ever made by an American President—it is ironic that I or anyone should have to say this—was made by President Ford a few days ago. We all heard him state publicly that the CIA involvement in Chile—fomenting strikes, bribing government officials, encouraging rebellion and, eventually, overthrowing the legitimate government of Chile with subsequent assassinations and repression of all kinds, the equal of which is not to be found in any more than two or three countries in the world today—could be justified on the grounds that those activities were for the good of the people of Chile.

I wonder how many people in Canada and elsewhere realize the significance and implication of that presidential statement. Actually, we should not have had to wait for President Ford to make that clumsy and, I suspect, inadvertent statement. I suspect he could have bitten his tongue off, and there are others who wish that he had done so, but I wonder how many appreciated the implication of that statement of President Ford in his attempt to rationalize American interference in the affairs of other countries. The implication is simple. If the United States, through the CIA, has the right to carry on these activities in Chile, Honduras, Panama, Cuba, Vietnam, Cambodia and all these other countries—if indeed it has the right to do that in one country—it has the right to do it in every country on the face of this earth, and one of those countries is Canada.

The last thing I want to be accused of is being anti-American. If I were not a Canadian citizen today, I would be an American, and the province from which I come, if it were not part of the Canadian Confederation today, would be a part of the American Union. During the 25 years when the United States operated those great military bases in Newfoundland, 40,000 young Newfoundland women married American servicemen and went back with their husbands, and are now raising their families in the United States. Literally there is not a family in Newfoundland today that does not have close relatives in the United States of America. All Newfoundland appreciates the generosity and the magnanimity of that great country. We regard it with affection and that is why we, perhaps, are as concerned as our cousins in the United States over what has happened there during these past few years.

We are not America-baiters, and no impartial student of modern affairs can fail to appreciate what the United States has done in the interests of developing underdeveloped nations, and in a thousand other ways. But against that we have this fact, that the record of certain groups and organizations in the United States in recent years gives Canadians cause for apprehension, and it behooves us to be eternally vigilant.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I have listened with much interest to those honourable senators who have already participated in this debate, and I welcome this opportunity of congratulating them on their thoughtful and constructive contributions.

I join most sincerely in the congratulations extended to you, Madam Speaker, and to the new government leader in the Senate. It is a particular pleasure to endorse the well-deserved tributes paid to our former Speaker and government leader, and to share in the welcome extended to our distinguished new senators and those who have assumed new duties and responsibilities in this house.

Throne Speeches are remarkable documents. Their uniqueness lies not so much in their content or language as in the diversity of reactions which they produce. It is amazing how one honourable senator reads a Throne Speech and finds it a clear and comprehensive declaration of the government's intentions, couched in precise and statesmanlike terms, while another reads the same speech and finds it a hodge-podge of vague and meaningless generalities, giving no clear indication of what the government intends to do.

The simple fact is that just as beauty is in the eye of the beholder, so the impressions gained from reading a Throne Speech are significantly influenced by whether the reader is a political supporter or opponent of the government. If this undeniable fact teaches us anything, it is that a Throne Speech needs to be read and analyzed with more than ordinary emphasis and objectivity.

I confess that the maximum objectivity of which I am capable is not sufficient to offset what I regard as very real and basic shortcomings in the Throne Speech we are now considering.

Seldom has a statement of government policy been debated in the shadow of such a serious national and international situation. Domestically and internationally we are confronted with at least four major interrelated problems: rampant inflation on a worldwide scale; a balance of payments problem of unprecedented magnitude and seriousness; a sky-rocketing world population, more than half of which lives on the borderline of starvation; and rapidly depleting irreplaceable resources, particularly of fossil fuels on which all industrialized nations depend for their essential energy supplies.

All of these problems are fraught with far-reaching social, economic and political implications for Canada. Having regard to the magnitude and seriousness of such problems, it is understandable that Canadians, upon the opening of this Parliament, looked to their government for a meaningful statement of intent, setting out in precise terms what the government proposed to do. Perhaps we expected too much; but, if so, the government itself is to blame.

During the election campaign, Canadians were repeatedly assured by the Prime Minister and his Cabinet that the government was fully capable of resolving the nation's problems and needed only a clear majority in Parliament to implement its plans.

It is true, honourable senators, that in my region of Canada these assurances were not wholly believed; but the fact remains that the nation gave the Prime Minister the clear majority he requested, and then waited expectantly for nearly three months to learn what the government intends to do.

When Parliament finally opened, we were presented with the Throne Speech, now the subject of this debate. To say the least, it falls far short of public hopes and expectations. It gives no clear indication that the government is seized with the seriousness of the times, and the intentions it reveals are couched in terms which add little to the public's knowledge or understanding of what the government proposes to do.

To be fair, let us acknowledge two things: first, the problems confronting us do not lend themselves to precise definitions. They are extremely complex, complicated, and interrelated with world problems far beyond our borders. Secondly, there are no simple answers or easy solutions to such problems. The government would have been well to emphasize these facts.

Instead, the government acknowledges indirectly that it does not have answers or solutions, but rather is looking to the Canadian people to tell it what it should do. The Throne Speech says:

The Government has therefore initiated a series of consultations with the principal groups in our society—business, professions, farmers, labour and provincial governments. They will be asked what proposals they can suggest and what contribution they are willing to make to defeat inflation . . .

The Federal Government believes that it has the responsibility of playing the leading role in bringing Canadians together to discuss their common problems and challenges and to develop proposals for their solution. The Government intends to fulfill this leadership role with vigour and determination.

Honourable senators, I suggest there is no way that such an approach can accomplish any meaningful results. It is a modern version of the ancient folly of fiddling while Rome burns. There is no way that the rank and file of citizens can develop practical solutions to the complex financial and economic problems of our times simply by engaging in a few hours of dialogue with representatives of the government.

● (1520)

President Ford recently held a series of economic summit conferences on inflation which brought together some 800 representatives of various sectors of American society. The result was almost 800 conflicting ideas as to what should be done. It was an exercise in futility. When it was over, the whole problem was back on the President's doorstep.

Commenting on the government's proposal to pursue a similar course here in Canada, the Financial Times of Canada, in its issue of October 7, says this:

—the government says it will seek a consensus on how to cope with our economic problem. That has already been tried many times, in many places. Here by Dr. John Young's ill-fated Prices and Incomes Commission, in the U.S. with President Ford's economic summit and in Britain with Harold Wilson's 'social contract'.

None of these has been particularly successful, and Ottawa's new venture will not be either. After all the talking and special pleading ends, the government will still have to do what it was elected to—make hard decisions and provide leadership. We should not waste any more time.

I believe the majority of the Canadian people will echo those words.

May I comment on two matters to which reference is made in the Speech from the Throne? The first has to do with energy supply. The government affirms that to increase the nation's supply of energy it proposes to establish a national petroleum corporation known as Petro-Canada and to take steps to ensure that the price of Canadian oil and gas is regulated in a manner which will encourage necessary exploration and development. It is completely fallacious to affirm that the establishment of Petro-Canada will in any way increase the nation's energy supply. It will not put one additional barrel of oil in the ground; it will not assure that one additional barrel of oil will be taken out. What this proposal amounts to is unnecessary government duplication of corporate facilities which already exist. It is but one more unwarranted intrusion of government into the private sector. When it comes to discovering, refining, transporting and marketing petroleum products, the oil industry forgets more every night than the government bureaucrats interjecting themselves into this field will learn in the next 10 years.

There is, within the petroleum industry, a wealth of experience, expertise and technology that has taken many years and millions of dollars in research to acquire, and which the government cannot hope to match, regardless of its intentions. All the government needs to do is invite the industry to become a working partner in resolving the nation's energy problems, and spell out workable guidelines within which it wants the industry to operate in order to attain its desired objectives. I have had sufficient experience with the petroleum industry over many years to know that such a working arrangement is readily available.

If the government pursues the course it proposes and sets up a federal government oil corporation on top of the four or five provincial oil corporations already established, the serious negative impact on industry exploration and development may well have exactly the opposite effect to that which the government says it desires. It could more than offset the positive effects of the government's proposal to ensure that the price of oil and gas is regulated in a manner which will encourage exploration and development by the industry. This latter provision is extremely important.

Many Canadians are not aware that when the wellhead price of Western Canadian crude oil was set at $6.50 per barrel by joint decision of the federal and provincial governments, it did not ensure an increased return to the oil producers. The fact is that in the province of Alberta, if the tax proposals of the last deferred federal budget are implemented, together with the greatly increased royalties now imposed by the government of Alberta, the oil producers will receive less from the $6.50 per barrel price than they received when the wellhead price was $3.80 per barrel. The result is that oil exploration in Alberta already has been drastically reduced. A significant number of oil companies, particularly the smaller Canadian companies, have transferred their operations to the United States or to other areas of the world where more favourable returns are available.

This brings me to the second subject, which is the government's position in the matter of commodity price determination. In every society there are two bases on which the prices of commodities may be determined. The first is the cost of production plus a fair and reasonable profit. This is the basis which prevails in the free and open marketplace when meaningful competition exists. In order to stay in business the producer must recover his cost of production, and it is to his advantage to keep those costs at a minimum. His margin of profit in such circumstances is held to reasonable levels by the competition he must meet in the marketplace. When meaningful competition does not exist or when a commodity is in short supply, or subject to monopoly control, the basis of price determination undergoes a significant change. It then becomes a matter of arbitrarily charging whatever the traffic will bear in a seller's market. That, of course, is what is happening in the matter of fossil fuels at the present time.

In most industrialized nations, oil consumption has outstripped domestic production. The Arab oil-producing nations have a monopoly on the world's most prolific sources of oil supply. The industrialized nations must have oil to sustain their industrial-based economies and the Arab nations, therefore, are in a position to demand all that the traffic will bear. The price presently demanded has little or nothing to do with the cost of production. It is the price resulting from a political decision, and is part of their political strategy to divert western support from the State of Israel, which they regard as their enemy, and also part of their strategy to become a dominant force in world affairs.

The results are precipitating one of the most serious economic and financial dislocations in modern history. The Arab nations are now accumulating claims on the assets of the industrial nations at the rate of some $80 billion a year. If they wish, they could already buy sufficient equity stock to control the entire automobile industry of the United States.

The balance of payments problems resulting from the present excessive prices demanded for oil are staggering. Whole nations are being forced to the brink of national bankruptcy, and the future implications are almost beyond comprehension. As always, when one group is in a position to exploit others, those least able to pay suffer the most. The emerging nations, commonly referred to as the Third World, are just beginning to industrialize their economies. Such industrialization is necessary if they are to significantly improve the standard of living of their people. But there is no way they can pay the present exorbitant prices for oil without ultimately placing themselves in national bankruptcy and becoming permanent debtors to the oil exporting nations.

Faced with these grim prospects, efforts now are being made to persuade the Arab states to re-cycle their petrodollars back into the economies of those nations from which they extracted them. But surely by no stretch of the imagination is this a solution to the problem. All it amounts to is that the nations concerned will be borrowing back their own money, which they will then owe to the lenders and on which they will be required to pay interest in perpetuity. This, honourable senators, is a very grave and serious international situation.

Canada is in a preferred and extremely favourable position. With the intelligent orderly development of the Athabasca tar sands and our conventional oil resources we can in this country be self-sufficient in oil for many years to come. If the government will act decisively in refusing to permit obstructionists to block or unduly delay construction of the Mackenzie Valley pipeline, we can tap the vast gas reserves of northern Canada to avert a future shortage of natural gas in central Canada. I hope there is shortly a clear-cut positive declaration of the government's intentions in this regard.

Before concluding these comments, may I call your attention to the fact that the present Government of Canada has accepted the principle of the political determination of oil and gas prices, both domestically and in our sales to the United States. The $6.50 per barrel for western crude oil was a political decision. The figure bears no meaningful relation to the cost of production. The $5.20 per barrel export tax charged on oil exported to the United States was a political decision. It is based on creating an export price comparable to that established by Venezuela and the oil-producing nations of the Middle East. We are, in effect, treating our friends the same as the Arab states are treating their enemies. We are requiring the citizens of the United States to provide the money to subsidize the refiners of imported oil, thereby holding down the price of gasoline used by the residents of central and eastern Canada. I wonder what the reaction of the Canadian people would be if the situation between Canada and the United States were reversed?

Having regard to the prevailing circumstances, there are valid arguments for Canada's imposing an export tax if we are arbitrarily going to hold wellhead prices for domestic oil below the world market price. I do believe, however, that Canada has been short-sighted and unwise in the amount of the export tax the government has imposed.

[Senator Manning.]

The United States is our major and by far most important trading partner. Sixty per cent of our exports are bought by citizens of the United States. Mutually advantageous trade between the two nations is now a $35 billion a year two-way street. Our exports to the United States account for hundreds of thousands of Canadian jobs and payrolls.

Canada would have been wise to make such oil as we have for export available to the United States at a price at least moderately less than the present excessive world market price. Had we done so, I am confident that what Canada could have gained in reciprocal trade benefits would have more than offset what we would have lost in windfall revenue, and would have done much to cement good trade relations with our powerful neighbour, from which we have so much to gain.

I call your attention to a significant inconsistency in the Throne Speech in the matter of the government's position in commodity price determination. In the paragraph dealing with transportation costs the government rejects the principle of price fixing on the basis of what the traffic will bear. The paragraph reads:

The Government believes transportation rates should continue to be based on the principle of competition among alternative modes of transportation in areas where there is effective competition. Where such competition does not meaningfully exist, transportation rates cannot be allowed to exact what the market will bear. Consideration of costs, as reflected in the provision of comparable services in circumstances where competition is effective, is a more acceptable guide, and it is toward the achievement of equitable arrangements on such a basis that the Government will work.

The inconsistency between the cost of commodity principle of pricing here enunciated and the what-the-traffic-will-bear principle adopted in the case of oil and gas speaks for itself.

Honourable senators, I shall not detain you longer. I have dwelt on these matters of world concern because they underscore the decisions we in this and other countries must make in the immediate future, and the breadth of the arena in which our decisions must be made. The social, economic and political implications inherent in these problems, if they are not soon resolved, are frightening to contemplate. No wonder the Canadian people are concerned. No wonder they are desperately looking for decisive and meaningful leadership from their government, to which they have given a clear majority in Parliament and a clear mandate. For the sake of all concerned, I sincerely hope they will not be disappointed.

● (1540)

Senator Walker: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Towards the end of his magnificent speech he referred to bringing in the Athabasca tar sands and building the Mackenzie River pipeline. Could he give us any idea, from his wealth of wisdom and his research into this subject, when either one of those eventualities could take place?

Senator Manning: Honourable senators, with respect to the tar sands, there is at present one commercial operation in existence. It is relatively small, producing approximately 60,000 barrels of synthetic crude a day. There is a second, much larger, project known as the Syncrude Project, which has received all the necessary government approvals; construction is just now getting under way.

You have to remember that with these very large projects there is a time lag of two to three years from the time construction starts until the oil actually reaches the marketplace. There is at present a third project in the formative stage. It has yet to go through the procedures before the government regulatory bodies to obtain the required approvals. There are several additional projects being discussed for the future.

Provided not too many impediments are placed in their way, it is reasonable to assume that in the next few years one will see at least three and probably four, major tar sand development projects initiated.

With respect to the Mackenzie Valley pipeline or the various alternative proposals for transporting gas from the Arctic Islands, and possibly Alaska, into the central and eastern regions of Canada, the preliminary submissions by one major consortium of companies have been filed with the National Energy Board. There are so many permissions to be obtained and so many interveners to be reckoned with that it is really impossible to say at this stage when a major pipeline from the north will actually become a reality. Not only are there conflicting opinions as to where such lines should be built, who should build them and how they should be financed, but there are all the obstructions raised by environmental groups, conservation groups, and from people who, for various reasons, oppose their construction. How long this will delay anything materializing is, in my view, impossible to say at the present time.

I would stress the seriousness of the long delay already incurred. Every month which goes by, the cost of these projects becomes a great deal more under present inflationary conditions; and it may well be, if they are delayed too long the economics will be questionable because the cost will have become so excessive.

Senator Walker: I should like to thank you, Senator Manning, for your exceedingly clear explanation.

Senator Carter: I wonder if the honourable senator would clear up a point for my benefit. He spoke about Canadians treating their friends like the Arabs treat their enemies, and he referred to the export tax of $5.20 a barrel on Canadian oil going into the United States.

If the Canadian government lowered that tax to, say, $4 or $3 a barrel, would the companies not benefit from that lowering rather than the consumers in the United States? My understanding was that, if the Canadian government did not take that money in the form of tax, the benefit would go to the oil companies and not to the consumers in the United States.

Senator Manning: You have to bear in mind at least two things in assessing the question raised. In the first place, Canada is exporting to the United States only about one million barrels of oil a day. Of the total oil refined in the United States that is a very small portion. In the second place, it would be entirely in the hands of the American government to determine how and to what extent refiners, able to purchase Canadian crude at a lower price than on the world market, should treat the benefits that would accrue. Whether they would permit the companies to retain it or require that it be passed on to the consumers is something for them to decide.

The point I was making was that we are shortsighted, in taking advantage of an abnormal world situation, to isolate one item of trade—in this case a million barrels of oil per day—from the total $35 billion of two-way trade between our two countries. I think it is shortsighted to say that in the case of this one product the price is not going to bear any relationship to cost, but is going to be based on all the traffic will bear, as established by nations far beyond our borders. I think we are wrong in taking that position and in the long run we will lose more in our trade arrangements with the United States than we will gain.

Senator van Rогgen: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to Senator Manning.

Senator Manning, I agree with you when you say that we are exporting approximately one million barrels a day to the United States market; but this happens to balance almost precisely, I think, the one million barrels a day that we are bringing in from Venezuela at OPEC prices. So Canada, by having the export tax at the level it is now, comes out, on a bookkeeping basis, even, as though we were self-sufficient in oil—as, in fact, we are. We just do not have a method of transporting it from Toronto to Montreal.

If we were to continue to pay Venezuela $11 a barrel, or the full OPEC price, for the million barrels a day which we import, and were then in the West to reduce our export tariff on the million barrels which go into the United States each day, there would be a shortfall. If we reduced the tariff by $3 a barrel there would then be a shortfall of $3 million a day. Why should the Canadian taxpayers subsidize the American oil companies to the tune of that much money a day when the American oil companies are paying those same world prices for the oil they import into the United States?

Senator Manning: Honourable senators, I tried to emphasize a few minutes ago that we, as Canadians have to weigh whether it is to our economic advantage to reduce by some moderate amount the price of the oil which we export to the United States, having regard to the benefits of other reciprocal trade arrangements we can make as a result. If the economic advantage to the Canadian consumer in other fields is equal to, or perhaps even greater, then, if we had to pay another cent a gallon for gasoline in Canada to cover the shortfall which you speak of, it would be worth it. I think it would be an intelligent thing for Canadians to do.

In the second place, I would point out that at this stage at least the Government of Canada has received far in excess of what it has paid out to cover this equalization of price in Canada to which you refer. It has a good cushion of accumulated revenue from the export tax which gives it at least some latitude to reduce the tax moderately when negotiating trade arrangements with the United States, from which greater advantages might be obtained for Canadians.

Hon. Lorne Bonnelli: Honourable senators, as I stand here this afternoon I get the feeling that Senator Manning thinks he is back in Alberta, that he is again the leader of the government there. The question period is on, and he is standing there, doing the great job that he did for that province for many years. I know that many of us could learn a lot from Senator Manning pertaining to oil, and later on I would like to say something about how we might learn from him.

Before commencing my contribution to this debate, I should like to congratulate you, Madam Speaker, on your appointment. I know that your ability, your charm and your grace will enable you to fill that office with the dignity with which it was filled by your predecessor in the previous Parliament. I would like to say many more things about your past career and why you merit your position but, as Senator O'Leary suggested last night, we should not congratulate each other too often or too long.

However, I would be remiss if I did not congratulate our new leader, and offer him my full support as he takes on his new duties. I would also like to say, as he follows in the footsteps of so great and good a man as the Honourable Paul, that he has big shoes to fill.

I also congratulate the mover and the seconder of the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. As far as Senator Neiman is concerned, she has done her usual good job. We expected that of her, and again she excelled herself. As to the seconder, our new colleague from Atlantic Canada, Senator Cottle, I was pleased to hear him speak so highly of the Acadians which he represents so well in the Senate, and I believe it would be well worth his while at some time during the next year or so to explain to the Senate just what an important role the Acadian people have played in Canada, especially in Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. It is a history that all Canadians should know and not forget.

I extend a warm welcome to both Senator Cottle and Senator Barrow. Coming from Atlantic Canada they will, I know, speak loud and strong for the regions they represent.

I should like to say a few words concerning the Speech from the Throne which was read to us on September 30 by the Right Honourable Bora Laskin, as he opened the Thirtieth Parliament. I was pleased to note that the Government of Canada is prepared to carry forward the actions it pledged to carry out in the Speech from the Throne that opened the last session. The Twenty-ninth Parliament decided that it could not support that Speech, or the budget, and many of these promises and pledges could not be honoured. I believe that many of those pledges were worthwhile, and I further believe that the people of Canada thought they were worthwhile. The government thought they were worthwhile, and told the people that they would re-introduce them, and now they have done so.

One of the major issues, or major problems, facing Canada today is inflation. What is the cause of it? As a physician, when I find a disease of any kind, whether it be inflation or gastritis, I try to find the cause. If I can find the cause, then I know how to treat it, and if I have got the right medicine the disease will be cured.

What is the cause of inflation? In my view, one of the greatest causes of inflation is the fact that world population is increasing tremendously. Not only is world population increasing tremendously, but the people of the world are better educated, and are making greater demands on society. The second reason we have inflation is that during the last two to three years there have been crop failures and drought in Russia, China, India and Africa, and the production of food has dropped tremendously over the last two or three years. The third major cause of inflation, in my view, is the fact that oil and petroleum prices have increased throughout the world. This increase brought on a feeling of mistrust among our people in the paper dollar, and a soaring demand for gold and silver. Consequently, all these factors, working together, cause that dread disease which we have called inflation.

Last year I said in this house that I did not believe the answer to the problem was wage and price control. I am glad now to realize that the people of Canada agree with me. They do not believe the answer is wage and price control. So what is the answer?

The first thing I believe we have to think about is the population problem, and I believe that through the World Health Organization some method of controlling the great growth in population must be looked for, and this problem must be solved. If it cannot be solved through the World Health Organization, then it must be solved through some other world organization; but Canada alone cannot solve that problem. Canada alone cannot solve the problem of shortages of supplies; but Canada can increase its production, and if other countries follow suit, then that problem can be solved.

The third problem is the cost of petroleum. Canada cannot control the price of oil throughout the world, but Canada is controlling the price of oil inside Canada itself, within its borders, and we have one price for oil whether we live in Alberta or in Newfoundland.

The government is able to give strong leadership, and by its actions it can promote confidence and faith in the dollar. If we have world leadership, we can show strength in the dollar throughout the world, and this will tend to break the trend to pessimism among its peoples. The government has taken positive steps by suggesting that it will reintroduce the anti-profiteering legislation. If profiteering by large corporations can be stopped, prices can even be rolled back.

I further believe that the government is taking the right step in renewing the mandate of the Food Prices Review Board and enabling it to act if prices are raised unjustifiably within our boundaries. Furthermore, the government is taking the right steps when it says it intends to control its expenditures, and to meet with provincial government leaders, management and labour to this end. This working together to control expenditures will tend to curb that dreadful disease, inflation.

So, honourable senators, because inflation is the major problem of the day, and because the government is taking the proper actions in regard to each and every cause of inflation, there is no other course for me to take but to support the motion made by Senator Neiman for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

For all that I support this motion, there are many things I would have liked to see in the Speech from the Throne that are not there. However, I know that if there were put into the Speech from the Throne all those things that each one of us wants, the Administrator would still be here reading it. There is no way that all the things each of us is looking for and feels should be there can be included in the Speech from the Throne.

Honourable senators, I put my faith in the leadership of this country; I put my faith where the people of Canada put theirs, in the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, and suggest that the things that are not in the Speech from the Throne will still be looked after in the best interests of Canada and Canadians—and, perhaps, even of Prince Edward Island.

I should like to suggest to the Minister of Finance that when he is preparing the federal budget he should not just take a new policy, a fiscal policy or a monetary policy, and say, "That is the new policy we are going to put into effect in Canada," and try to make it fit all parts thereof. Atlantic Canada is just starting to catch up with the rest of the country, and any tightening of fiscal or monetary policy in that area at this time would be, in my view, detrimental. Any curtailment of capital works in Atlantic Canada at this time would not be to its advantage, keeping in mind the fact that our wages, and incomes generally, are still below those of central Canada. Special consideration, whether by DREE or other programs, should be maintained and expanded in these areas, despite any cut-back in or control of expenditures.

One of the major problems of Atlantic Canada is transportation. We heard this afternoon what Senator Rowe had to tell us about his proposals for Labrador. Let me say that Prince Edward Island, together with Newfoundland, compose the only two island provinces of Canada. Perhaps I should say that Prince Edward Island is the only one, because Newfoundland is partly mainland and partly island. We must have good transportation services, and I should like to have seen something in the Speech from the Throne in the form of a commitment from the Government of Canada that would guarantee continuous communication with the mainland for these two island provinces; a guarantee that never again would we be tied up because of a national rail strike, and also a guarantee that the workers would receive the benefits of any agreement reached by the national body. Surely, in this day and age, no province and no community should be cut off from the rest of the world even for 24 hours. Therefore, I should like to suggest to our new government that it take a very close look at this problem, and try to give assurances and guarantees to those two island provinces that never again will they be cut off by strike or for any reason other than natural causes.

I further believe that we in eastern Canada need a better all-weather road system, and I should like to suggest to the Minister of Public Works that such an all-weather road system be constructed throughout Atlantic Canada to improve access to central Canada and to the large markets of the United States, and that large amounts of federal assistance be given to the Atlantic provinces for the purpose of constructing such a system.

I was pleased to read in the press not too many days ago that the Province of Newfoundland is to receive two new ferries to make the crossing from Port aux Basques to Sydney, Nova Scotia, and that ships would be rented to carry the traffic until these are constructed. I hope that this means that the John Hamilton Gray, which was built and constructed for the New Brunswick-Prince Edward Island crossing, will now be returned to that province to carry the increasing amount of traffic from Prince Edward Island to the mainland. I would also suggest to the Minister of Transport that he give very serious consideration to the laying of a keel for a new rail-car carrying ferry to replace the present one, the Abegweit, which is now over 20 years old. If anything should happen to this ferry, Prince Edward Island could no longer communicate with the mainland by rail and producers would be unable to ship their potatoes, turnips and other produce to central Canada.

I would ask the Minister of Transport also to give the same consideration to eastern Canada as he is prepared to give to western Canada. I understand that he is prepared to guarantee many boxcars for the hauling of grain to the ports of British Columbia and to the Lakehead. I would like him to guarantee to the eastern part of Canada refrigerated cars for the hauling of our produce to central Canada and the West.

While I am discussing transportation, I am reminded very much of the air service we have in eastern Canada. There is great need for expansion of the air service in the Atlantic provinces. In order to get home on the weekend, I have to fly first to Montreal, then to Halifax, from where I board a Dart Herald to Prince Edward Island. This great national carrier they call Air Canada, in my view, is not a national carrier at all; it is a semi-national carrier, because it does not even land in Prince Edward Island. When it does not serve all provinces, I do not know where it can get its name as a national carrier.

Honourable senators, the Minister of Transport should give serious thought to establishing a direct line from Ottawa and Toronto to Halifax and Charlottetown, so that people in eastern Canada could get to the central part of Canada in the morning, and leave there in the evening to return home that same day. As it is now, it takes a day to come up, and a day to go home, in order to get a day's work done. The demand is there and if Air Canada is not prepared to take on this job, there is no reason why Eastern Provincial Airways should not be given an opportunity to bid on this contract. I am quite sure that they would fulfil the task to the satisfaction of all.

At this point I congratulate the government on the appointment of a Minister of State responsible for fisheries. We are very pleased in Atlantic Canada that a Maritimer has been appointed to this post. I feel the minister does know and understand the problems in that area. I would like to leave a few thoughts, however, with this gentleman. One of them is that a research program should be carried out to see just what the stock of tuna is in the Atlantic coast waters. Last year a tuna quota was placed upon our fishermen. They were told that there was a danger of depletion. As I talk to the tuna fishermen, they tell me that there are more tuna in the waters off Prince Edward Island this year than ever before. They must have come to Prince Edward Island for the summer, as do most of our American friends, or there is something wrong with the statistics of the department when they indicate that the tuna supply is being depleted.

Secondly, the tuna fishing is a great tourist attraction for Prince Edward Island, and it provides an economic boost to our fishermen. The fishermen at this time of the year receive as much as $900 for one tuna, and when they are curtailed and unable to catch this fish because of some regulation they would like to know why. I suggest that if there is a danger of depletion of this species, we should be negotiating with other countries which are catching tuna by net, hundreds at a time. In Prince Edward Island this fish is caught by rod and reel; many boats fish all the season to land just one. I have grave doubts as to whether the tuna stock in Atlantic Canada can be depleted by fishermen using rod and reel. Perhaps they should be allowed to continue to fish with rod and reel, whereas controls should go on those who are fishing them commercially with large nets. This control should apply also to foreign countries whose vessels come in to our shores.

I would like to see some research carried out by the Department of Fisheries to protect our fishermen and our tuna, if there is a real danger of depletion. I also suggest to the Minister of Fisheries that he take a strong stand and give strong leadership on matters raised at the Law of the Sea Conference, especially to ensure Canada exclusive sovereignty as far as the 200-mile limit is concerned.

I suggest, furthermore, that the Department of Fisheries should establish some type of stabilization program to guarantee the fishermen in the Atlantic area a sound income. This year our fishermen experienced poor luck, poor prices and an increase in the costs of catching fish. I believe that through a united effort the fishermen can achieve a better price, and that the federal government should come forward with a stabilization program to assist them.

I noticed in the Speech from the Throne that the government is proposing to make "O Canada" our national anthem. I agree with that policy. It is long overdue. Most Canadians feel that it is our national anthem, although it has never been officially recognized by means of legislation. In my opinion, Canadians have now accepted "O Canada." It was wonderful to hear it played on the occasion of Team Canada's visit to Russia, and it is good to see Canadians who win medals at Olympic games stand so proudly to hear it played. I commend the government for taking this action.

I also noted in the Throne Speech that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration plans to introduce amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. I do not know what amendments he proposes to introduce, and I am not sure whether he himself knows, but I hope that they will not be in the form of a blanket amendment to cover the whole of Canada from Vancouver Island to Newfoundland. Our circumstances are not alike, our geography is different, our employment opportunities vary, and our transportation problems differ. Therefore, I suggest that the minister should give consideration to the rural areas of Prince Edward Island, some of which are 30 miles from any source of employment. People lose their unemployment insurance benefits during the winter because of the lack of transportation. There is no public transit system, no taxis or trains, and a young hard-working mother is unable to obtain employment because she is unable to drive a car or afford to run one.

The Department of Manpower and Immigration could provide a better service by hiring more placement officers to find employment for the unemployed than by hiring unemployment insurance benefit control officers, or whatever they are called, who go around getting unemployed mothers and others to sign statements, without legal advice, which cut them off from receiving unemployment insurance benefits because they have no transportation. More placement officers and less unemployment insurance benefit control officers in Atlantic Canada would provide a better service for the area and would enable more people to work.

I commend the government also for its policy of decentralization. I refer particularly to the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. I should like to suggest to other ministers of the Crown that they expand their programs to give people in the provinces as much right to benefits in their home areas as is given to those who live in Ottawa. It should make no difference whether one lives in Alberta, Toronto, Ottawa or the rural areas of Prince Edward Island—federal agencies and opportunities should be available within a distance of one day's travelling. I hope other ministers will follow the example of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, and try to bring their services closer to all Canadians.

I listened to the speech of Senator O'Leary last night and I should like to say a few words also about Senate reform. I always enjoy listening to Senator O'Leary. He has the enthusiasm of a teenager—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Bonnell: —and the vigour of a teenager, but I am afraid his views are starting to age a little. The Senate should be ready for reform. We cannot sit on that old-time religion forever. What we had 100 years ago was good for that time. But this is 1974, and it is time for a change. If we can bring forward any change that is better for our government, for the Senate, for the people, and for the country, then let us make that change.

Senator O'Leary is correct in that the Senate was established originally as a place of sober second thought, but I believe, as Senator Forsey said last night, that we are meant to pass legislation. I commend the Leader of the Government for his action in initiating legislation in the Senate.

I heard Senator Manning speak this afternoon and I should like to have an opportunity, as a senator, to see at first hand the problems facing the oil industry and the people of Alberta. I do not fully understand those problems, and I believe that I could better represent Canadians if I knew at first hand the situation in Alberta pertaining to the tar sands. That applies also to the situation in British Columbia pertaining to the shipping industry, and to the situation on the Prairies pertaining to wheat. My own views would be broadened, and I would be in a better position to express myself on those problems in the Senate if I had the opportunity, through a Senate committee, to visit Alberta—not for the purpose of telling Albertans what to do, or of telling Premier Lougheed how to run

Alberta, but simply to listen to Premier Lougheed and others, and to learn at first hand about their problems. I am quite sure that I would return to my place in the Senate and speak with greater knowledge of those problems.

If the Leader of the Government were to promote travel across the country by committees, it would be good for the Senate and for Canada as a whole. It would provide a platform for people to air their problems before a Senate committee, and would bring their problems to the notice of the government of the day.

The Prime Minister suggested that new appointments to the Senate might be for a period of seven years. Had I been asked to take my place in the Senate for seven years only, I would have refused. I would not have left my duties and situation at home for a seven-year appointment, at the end of which I would have had to return home and try to build it up again. If we want the right people appointed to this chamber, where they can share their knowledge and experience, we cannot tell them they are appointed for seven years only. They simply will not leave what they are doing for a seven-year appointment, at the end of which they have to return home and try to pick up where they left off.

If a term of appointment is to be recommended, that term must be much longer than seven years. When Senator Nichol of British Columbia retired from the Senate last year he recommended that appointments to the Senate be made for a term of so many years, at the end of which the title of senator would be held until death.

Senator Walker: May I ask the honourable senator a question? I have enjoyed his speech thoroughly, but does he agree with the Prime Minister's idea of appointing a senator for seven years at the end of which time, providing his or her conduct has been satisfactory, he would re-appoint that senator for a further period of seven years? Does that not smack of making that individual be a good boy, and follow the government? In other words, it takes away the independence of the senator, does it not?

Senator Bonnell: I thank the honourable senator for his question. Let me say that if one knows the Prime Minister will still be in office in seven years' time, one will be good in order to receive a re-appointment. However, the fact is that only twice in our history has a Prime Minister been in office 10 years after first taking that office. Consequently, I do not really believe that that would have any bearing on whether one was re-appointed. I should like to know, however, as would Senator Walker, whom one has to please in order to get that re-appointment.

Senator Walker: That is right. Whom do you have to toady to?

Senator Bonnell: Is it the Leader of the Opposition in the event that he is the Prime Minister in seven years time?

Senator Walker: A very good point.

Senator Bonnell: Do you have to toady to the Leader of the Government, or the Deputy Leader, who might be the Prime Minister when the seven years are up?

Senator Walker: Exactly.

Senator Bonnell: To repeat, the term of appointment should certainly be longer than seven years. If not, it might interfere with getting the best people to accept appointment to this chamber.

I believe that Senate reform is necessary; I believe that some conflict of interest legislation could be brought in; and I believe honourable senators on the Opposition side need some younger support.

Senator Walker: Hear, hear.

Senator Bonnell: The ranks on the Opposition side are getting smaller and smaller all the time. The Prime Minister has suggested that if any Conservative senator wishes to retire he would be replaced by another Conservative, and if a Conservative senator dies he, too, probably would be replaced with another Conservative.

Honourable senators, I hope that as the next four years of stable government go on we will see some new faces in the ranks of the Opposition in the Senate, and that those who are here now will continue to provide the guidance and leadership they have provided in the past. I hope Senator O'Leary does not retire. He has certainly added a lot of wisdom to the debates that have taken place in this chamber during his years here.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Hicks, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

WEST COAST GRAIN HANDLING OPERATIONS BILL, 1974

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-12, to provide for the resumption of grain handling operations on the west coast of Canada.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Raymond Perrault: Honourable senators, if this measure which is now before us is disposed of before the time which has been established for royal assent, it would be the intention to proceed with Order No. 1, and then, time permitting, Order No. 6, the debate on the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. But at this time, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Langlois, that the bill be read the second time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: With leave of the Senate, notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), it is moved by the Honourable Senator Perrault, seconded by the Honourable Senator Langlois, that this bill be now read a second time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, the question now before the house is whether leave should be granted to proceed now. That is the first point. I have no objection. My reasons will be made evident during the course of the debate, and for that reason I do not think there is much point in explaining them now.

As a rule, honourable senators, when we give leave to proceed with a bill which has just been received from the House of Commons, it is put on the Orders of the Day for second reading, "later this day." Now my reservation is due to the fact that I do not want this day to be counted as one day in the eight allotted to the debate on the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I therefore suggest that leave be granted to proceed with second reading of this bill later this day.

Senator Perrault: We have no objection to the proposal put forward by the Leader of the Opposition.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill placed on Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Senator Perrault tabled:

STANDING COMMITTEES

FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF SELECTION PRESENTED

Senator Petten presented the first report of the Committee of Selection:

The Committee of Selection, appointed to nominate senators to serve on the several standing committees for the present session, makes its first report as follows—

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

(For text of report see appendix pp. 96-97)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Petten moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS

LANGEVIN BLOCK AND JUSTICE BUILDING—QUESTIONS

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government a couple of questions, of which I should have given him notice, but perhaps he will be kind enough to take this as notice and let us have the answers later, if he cannot produce them off the top of his head at this moment.

1. What is being done to the Langevin Block; why; and what is the estimated cost?

2. What is being done to the Justice Building; why; and what is the estimated cost?

I am very curious to know what is going on and why it is going on. Maybe there are valid reasons for it, but I am a little afraid that we may be getting a lot more potted palms instead of partitions, and that sort of thing, and I wonder if that is a valid expenditure of public money.

Senator Perrault: As the honourable senator is aware, these are rather complicated questions, so I will take them as notice.

SUPREME COURT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS UNTIL LATER THIS DAY

On the Order:

Second reading of the Bill S-2, intituled: "An Act to amend the Supreme Court Act and to make related amendments to the Federal Court Act".—(Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C.).

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I would ask that this order stand until later this day.

Order stands.

WEST COAST GRAIN HANDLING OPERATIONS BILL, 1974

SECOND READING

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault moved the second reading of Bill C-12, to provide for the resumption of grain handling operations on the west coast of Canada.

He said: As honourable senators are well aware, the bill before us, Bill C-12, intituled the West Coast Grain Handling Operations Act, 1974, provides for the resumption of all grain handling operations on the west coast of Canada. The history of the problem precipitating this legislation is a long one; indeed, one that goes back many years and one which reflects a generally unsatisfactory labour-management relationship in this area of western Canada. However, before going into the specifics of the bill, I will mention the parties involved. These are the Alberta Wheat Pool, Pacific Elevators Limited, Burrard Terminals Limited, United Grain Growers Limited, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, and the Grain Workers Union, Local 333, Canadian Labour Congress.

The five existing collective agreements, which cover somewhat more than 500 grain elevator employees, expired on November 30 of last year. Honourable senators will see that the employees have thus seen no improvement in their terms of employment for a period of 10 months. In the first instance the parties were unable to agree on a new collective agreement, despite the time and efforts spent on assisting them by two federal conciliation officers.

Honourable senators are aware, I know, that the Minister of Labour subsequently appointed Dr. Neil Perry as conciliation commissioner. While the union accepted Dr. Perry's impartial report, the companies continued to reject it. The net result was that there was no chance of further negotiation taking place. Both the Minister of Labour and the minister responsible for the Wheat Board met personally with company representatives, who informed them that they could foresee the distinct possibility of a work stoppage. Those gentlemen expressed concern over what they termed the inflationary consequences of Dr. Perry's report.

Understandably the government took the view that a work stoppage was not only unnecessary, due to the existence of an acceptable alternative—Dr. Perry's impartial report—but would be most detrimental to the national interest. I think honourable senators would agree that a continued stoppage of that kind could benefit this country in no sense.

Consequently, and because at that time Parliament was in dissolution for the general election, the Governor in Council, having decided that any work stoppage would adversely affect the national interest, made an order pursuant to section 181 of the Canada Labour Code—that is, part V, Industrial Relations—to suspend any work stoppage until the election was over. That course of action, taken in May, obviated the prospect of a work stoppage which, for all practical purposes, could have lasted for three months before Parliament could be reassembled to take any necessary action.

Notwithstanding the circumstances existing between the two parties, the two cabinet ministers directly involved in this dispute situation held a number of further meetings in additional attempts to bring about a resolution. Indeed, I may inform honourable senators that I myself talked personally with both the trade union representatives and those on the management side on more than one occasion, and I quickly came to the conclusion that there was simply an utter deadlock that did not lend itself to any kind of easy or immediate solution. All efforts by cabinet ministers and others were unsuccessful, all official and unofficial efforts to end this unfortunate stoppage were unavailing, and the grain elevator companies posted layoff notices affecting approximately one-half of their work force effective August 23 and 26. Shortly thereafter the unions withdrew their services and they mounted picket operations.

With regard to the report of the conciliation commissioner, Dr. Perry recommended increases of 87 cents an hour in the first year and 65 cents an hour in the second year of a two-year agreement, with cost-of-living adjustments, a new pension plan and other benefits. The current base rate is $4.96 an hour.

The government accepted the recommendation contained in Dr. Perry's report on the strong foundation that in the appointment of any outside adjudicator in a labour-management dispute, the government will always accept its credibility and reasonableness with regard to the specific matters with which it has concerned itself. Certainly, it is most unreasonable to suggest that such acceptance on the part of the government indicates anything less than straightforward and unbiased action. Similarly, surely it is unwarranted to suggest that acceptance by the government of this report constitutes an undermining of the collective bargaining process, a process which this government has always been at pains to observe as a fundamental democratic right.

Senator Flynn: It is quite obvious it is at pains.

Senator Perrault: In the same vein, it is to be expected that in these days no union is likely to agree to less than the recommendations of a conciliation report. Equally, no democratic government could conceive of imposing terms of settlement less than those which have been suggested by a skilled, neutral and highly respected expert in the field.

Senator Flynn: It could always remain silent.

Senator Perrault: As all honourable senators are aware, in this case there was no true bargaining between the grain companies and the union since the Perry report was released. This was not because the government accepted the report as a basis of settlement, but because the union accepted it and the companies rejected it. Such were the attitudes that the many real efforts to get the parties back to the bargaining table were unsuccessful.

I assure honourable senators that the government was in no way partisan in its acceptance of the Perry report. It simply recognized that any eventual settlement had to be based on the Commissioner's recommendations. If I may recall the terms of the Perry report, it called for a two-year total wage increase of $1.52 an hour on a base hourly rate of $4.96, which would constitute an overall increase of slightly more than 30 per cent. The companies, by incorporating estimates of the additional cost of a proposed cost-of-living adjustment and a pension plan, have claimed that a package settlement based on the Perry report would raise their labour costs by a total of 61 per cent. This figure is approximately 7 per cent higher than that reached by the consultants and experts in the Department of Labour.

Senator Flynn: You would say 54 per cent, then.

Senator Perrault: We do know that the wage component of the Perry proposals average fractionally above 15 per cent per year, exclusive of the cost-of-living adjustment. This 15 per cent is by no means out of line with other recent wage increases on the west coast, and in this case would leave the grain handlers still 25 cents behind the $6.08 an hour which the stevedores have been receiving for the past 18 months—and I am referring here to the wage increase recommended by Dr. Perry for 1974, which would raise the grain handlers' basic hourly rate to $5.83. One can logically assume that by the time the grain handlers receive the proposed 1975 increase of a further 65 cents, the longshoremen will themselves have negotiated a new contract. Regardless, it seems to me quite difficult to understand—indeed, I am quite unable to accept the criticism—that it is inflationary to bring 500 grain handlers to the level of 3,600 longshoremen, or indeed a little short of that level.

As honourable senators are no doubt aware, the Minister of Labour has announced his intention to appoint an Industrial Inquiry Commission which will carry out a much needed examination of the grain handling industry's labour relations. As was indicated earlier, the industrial relationship within this industry can be categorized as anything but harmonious and productive. Indeed, it is nothing but a history of recurring disputes and confrontations.

● (1420)

Honourable senators will also be well aware that the legislative proposal now before us is one of great urgency, having regard to both national and international interests. With your permission, therefore, I will now refer to the proposed legislation itself.

First, all grain handling operations will be resumed. All employees will return to work. This return to work is not to be impeded or prevented in any way, and no disciplinary action is to be taken against any employee by reason of his having been locked out or on strike.

Secondly, the term of each collective agreement is extended to include the period beginning December 1, 1973, and ending when a new agreement comes into effect or on November 30, 1975, whichever is the earlier.

Thirdly, the terms and conditions of each existing agreement are amended by increasing the hourly basic rate of wages by 87 cents an hour, effective December 1, 1973, and by incorporating the other recommendations contained in the report of the conciliation commissioner.

Fourthly, strikes and lockouts are prohibited during the term of the extended agreements.

Fifthly, companies and unions shall resume negotiations and make every reasonable effort to agree on the manner in which the conciliation commissioner's recommendations are to be incorporated as amendments to the extended agreements. In the event that the parties cannot agree on the interpretation of the commissioner's recommendations, a referee may be appointed, whose decision would be final and binding.

Honourable senators, I would hope that after the extensive public consideration which has been given to the merits of the arguments on both sides over an extended period of many months, and after the long debate in the other place, and in view of the urgency of the situation, speedy passage can be given to this proposal in this chamber today.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, we have given leave to proceed today with the second reading of this bill, although it reached us only a few minutes ago, for reasons with which I will shortly acquaint you.

From the very full explanation given of this bill by the Leader of the Government, it is quite obvious that this is a special case. Though it is against my own convictions that we should deal quickly with any measure or piece of legislation, as we are called upon to do today, this case is an exception, but not one which should create a precedent and be held against us on future occasions.

Quite obviously this measure has been delayed too much by the government, and I think it is our duty in this place to deal with it as quickly as it is the wish generally of members here. The official Opposition will not delay the passage on second reading or third reading, and if it is the wish of the house generally to deal with it today, to have royal assent tonight, we have no objection as a group. It is, of course, up to any member of the Senate to object to that if he does not share this view.

Honourable senators, this west coast grain handlers' strike is going to cost us dearly as a nation. We are one of the world's largest producers of grain. Grain is one of the pillars of our economy. We produce it in vast quantities and sell it at a good profit. That is part of what helps make us the prosperous nation we are. But what must a strike like this do to our reputation as a reliable supplier? How long would any of us deal with a firm that does not honour its contracts, a firm that cannot deliver on time? These questions are, of course, rhetorical. The answers are obvious. Too much of this nonsense and we are going to find ourselves without customers, and, if it is not there already, that will surely bring our economy to the brink of collapse.

But how did this come to be our problem? Why are we as parliamentarians today being asked to pass a special law to end a labour dispute? The answer is simple and obvious: We are placed in this position because of this government's incredible ineptitude. This government has had months and months in which to solve this problem, but it has failed completely to do so.

The grain handlers' contract with the employers came to an end last December 1, but—and now we come to the reason why it is difficult to have much sympathy with either party in the dispute, or even with the third party, the government—it appears that the main parties to the dispute met only three times in direct negotiation before the expiration of the contract on December 1, 1973. How can anybody seriously expect to reach an agreement on a new contract in only three sittings? They met again twice last December, on the 10th and 11th, but still could not reach agreement. When the employers saw that, they broke off negotiations and asked the government to provide a conciliator according to section 163 of the Labour Code. After five meetings the employers threw in the towel.

I really cannot understand that kind of behaviour. Knowing what a mess government usually makes when it intervenes in labour disputes, and knowing that the union was still prepared to negotiate, the employers should have persisted. Free collective bargaining between rational men of good will has to be superior to allowing ham-handed governments to interfere. But free collective bargaining was not given a fair chance.

So the government is called in and it appoints two conciliation officers. These meet with the parties in dispute seven times in January and February, and on February 11 they report that there is just no way they can arrange a settlement. Here again it seems to me that the parties might usefully have been forced to come together more often than seven times between December 19 and February 11. There is a lack of seriousness here, a lack of good faith—unless there is some unknown reason or explanation. However, instead of sending the parties back to the bargaining table, the government, on February 15, appoints a conciliation commissioner, Dr. Neil Perry. The commissioner takes two months to study the problem and then, at the end of April, reports to the government. And now we come to something quite significant: Dr. Perry made it very clear in a covering letter to the government that his report was not to be considered the only fair and equitable solution to the problem. He told the government that this report was an agglomeration of suggestions that might be used as a basis for renewed negotiations. The union accepted Dr. Perry's suggestions. They felt they provided a useful basis for renewed collective bargaining.

The employers did not. So there was never any collective bargaining on the basis of the Perry report. The parties never met to discuss it, because the employers would have none of it.

Why did not the government simply force the parties to go back to the bargaining table? They could not agree even with the help of the conciliation officers. Now the employers would not hear of the Perry report. Why did not the government just send them back and say, "You work this out on your own. We have done all we can to help"? Instead of doing that, the government heard each of the parties separately—on May 21 for the employers, and on May 23 for the employees. On the evening of the 23rd the government announced that if the parties to the dispute could not reach a solution to their problems alone, the government would force them to agree to a settlement on the terms laid out in the Perry report.

These suggestions by Dr. Perry, I repeat, were never intended to be the terms of an agreement. They were meant to be bases for negotiations. Even Dr. Perry admits that. It was grossly unfair and heavy-handed of the government, and entirely improper, to threaten to impose these terms. The government was, as it were, menacing to write the new collective agreement for the parties. That was pushing authoritarian paternalism too far. Naturally, when the government threatened that if the parties could not agree on their own it would impose the Perry report, it was not to be expected that there would be further negotiation. Why should the unions now want to negotiate? They liked Dr. Perry's suggestions; they considered them a good basis for negotiation. That means they would have been willing to discuss the Perry recommendations, to give and take, and to make compromises on the basis of those recommendations; but now the government was telling them, "You will not even have to compromise; if you cannot agree with the employers, we will give you everything Dr. Perry sets down in his suggestions."

What Dr. Perry wanted to be considered a basis for give and take the government was going to write up as the contract. The government would dictate in detail the terms of the new agreement between employer and employee. That was really the blunder. That was the error. That is why we are faced today with having to force an end to a strike. Government ineptitude and heavy-handedness results in our being asked to help the government out of its difficulties. We are being asked to share the responsibility for the government's using coercion to end the strike. Because the nation will suffer if the strike persists, Parliament has no choice.

I think the whole system should be revamped. I suggested a long time ago that this be done. In essential services that come under the federal jurisdiction, in order to avoid strikes we should do two things. One, we should make sure that serious collective bargaining is carried on throughout the duration of a contract. It is nonsense to leave the matter of the new contract to the last few days before the expiration of the old one. Two, we should make it very clear that in the area of essential services no strikes will be permitted. If employer and employee cannot reach agreement as a result of collective bargaining, then the last step should be binding or compulsory arbitration.

It will behoove us to determine beforehand which are and which are not essential services; but this can be done without too much difficulty. Only in this way can we ever hope to avoid a repetition of the mess which now confronts us.

If we make it clear to those who provide essential services that the weapons of strike and lockout will no longer be available to them, rationality will prevail and, rather than let their disputes go to binding arbitration, they will solve their differences in free collective bargaining. It is the responsibility of this government to change the procedure, and if we refuse to support it in this use of force it may be prodded into doing something practical about avoiding problems in future, rather than allowing them to decay to the point where the force being used today becomes necessary.

As far as this bill is concerned, as I have said before, Parliament has obviously no choice. Can you imagine Parliament defeating this bill, and can you imagine the results of this bill being defeated in Parliament? It is impossible. We have no choice but to let it go, with objection on division, to express our dissatisfaction with that kind of legislation. It is ad hoc legislation. It is temporary legislation. It is local legislation. For these reasons we, on this side, have agreed to proceed with this legislation without the normal delay provided by our rules, and that is the only reason. Ordinarily we would have objected to proceeding with it today. This should not be taken as agreement with the principle of that kind of legislation or this kind of procedure for dealing with its adoption.

I am really upset by having to let that kind of legislation pass, but again I have no choice. Government has in this case acted, before Parliament was seized with this legislation, as final arbitrator. I was looking at Senator Goldenberg, who has some experience in these fields, and I am sure he would feel quite safe if he knew in advance, when he had to arbitrate, that the government would in the end, as has been suggested by Senator Perrault, tell him, "You are entirely right, because you, Senator Goldenberg, have had a lot of experience." That is what Senator Perrault has been telling us: How could the government do anything but approve the Perry report, because Mr. Perry was an able and just and experienced arbitrator? But I am quite sure Senator Goldenberg would feel quite at ease as arbitrator if he knew in advance that his recommendations, whatever they would be, would receive the sanction of the government, once they were published. It is a dangerous—

Senator Buckwold: They usually accept his recommendations.

Senator Flynn: Sometimes. It is not up to the government in this case, in fact, to accept the Perry recommendations, or to accept the arbitrator's recommendations. It is up to the parties involved, both the employers and the employees. But the government did not wait in this case for the employers to agree or to discuss it. They said, "You have to agree, or else." That is the dangerous precedent involved in this kind of legislation. I hope it will not come back to haunt us.

We will let this bill go, but on division, and with distaste.

Senator Manning: Honourable senators, may I put a question to the government leader? To save time, he may like to answer it in his closing remarks. That might be a suitable way to take care of it.

Clause 4 of this bill provides that the agreement it extends will continue in effect until November 30, 1975, unless some interim agreement is arrived at by negotiation. My question is this: can the leader tell us if consideration was given to a date later than November 30 being provided in the bill? I ask this having in mind that the harvesting of western grain crops, especially in an unfavourable fall, often extends to the end of October. To move the grain from the farms through the elevator system to the terminals of the west coast for overseas shipment requires more than a month—in fact it is difficult to do it even in two months under the best of circumstances—so it seems to me that it would have been much better if a date at the end of December had been selected rather than a date in November. I see a danger here, if future difficulties should arise, of having a further disruption right in the critical period when the fall crop is being moved to the west coast for overseas shipment. So I can sum up my question simply: was consideration given to a later date, and, if so, why was a later date not accepted?

Senator Perrault: I appreciate the honourable senator's concern about this measure, and I want to assure him that consideration may well have been given to other termination dates. Honourable senators can feel sure that the proposal contained in this bill incorporates the government's best thinking on the subject in consultation with those affected by the measure we have before us. However, I shall be pleased to make known to the appropriate sources in the government the concern that Senator Manning has expressed, and to make known his belief that perhaps consideration should be given to another date. I can assure Senator Manning, however, that the proposed legislation was very carefully considered by those concerned with its preparation.

Senator Flynn: But perhaps that does not apply to this point.

Senator Goldenberg: Honourable senators, may I suggest an answer to Senator Manning's question? Although I cannot say that this is specifically the case, it seems, from reading the bill, that the government is trying to enact a collective agreement for two years. Apparently that was the term of the agreement the parties were originally negotiating, and so the government did not wish to enact legislation beyond that period. I think that accounts for the date being given as November 30, 1975.

Senator Manning: May I add a further comment? I agree with what Senator Goldenberg has said, that this is simply extending the period from the November 30 date in the agreement by another year. But, frankly, that is the point of concern with me, because—and I don't say this as a criticism—the unions, in arriving at these negotiated agreements, like to have termination dates which come at the most opportune time for them to bring pressure to bear to get better terms in a new agreement. For that reason they like a date that falls in the height of the shipping season when it becomes almost a matter of national emergency to have these matters settled.

It seems to me that if the government is going to intervene on the grounds of the public interest, then it should be consistent and consider the public interest right through, which is a different matter from just selecting a date which is most advantageous to the union to get a settlement at the time that the present one expires.

Senator Perrault: I shall endeavour, honourable senators, to obtain further information with respect to this particular clause prior to the conclusion of the debate. I say this because honourable senators are entitled to as full an understanding of this measure as possible.

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: Honourable senators, as this is the first opportunity I have had to rise to my feet during this session, I want to take one moment to congratulate those people who have made some changes in the place in which they sit in our chamber. You, Madam Speaker, are the new Speaker of this chamber and I know from your actions so far that you are going to make an excellent Speaker. The day you appeared in this chamber in your gown I said to some one that the gown was made for you—or that you were made for the gown—I am not sure which, but I am sure that you were never prettier. I further want to congratulate you on your carrying out of your duties so far, and I want to say to you that it is my belief that every member of this chamber has complete confidence in you and wishes you well in your activities.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator McDonald: To those people who have been promoted or demoted, as the case may be, all I can say is: my congratulations and my condolences, respectively.

Senator Argue: Which way round?

Senator McDonald: You can accept either one as the case may be. I say sincerely that it is a pleasure to see Senator Flynn back in his regular position with Senator Grosart as his new seatmate. We are all aware of Senator Grosart's ability, as we are aware that Senator Choquette served in that position for many years and I am sure he is gratified to see his job being taken by a younger man.

Senator Grosart: Oh, oh.

Senator McDonald: Well, I think you are a little younger.

Senator Grosart: You would not say that if he were here.

Senator McDonald: Well, he is not here and you are, so it is perfectly all right.

To Senator Perrault I simply say I am sure he is going to make a good leader. Again judging from the few days that we have been here, he has set an excellent example, and I wish him well in his endeavours to improve the operation of the Senate. This has been an on-going activity, as far as I can make out, for many years, but it is always a pleasure to see someone come in who wants to continue to bring about reform and make this chamber more active so that it may play a more vigorous role in the public life of our nation.

Honourable senators, we are in the process of doing something here today that I dislike very, very much. I have grave concern over what is happening to labour negotiations, and the ever-increasing cost of certain types of labour. I have grave concern because of the disruption that is brought about, not only internally but externally as well.

Canada, throughout her history, has had a pretty good reputation for keeping her word, but in recent months, and even years, we have been losing that reputation. We are losing it in some cases because of strikes or lockouts, and in other cases because of activities that go on beyond our borders but which affect us in such a way that we are not able to keep our word to the degree that I should like to see us do so.

Long-term grain contracts are not new, but there are far more of them in existence today than there were five or ten years ago, or during any other period in our history. I believe that the future of grain marketing will more and more fall into the long-term contract type. If we are unable to deliver our product on time, and when the consuming nations want it, some of the markets we have enjoyed in the past will be lost to us. Who is going to accept the responsibility for that? Well, I am sure the labour unions will not accept it; I am equally sure that the grain handling companies will not accept it; and I have every doubt in the world that the Government of Canada will accept the responsibility.

I sometimes wonder if the system of collective bargaining available today is really suitable to the society in which we live. Collective bargaining has changed a great deal during my lifetime, and I think it is now time for it to change a great deal more. If one looks at the man hours lost by either lockouts or strikes in this nation this year, I suggest to you one must recognize that there is no nation on earth that can afford these losses and survive as a great nation. Sure, we hear of all the labour-management disputes that are settled—and there are many of them—but when we get into a position where we are losing almost two million working days a year, can we afford that? Having regard to the progress that we have made in virtually every other area, surely we can find some other method of settling disputes between management and labour. If I have a dispute with the honourable Leader of the Opposition and we are unable to solve our differences, what happens? We can go to court, and the court solves them for us. We may go before a judge; we may even go before a judge and jury, but the matter is settled. I suggest that some method must be found to settle the differences between labour and management other than the system we are using today. I do not know the answer but, surely to goodness, with progress in virtually every area of the society in which we live, we can find a better system than one which allows a loss of productivity, which is one of the causes of inflation.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the Leader of the Opposition in his criticism of this bill, and, in general, I agree with him. Under collective bargaining, or what is known as collective bargaining today, when the two sides say "Well, we are not going to negotiate," which is almost what was said in this case, in my opinion it is very unwise for any government to say, "Well, if you are not going to negotiate, we will settle it for you under the terms of some report." If the government meant what they said at that time, then that was the time to have settled the strike—not now.

In my opinion, it was wrong for the Prime Minister, the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Justice to have opened their mouths, because this really meant the end of any possibility of collective bargaining. The employees and the grain handling companies were not very far apart, if the information I have been given is correct—and I have no reason to doubt it. I understand that the companies were prepared to give a 47 per cent increase over two years, and the Perry report called for a 54 per cent increase. Now, 47 per cent and 54 per cent are not very far apart. No one can convince me that that 47 per cent and 54 per cent are so far apart that there was no chance of a little bit of give and take in order to arrive at a settlement. This could never happen, however, when the government was on record as having told the workers, and also the people of Canada, that this dispute would be settled on the basis of the Perry report. Who is going to negotiate after such a statement? I repeat that if it were the intention to take that stand at that time, then Parliament should have been brought into session months ago to settle the matter, not now.

As I understand it, this settlement will give the grain handlers approximately $6.50 an hour. What is the minimum wage in our country? It is $2.25 an hour. Why should one man, who happens to be handling some grain at Vancouver, get $6.50 an hour, while someone else, doing an equally difficult job and requiring as much sleep and as much to eat as the grain handler, gets only $2.25 an hour?

Senator van Roggen: There are not very many getting only $2.25 an hour.

Senator McDonald: There are not many getting $2.25 an hour? I suggest to you that there are many, many, many thousands more getting only $2.25 an hour than are getting $6.50 an hour.

Senator Goldenberg: Do you think that is right?

Senator McDonald: No, I do not. That is what I am complaining about.

Senator Goldenberg: I mean, do you think it is right to say that many, many, many thousands more are earning only $2.25 an hour?

Senator McDonald: No; I am saying it is wrong that so many get only $2.25 an hour when it is proposed to pay others $6.50 an hour. It seems to me that there is no relationship, and we are not going to solve that problem by this bill. I suggest that this is one of the great problems facing not only this country but the world today. I suggest that the amount of energy expended by the grain handler working on the west coast is much less than that expended by many of those who are earning only $2.25 an hour, and that this is not a just society. I am complaining about the fact that some people have to do manual labour for $2.25 an hour while others get $6.50 an hour. It is even worse when the majority of workers are down at the $2.25 level and the few are up at the $6.50 level. Why is this? It is simply because some workers are fortunate enough to belong to very strong, powerful labour unions, or they perform a service without which we cannot get along. This puts them in a very powerful position.

My point is that the average worker should get far more money than he gets today, and perhaps some of those at the top should get a little less. It seems rather strange that we should be called upon to increase the take-home pay of those people employed at one end of the grain handling business. If we are going to pay grain workers on the west coast $6.50 an hour, what should we pay grain handlers who work on the Prairies? They are not getting $6.50 an hour. They are getting about $350 a month, but they are not unionized. Where is the fairness in that?

How is it that we give an increase to grain handlers on the west coast, and at the same time lower the initial payment for wheat to farmers by $1.50 a bushel? What do we say about that? Why do we give an increase to grain handlers on the west coast and tell the farmers who produce the barley that there will be a decrease of 60 cents a bushel in the initial payment for his deliveries at the grain elevator?

Honourable senators, let us be fair. We in this country live in one of the most unfair societies of the world. I am not criticizing the bill. I am criticizing a system that is unfair, and one that should be modernized and brought into the 1970s to meet the conditions and needs that prevail today. At this point in time, we have no option but to pass the bill. It must be passed, and the sooner the better, so perhaps I have said enough.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, my contribution to the debate will be brief. Before speaking on this legislation, and since this is the first time I have been on my feet this session, I would like to congratulate Madam Speaker on assuming that position in this chamber. I had the honour for some time to be seated close to her, and I appreciated very much her warm personality and intelligence, and the kind remarks she made to me from time to time. I am certain she will occupy the Chair with fairness, distinction and charm, and in such a manner as to command the respect and admiration of her colleagues in this chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: I did not have any particular personal reaction to the appointment of Senator Perrault as the Leader of the Government in the Senate, because while I have known him for some years I have known him in only a very casual manner. I have heard him speak from time to time in the past, when he was on the same platform as the late Premier of Saskatchewan, the Honourable Ross Thatcher. I admired him then, as I do now, for his speaking ability, and for the argument that he made on the subject he was discussing.

I have not had long to see Senator Perrault in action in this chamber or, more privately, in caucus, but I say to him with great sincerity that I am impressed and pleased with the general attitude he has taken, and is taking. It seems to me that there is being breathed into the Liberal Party in the Senate a bit of democracy which I think we can stand—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Senator McDonald.]

Senator Argue: —and make use of. I think it will show itself in this chamber in the months ahead.

Senator Grosart: Come on over.

Senator Argue: I believe there will be Senate reform in the best manner possible, resulting in a more active Senate, and more active senators doing a good job in this house. If we are all on the ball, the accomplishments of members of the other place may not compare with what we may be able to do here.

I want also to congratulate Senator Grosart, the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, on his appointment. He has shown over the years a very wide knowledge of many subjects. He brings great devotion and industry to his position—devotion and industry that the Conservative Party has benefited from for many years. His words are always worth listening to.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: I could go on naming others, but I shall refrain from doing so. However, I do want to congratulate Senator "Hammie" McDonald on the speech he has just made. I congratulate him also on what is obvious to all of us—his return to good health. The day of miracles is not over. Senator McDonald was quite ill some months ago, and I am tremendously pleased to see him in such excellent health and form in the Senate this afternoon.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: I am sure that, following my usual pattern, my remarks will not be particularly learned, nor will they provide any particular insight for honourable senators. However, having had the advantage, or disadvantage, of being on the Prairies for many weeks, operating my farm and doing the work of a farmer, I might be able to express the point of view of Prairie farmers, as I have assessed it, on this subject.

It is true that the grain companies have taken an adamant position on one point, and have continued in that position. They have refused to accept the Perry report. We now have before us this bill, which will undoubtedly become law in a very short time. In my view, the grain companies have good arguments for the position they have taken. I do not say that I agree with all of their arguments, but they have at least a moderately good case. Unfortunately, the leaders of organizations in all parts of Canada are very vocal and they receive great news coverage at home in their own areas, but they fail to bring their message to the place where it really counts—to Parliament.

There has been a great debate on the Prairies for some weeks now as to what to do about the grain handlers' strike. The grain companies, such as the United Grain Growers Limited, the Alberta Wheat Pool and the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, canvassed their memberships as to whether they supported them in their stand on the Perry report. The reply from the membership showed that over 90 per cent were in support of the position taken by the grain companies—companies which they own and operate. That is the attitude of the farmers. To say that this is the stand taken by a few grain companies does not tell the whole story, because these are large co-operatives, owned by the farmers. I am a member of two of them, and I also haul some of my grain to one of the other companies.

The Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, as Saskatchewan senators will know and as Senator McNamara will know, probably has 800 local wheat pool committees each composed of 10 to 20 farmers. The committees meet regularly—perhaps once a month or every two months—and to some extent at least the management reflects the opinions coming from those wheat pool committees. Some may argue to the contrary, but there is no doubt in my mind that the farmers of the Prairies stand behind the adamant position taken by the grain companies. Rightly or wrongly, they are supporting their own companies, which they own on a cooperative basis and in whose operations they feel they have a voice.

The most common questions being posed by people, of course, are: Why did they take this position? Why did they not simply settle the dispute at a cost of only a cent a bushel? Why wouldn't they settle when markets are being lost because of the dispute?

The reason the farmers supported the grain companies in their stand, as I see it, is that they sincerely believe that it is a very inflationary settlement. Whether it is 61 per cent or 54 per cent, or some other figure, they believe it is inflationary. I made a point of going around and talking to a few of the leaders in this field, some of whom were not at the top, thinking I might get a freer discussion by talking with someone who was not the president but who nonetheless was in a position to know what was going on. The view expressed by those individuals was that the battle against inflation is so important that they were taking a stand against inflation, and by so doing were forcing the federal government to take the responsibility of enforcing this very large settlement.

Senator Goldenberg: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Argue: Yes.

Senator Goldenberg: I am not talking as an authority on this subject, but I have heard it said that the grain companies and the farmers were rather hoping that this strike would continue for some months because of prospective crop shortages, as a result of which they would be able to sell their wheat at a much higher price. I have no knowledge of that, but I have read it.

Senator Argue: That is completely false. One could say it is a lie. I would not suspect any farm group of taking that kind of Machiavellian attitude. I do not believe it is true at all. It seems now that there are adequate markets for more grain than we can produce and export, so one can say we will be able to sell as much grain in the next seven months as we could have in ten or twelve months. But as far as I am aware, that was not a factor at the time they made their decision, and I have not heard it put forward as such.

Senator Goldenberg: I simply mention it. As I said, I have read some reports to that effect.

Senator Argue: I understand. I am not objecting to the question you have put. It certainly has been said, and perhaps as things unfold this will, in fact, be the case. In other words, while it cost the companies and the farmers a good deal of money, because of the peculiar circumstances which have arisen, they might very well have a windfall gain. However, I am sure that was not at all in their minds at the time they made their decision to oppose the Perry report. They did not know what the future would bring. Anyone who wants to play the commodity market or the stock market can prove to himself pretty quickly that he cannot guess the future. I do not really think they were trying to guess the future.

As Senator McDonald has pointed out, the people on the Prairies involved in this dispute have said, "Well, if we pay over $6 an hour on the west coast, then the people at home, our own employees, who outnumber the five or six hundred grain handlers by perhaps ten to one, will be wanting parity. They will take the position that since we are paying the grain handlers on the west coast the same as the stevedores are receiving, or close to it, we must now pay all of the people who work for the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool or United Grain Growers $6 an hour. If they establish that, the pattern for Saskatchewan will be set at $6 an hour. And while that may be the greatest measure of equality possible, and something we all desire, I am sure honourable senators will agree that the inflation it would bring about would pale the inflation we have been experiencing to date.

So, rightly or wrongly, the leadership of these organizations, in saying to the country, to the government, that it did not believe in an increase of this size, and in opposing it and leaving it to the government to bring about, was acting not only on behalf of their membership but as good Canadian citizens.

Having said that, I personally feel that the leaders of these organizations on the west coast, the people who have made it necessary to have this bill before us today, should be in Ottawa to present their respective cases. They should have requested to appear before the committee of the other place, or a committee of the Senate. Apparently, they have a great case out west. Both sides have great cases when one reads them in the Regina Leader-Post, the Calgary Herald, or the Winnipeg Free Press. But what do the people of Ontario, Quebec and the Maritimes know about their respective positions, whether they are sound or otherwise? For that matter, what do honourable senators, including myself, know about their respective cases? I am not as well informed as I would like to be. I do not know all the details. What do we really know about this situation? Yet, the leaders are out on the Prairies when they should be here.

Had this legislation been delayed a few days in order to hear what the companies and the union had to say, so that parliamentarians could be informed on their respective positions, I think the time would have been well spent. My regret as a member of one of the biggest, if not the biggest, organizations involved is that the leadership of that organization did not, if my information is correct, put forth a request to be heard so that they might put their position before Parliament. Not all Saskatchewan senators will agree with me in this respect, but I think Senator McDonald will probably agree with the statement I have just made.

In any event, in addition to the reasons I have already mentioned as to why these people on the Prairies felt that this settlement was inflationary and should be opposed, they have other reasons for being terrified at the current rate of inflation existing in this country. Every time they go to buy a gallon of gasoline or diesel fuel, or a few bags of fertilizer, they find spiralling costs. They do not say, as perhaps some of us might say, "Oh well, we can afford to pay that because the price of grain is away up." What they say instead is, "My God, the price of grain is high today, but we know it is not going to stay that way very long and when it gets back down, as it undoubtedly will, how are we going to be able to afford these huge increases in the costs of inputs in our farming operations?" In addition to that, they know that farming itself is a hazardous occupation, and that anything which adds to their cost must be resisted.

This year there were a number of crop disasters, with a number of disasters happening to the same crop. Secretary of State for Agriculture Butz in the United States said the other day that one of the reasons they had to stop a contract for the export of grain was that the American farmers had suffered a triple whammy. He said the spring was so wet that the seeding operation was delayed, which was a disaster. He then said that they had had the driest summer in 30 years, which was another disaster. He added that in the northern United States they had suffered severe frost damage, which was a third disaster to the crop.

On the prairies, at least where I come from, we had, added to these three, two more disasters. We had the greatest outbreak of grasshoppers since the 1930s. They devoured tens of thousands of acres of crop. This was a fourth disaster for us. Just a few days ago where I farm we had eight inches of snow dumped on us, and it is still in the fields. That is the fifth disaster. The weather has improved so that the swathers are mechanically able to cut the grain today, but they cannot be pulled through the fields because they are getting stuck in the snowbanks. This is in southern Saskatchewan. Those are some of the disasters from which farmers suffer from time to time. This is why they dig in their heels, and say that 54 per cent or 61 per cent over two years is just too much.

Another thing that has coloured some of the negotiations is the feeling among farm leaders that in many agriculture policy discussions they and the federal government are somewhat out of tune, to put it mildly, and the government is not agreeing on many things on which the farm organizations would like to see some agreement. I suggest there is a need for the government to regain the confidence of the farm leaders on the Prairies.

The agriculture policies that have been followed here in the last year and a half or two years have in many ways been outstanding and have accomplished a great deal. There have been improvements in transportation. Large contracts have been signed for the sale of grain. We are getting an incomes policy. We have an improved crop insurance policy. However, even in this good framework, there is not the feeling of mutual confidence and respect between farm organizations and the federal government that I would like to see.

During the last year or more there has been in Parliament a great debate about feed grains. Understandably, farmers in eastern and central Canada have wanted lower prices for feed grains, so they have fought hard for removal of the marketing restrictions imposed by the Canadian Wheat Board. They have worked hard to make it possible for them to go out on the Prairies and buy one bushel or one million bushels of grain, and now they can do so. The Winnipeg Grain Exchange, which was closed to the marketing of most grains for a long time, is open and doing business, and it is just like the grain exchange of old. Prices are going away up sometimes, and away down at other times. If it has done nothing else, it has confused the farmers on the Prairies.

Today a farmer can bring in a bushel of low grade wheat that is frozen—instead of weighing 60 pounds it weighs 40 pounds and he can sell it on the open market for $3, $3.25 or $3.50, depending on the day's price. If he sells it to the Canadian Wheat Board under the policies that are established, he gets an initial price of about $1.75 and he does not know what more he will get later. He is back in the gambling business once more, whether he likes to be or not. Most of them do not like it, but this is the situation that applies to feed grains.

For those who may wonder what this has to do with the bill under discussion, I would relate it in this way. Farmers are interested in a measure of stability. They are willing to take lower prices in certain years if by so doing they can have some assurance of more reasonable prices in other years. The Canadian Wheat Board is still exporting our wheat. I have in my hand The Western Producer of October 3, which gives the prices of grains. It shows, for example, that the Wheat Board selling price of No. 1 Canadian Western Red Spring Wheat on September 26 this year was $5.20. Last year it was $5.65. Since September 26 the price has gone up, so the Wheat Board selling prices for wheat on the export market are about the same now as they were a year ago. In Winnipeg, however, in the futures market and the market for feed grains, we find oats on September 26 at $2.00¾ a bushel. A year ago the price was $1.44½ a bushel. On the same date barley was $2.78 a bushel, compared with $2.21 a bushel a year ago. Therefore, the stability inherent in the Wheat Board system of marketing grain and dealing, as I think it should be dealing, with the Canadian Livestock Feed Board, is basically gone. In my opinion this further uncertainty in the market influences farmers to support what their leaders have done, namely, prevent a settlement and force this legislation before Parliament.

Senator McDonald: May I ask a question? Is there any quota restriction on off-board sales?

Senator Argue: No. If the farmer brings in all the grain he can, there is no quota restriction. On the other hand, if he brings it in to sell it to the Canadian Wheat Board there is at present a quota restriction of three bushels per acre, as defined in his permit.

Senator McDonald: Has this resulted in a large percentage of the capacity of the country elevator system being filled with non-board products?

Senator Argue: In my own district it is a little too early to say, but it is bound to happen. I have a piece of land at Drinkwater, close to Regina—some of the best land in Saskatchewan. There was a very severe frost there, and as far as I know 98 per cent of the wheat in that area will be feed wheat. It can be brought in to the elevators, but the elevators will be plugged up, because there is no quota. We are tempted to sell at the higher so-called open market price. There are adverse effects which would seem unfair, namely, filling the system with feed wheat when a good portion of it should contain the higher grades of grain to enable us to continue fulfilling our contracts and obligations to our customers overseas.

I think the Senate might be able to play a useful role in helping to restore the confidence of western farmers in the parliamentary process, and helping to bring about more cordial relations between the farmers, their organizations and the federal government. Perhaps, in the days ahead, when this legislation has been the law of the land for some time, the Committee on Agriculture might hear some of these leaders in a quiet atmosphere. We might prove to be more effective than the person who was appointed to make the inquiry.

I don't think it is tooting my own horn, and I certainly don't want it to sound that way, but I do feel that the Senate as a whole has an improved standing today with the agricultural leaders in this country, owing to the work the Committee on Agriculture has been doing, and because of certain of its recommendations and certain of the responses made by the government to those recommendations.

I am sure that all senators want to see the agricultural producers on the Prairies receive good incomes, more stable incomes, and we all want to see the workers receive an adequate wage, but there are all kinds of facets to this question. It is my opinion that if we were to hear from some of these farm leaders, and the labour leaders also, we could play a useful role in making it more certain that we are not faced soon again with this kind of legislation.

Senator Walker: Nice work.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Alister Grosart: Honourable senators, I congratulate the Leader of the Government on his explanation of this bill. I received the impression from his remarks that he thought it would have rather easy passage through the Senate.

Senator Perrault: I know you better.

Senator Grosart: I knew my own leader would be making some remarks, and I, myself, had prepared some to support him in case he was not getting any support in the house. However, I was glad to hear the position taken by the Leader of the Opposition so thoroughly supported by Senator Argue and Senator McDonald. I hope the evidence of their new leanings, apparent toward the end of the last session and now in this session, will not tempt the Prime Minister to change his mind with respect to his announced decision that in due course, in certain circumstances, he will be appointing Conservative senators. On the other hand, I have already extended an invitation to Senator Neiman, Senator Argue and Senator McDonald; they are more than welcome to join us on this side when expressing the kind of views they have expressed. It is, of course, a healthy thing that from the government side we have those who are prepared to criticize government policy.

I was particularly impressed with the point made by Senator Argue that we are denying ourselves one of the main functions of the Senate at this time, namely, giving to those who are interested in a bill such as this the opportunity of appearing before a committee.

Again we are put in the position of having to react to a cry of urgency, although I don't know why. I don't know why there is any urgency, because four months ago the minister said, "There is no urgency in this at all." He made that quite clear when he refused to call Parliament. But we are told that it is urgent, and for that reason we are going to deny to the workers and the employers in this case the opportunity to come here before we vote on this bill—the opportunity to present their views in a quiet and relaxed atmosphere to the members of the Senate. They are not going to have that opportunity, and I regret it. I hope this situation will be kept in mind when the management of the Senate, the Leader of the Government and others, again face us with these alleged deadlines.

Many of the points that I had intended to bring to the attention of honourable senators have already been covered, but it seems to me we should recognize very clearly that this bill is before us now as a result of a series of unfortunate blunders made by government ministers. The record makes it very clear that the first and obvious blunder was the precipitate intervention by the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, who is also the Minister of Justice. As has been said here, it is apparent that he did not understand what the Perry report was all about.

Perhaps I may be allowed to read one sentence from the covering letter which Dr. Perry wrote when he submitted his report. He said:

I am therefore submitting for your consideration some suggestions which hopefully might form a basis upon which the two parties could ultimately enter into a 2-year agreement—

The important words are "hopefully," "ultimately" and "a 2-year agreement." Yet, almost immediately, a minister of the Crown said, "We accept that. We don't recognize them as mere suggestions. We think this is an award." It has been suggested that the minister, not being the Minister of Labour and not perhaps having the necessary experience, was confused as to whether this was a conciliation report or an arbitration report. But it was not an award, and he stumbled into this unfortunate situation, this blunder number one which has been steamrollered into a whole series of other blunders.

Not only is it clear that Dr. Perry assumed that there would be ongoing discussions, but evidence has come to light—in fact, Senator Argue introduced some evidence here today—that there are other views, such as the views of the farmers, which have no input whatever in the Perry report. There is evidence now that the workers were prepared to make quite definite concessions. They were prepared—and they have said so to members of Parliament who went out west especially to investigate the situation—they were quite prepared to discuss work incentives, efficiency and productivity increases. But nothing was said about this in Dr. Perry's report. It has been said that it was not in the report because it would have been beyond the conciliation commissioner's terms of reference. Perhaps that is so, but that merely compounds the folly of the minister's intervention in this way.

Certainly, it is clear that the Perry report as such has never been discussed in Parliament, and yet Parliament is now asked to make a decision on it—not a decision as to whether the two sides should get together, not a decision as to whether there should not be a strike or a lockout; but a decision to write a management-labour contract. That is what we are actually being asked to do. That is quite clear from the information which has been given us by the Leader of the Government. It spells it out. We are clearly being asked to translate into binding arbitration the Perry report—the wage increases and all the other recommendations or suggestions in the Perry report.

I want to make it clear that I am not taking any sides in this dispute. There is the clearest evidence that the workers involved are entitled to substantial wage increases. They have not had any for ten months, or since their contract expired on November 30. That delay again is the fault of the government. The government's delay in this matter can be attributed to some extent to the intervention of the election, but there are other reasons as well. In any event, there is no question that, on any comparative examination of the salaries of the grain workers, they are entitled to at least a cost-of-living escalation.

There is also considerable evidence that at times the companies, or, if you like, the co-ops—the farmers or their representatives—were stubborn and perhaps intransigent. We have had an excellent explanation from Senator Argue as to why they took the stand they did. I have read considerably on this subject—for example, all the debates in the other place, many newspaper accounts, and some articles—but this is the first time I have heard the case for the farmers, the employers, in this situation, clearly put before myself as a member of Parliament.

It should be clear, and it no doubt is now, in the Senate that this is not just a position taken by the Conservative Party. One party which has an historic interest in labour matters, the New Democratic Party in the other place, takes very much the same stand as the Conservative Party has taken on this bill. Perhaps I can quote their spokesman for agricultural matters, Mr. Les Benjamin, M.P., who has said this:

Nonetheless, there is a commonsense way for government to intervene and I do not think this course has been followed. In fact, I am compelled to say that the Minister of Labour—

He then makes a remark, which is not a very nice remark, about another minister, so I will omit it.

—acted ineptly when they announced publicly that the government would legislate on the basis of the Perry report. What little experience I had on one side or the other of the bargaining table, when a third party appeared to assist, at no time did the third party make public statements which could be construed by either of the other parties, as taking sides.

Here, of course, is another explanation of the blunder, because no matter what the government may say, there is no question but that the government clearly intervened too early, too precipitately, in favour of the claims of one side to this dispute, and it now has the nerve, if you like—and it is entitled to some nerve after the election—to ask us to follow their lead, and, without any discussion here, without this matter going to committee, without hearing the parties, to decide that the government was right at a time when it was so obviously wrong. Well, as we all know, blunders of this kind usually lead to others.

Blunder number one led very quickly to blunder number two. Blunder number one is the responsibility, we are told, of the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. He had effectively put an end to all collective bargaining. There was no question but that that was the immediate effect of his intervention at this time. There could be no more collective bargaining. On the one hand, as the Minister of Labour himself made clear, it would be almost impossible to expect the workers, the unions, to settle for anything less although, mind you, the suggestions in the report are not a true reflection of what the workers asked for. This is a point that seems to have been overlooked. The employers, on the other hand, were in an impossible position. They had no options. No one had any options except the government, and we know what the options of the government were.

Of course, at this time the crucial thing is that there was an election. An election had been called, and the minister in charge of the Wheat Board had put the Minister of Labour in an impossible spot. Collective bargaining had finished. Strikes and lockouts, because there are five contracts involved, were imminent, and something had to be done. The government took what was a sensible position and decided to sweep the whole thing under the rug for a few months. They invoked section 181 of the Canada Labour Code, and they were quite within their powers in doing it, of course; that is why we made the change in the Code a few years ago. The blunder here was that they said, "This prohibition of strikes and lockouts under the Canada Labour Code will carry on until eight days after the return of the election writ."

The assumption was that they had solved the problem, at least for the time being, but when the writ was returned the way was wide open again for strikes and lockouts. What did the government do? It did nothing, for a long time. In spite of the urgings of many people, the interested parties and others affected very definitely by the conditions that were arising, the government refused to call Parliament. Some of the excuses that have been given are incomprehensible to me, but they refused to call Parliament in spite of an urgent statement from the Chief Commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board, Mr. Vogel. Mr. Vogel, of course, was greatly concerned about the tie-up of transportation and the movement of grain, and so he had sent this message to the government:

Canada's grain transportation system has fallen down so badly that the country's reputation as a reliable supplier of grain to the world market is threatened—

When the situation became more catastrophic, when the strikes and lockouts were again imminent, he wrote the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, his own minister:

Our Board urges every effort be made to effect a quick settlement of the impasse including if necessary the immediate recalling of Parliament—

Now, this was from the Chief Commissioner of the Wheat Board to his own minister. His minister did not act on that recommendation, and we now have the bill which was introduced in the other place on October 7, after an unconscionable delay with resulting strikes, lockouts, picketing, and so on. So the government has clearly allowed the situation to worsen day by day as far as the possibility of bringing the parties together and reconciling their differences is concerned.

At the same time, of course, the cost to the country has been enormous. It amounts to millions and millions of dollars. It is estimated, for example, that the cost to the farmers alone in demurrage in the port of Vancouver will be at least $10 million, possibly $15 million and even more.

As I indicated earlier, one blunder leads to another, and blunder number two led to blunder number three. One who will certainly be regarded as a friend of labour, Mr. Tommy Douglas, has summed it up this way:

The government should either have kept out of the matter or called Parliament together and ended it, saving the farmers of western Canada the millions of dollars they have already lost in demurrage charges, and also enabling us to meet our commitments to our customers and get grain into the markets of the world.

The latter point, of course, was emphasized, and rightly so, by both Senator McDonald and Senator Argue.

I said that the minister gave some extraordinary explanations of his refusal to call Parliament. One was that this would make Parliament "a scapegoat." It was said that if Parliament was called, and Parliament was told to settle this matter by legislation, we would be a "scapegoat." Well, that is what we are, because that is exactly what we are doing here. I remember when the minister made that statement, I thought, "Scapegoat? Oh, yes." It brought me back to my Bible days. I recalled what a scapegoat was.

Interested senators will find it described in the book called Leviticus. To purge the nation of its sins, two goats were brought before the high priest. One was to be killed in sacrifice, but the other was treated rather differently. It became the scapegoat. The high priest laid his hands on the second goat—and I am now looking for the exact words in one of my two Bibles, which I shall explain in a moment. He laid his hands on the head of the scapegoat and "confessed over him all the iniquities and all the transgressions of the community in all their sins." And because I am always careful to check my Authorized Version's accounts and quotations with the Confraternity Douay version, I found that the reference is quite similar there except that, if I may transfer the reference from that goat to this goat, the Douay version is rather stronger. It says that we have accepted, as the goat would, "their sinful defilements and faults."

There is of course a very great difference now between that goat and us, because that goat escaped—that is why it was called the scapegoat, it escaped out to the wilderness—while we cannot escape; we are stuck here until 10 o'clock tonight. So, as I say, we are a scapegoat that cannot escape.

It was a silly thing for the minister to say that Parliament is the scapegoat, because that would mean that Parliament was a scapegoat a year ago when we did the same thing, legislated a settlement of a labour dispute, and the same thing almost exactly a year before that when we settled another dispute. In fact there have been three in the last three years. I think there has been a total of only five or six in all Canadian history. That is one of the alarming things about what we are being asked to do today, because ahead of us are many similar situations. This kind of handling of labour-management disputes by the government has very serious repercussions. Quite obviously the effect will be, as it has been in the past, for the adversaries to say that the easy way out is to throw the thing in the lap of the government. This means that representatives of the union can go back, if the solution offered is not what they expected, and say, "We did our best, let the damned government handle it." The same thing applies to the employers' side.

So, honourable senators, this is a very serious situation, and there is very recent evidence—even today in the Globe and Mail—that this whole business of conciliation commissioners may not work. The evidence is that in many instances it is simply not working at all. As honourable senators are aware, we are now faced with a possible strike arising from the confrontation in Montreal between the Airline Pilots' Association and their employers. The conciliation commissioner is Mr. Stan Hartt, and I am sure honourable senators will be interested in an article which appears in today's Globe and Mail describing his failure to bring the parties together:

—'there seemed to be an unwillingness to reveal in a frank manner the true position of each party' in the hearings before him.

This phenomenon, commonly referred to as crisis bargaining, represents a conscious strategic decision not to deal realistically with the kinds of packages that could bring about a settlement until the backs of the parties are against the wall of economic sanction—

The parties did not make concessions now despite their knowledge that they will have to make them later when a strike is either imminent or after a walkout has lasted for some time—

Mr. Hartt was critical of the appointment of conciliation commissioners or boards when it is apparent the parties are not ready to bargain seriously.

Later on he said that parties may often be induced to realistic bargaining if a commissioner is not appointed.

I am not quoting that, honourable senators, to say that never again should another conciliation commissioner be appointed. Certainly in the past, conciliation commissioners have been effective sometimes, and sometimes not. But surely we can see that if there is one way not to try to solve labour-management disputes it is the way that the government has gone about this particular case. They have precipitously ended collective bargaining; they have confronted both parties with a fait accompli; they have used Parliament as a whip, as a threat, saying, "If one side does not accept a recommendation of the commissioner, we will have it enforced by Parliament without further discussion." There is no mention whatsoever of trying to reach an agreement, and no mention whatever of trying to get any further views other than the views brought out here today. The government is simply saying, "You do it our way or else," and so Parliament is here today writing a labour contract. Never in the whole history of labour disputes has any government gone that far. Never has any government assumed it had the wisdom to write in detail a contract, a union-management contract, in a labour dispute.

Senator Manning has just pointed out what would appear to be an oversight, but then again it may not be.

Senator Flynn: It is not.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps it is deliberate. I don't know. If it is deliberate, then it is foolish, and if it is an oversight then it is inexcusable.

We have constituted ourselves a court, and there is no evidence that the attitude of the farmer has been considered. We have not been presented with a particle of evidence that the unions were prepared to settle for terms that were different from those now being imposed. Yet, honourable senators, this is the Parliament of Canada, and this is the way that Parliament is being treated by this government.

I do not know whether there are better ways of handling disputes of this kind, and here I am not referring merely to the government's actions but to the whole federal and provincial structure of industrial relations.

Interestingly enough, one of the other reasons that the Minister of Labour gave for not calling in Parliament was that he did not "want to make Parliament into a labour court." But, honourable senators, that is what he has done. We are a labour court in every sense of the word. We are making judgments and enforcing them by law, and doing it without evidence. That is the amazing thing to me. That is what we are doing here today; we are sitting as a court without hearing evidence and then making a decision of this kind. And it is not enough to say that a statement from the Leader of the Government, or a statement from the Minister of Labour, very short statements indeed, is the kind of evidence to put before any court. But that is what has happened today.

It has occurred to me that perhaps the minister was thinking there is a place in our society for labour courts. I have given some thought to this over the years but, not being an expert in this field, I have hesitated in trying to spell it out in any detail.

This particular case, however, seems to me to indicate that one of the reasons for these disputes becoming so tense and so emotional is that both sides tend to get away from the facts and to rely on claims and counterclaims. Very often the facts do not come out; certainly the facts are not before the public in this case, and perhaps a labour court dealing only with the facts of these cases could prove to be a better mechanism than the present ones. The court would have to be, of course, at both the federal and provincial levels. I see such a court presided over, perhaps, by someone with judicial experience, having representatives of labour and management (not just the labour and management concerned in any particular dispute) consumers, perhaps farmers and other producers, and with a panel from which expertise could be drawn depending on the particular nature of the dispute. The value, however, it seems to me, would be that this court would deal only with the facts; it would pronounce upon the facts; it would give the protagonists the opportunity to state the facts, which they have not had in this case because of the early, sudden, precipitate action by the government. What sanctions there would be for its decisions, I do not know. That would have to be worked out. Perhaps the best sanction would be the authority of such a court. I am not suggesting that it should make awards; perhaps it should. I do not know.

There are, however, similar boards operating, nationally and internationally. One thinks immediately of the International Joint Commission, which has established a very firm authority. Authority, rather than power; authority of the respect for the decisions of that board. Here again it is because it brings together, in this case, Americans and Canadians in matters in which our boundary waters, and other waters now, are concerned.

I make that merely as a suggestion, only to say that if we are going to obtain the co-operation of management and labour we must have in Canada, if we are to reach the productivity levels which we need, we must have better mechanisms than we have now and certainly a better means of handling a strike than the way in which the government has handled this one.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I would inform you that if Senator Perrault speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, we have listened with great interest this afternoon to the thoughtful contributions to the debate from all parts of this house. I do not intend to speak at length, but I do feel a special responsibility to attempt to clarify certain aspects of the proposed measure—considerations which, apparently, are not totally understood by certain honourable senators.

Senator Grosart: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: I know that no honourable senator wishes to be unfair in any of the conclusions which he may have reached with respect to this proposed measure. In this regard, I must say that I have detected a note of criticism, perhaps I am wrong, on the part of some this afternoon.

Senator Grosart: You are wrong.

Senator Flynn: It was worse than that.

Senator Perrault: May I say in a preliminary way that Senator Manning made an inquiry and an observation with respect to the proposed expiration date of the contract, November 30, 1975, to be found in clause 4. During the course of the afternoon I have discussed this matter with officials of the Department of Labour and have been assured that the date was established merely because the former contract expired on November 30. The clause, in fact, is not in dispute by either party. The date is merely a formality.

It should also be pointed out, however, that the port of Vancouver and the ports of British Columbia, happily, are all-weather ports and they are working to peak efficiency year-round. So the fact that the harvest may occur a short time before November 30 and there may be a special urgency to ship at that time of the year really is not in actual fact relevant from a practical standpoint. There is no problem as far as this agreement is concerned.

At this time it may be of value to attempt to summarize briefly the course of this dispute. Allow me to say, honourable senators, that it is the intention of the Government that this type of unfortunate, expensive, totally unnecessary tie-up will never happen again. It has happened before and it has happened too frequently, at too great an expense to the economy of Canada, to the farmers and to the people of this country. This contract expired on November 30, 1973. The employees have been without any agreement for a 10-month period, a totally unsatisfactory situation. We will all admit that.

I can assure honourable senators that a concerted effort was made by the conciliation services of the Department of Labour to bring both sides together in a democratic way, in a fair way, in a rational way in order to have an agreement hammered out. It is therefore not true to suggest that the government was dilatory in its efforts to bring about a settlement, that somehow the government was remiss in its responsibilities to initiate action. There was no initial "blunder," and that word has been used this afternoon.

Finally, after weeks of deadlock, on February 15 the government appointed one of Canada's outstanding authorities in the field of labour-management relations. He was appointed as a conciliation commissioner. Nowhere in the record will it be pointed out that the companies felt that he was inadequate for the job, or labour felt he was inadequate for the work ahead of him. There were no protests issued at that time; no one said at that time, "Dr. Neil Perry is unsatisfactory to us," or, "He is incompetent," or anything else, because he has one of the best track records of anyone in the field anywhere in Canada. He has worked for the Government of Canada, federally and provincially. Indeed, I would ask the Opposition to cite any example where reports prepared under the direction of Dr. Neil Perry have been substantially repudiated in any of the settlements in which he was involved. In other words, he is a man of respected reputation.

Senator Flynn: This is not the point.

Senator Perrault: Now, let us go through this and find out whether the government has blundered, or whether the government has been unfair.

On February 15, 1974, Dr. Neil Perry was appointed. He spent over two months talking to labour and talking to management; he went to both sides. He said, "Let us find a fair and reasonable answer, let us not have this situation develop into an impasse that may cost millions of dollars." Yes, and he most certainly wrote a letter. There was the letter of April 22, and the report was received by the government on April 29. Probably the one week's delay was a matter of mail service.

• (1610)

Senator Grosart: Another government blunder.

Senator Perrault: I detect a note of unhappy cynicism on the part of the Deputy Leader of the Opposition. In the letter, Dr. Perry said this:

I am, therefore, submitting for your consideration some suggestions which, hopefully, might form a basis upon which the two parties could ultimately enter into a two-year agreement.

I agree that the Deputy Leader of Her Majesty's Opposition was absolutely correct when he cited the contents of the Perry letter. He quoted utterly accurately.

Senator Grosart: I always do.

Senator Perrault: What was the reaction of the government at that time? It was not the attitude that Dr. Perry's report should be enshrined as holy writ. The suggestion has been advanced this afternoon that the government said, "Thank you, Dr. Perry. That is your report and we are going to impose it on management and labour, and that is the way it is going to be." Not at all.

I have before me a statement issued by the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board in connection with the Perry report. This is what he said in his appeal to management:

A slowdown has already caused losses but now, to prevent a work stoppage, the Companies ought to accept the principle of the Perry report,—

The principle being that there should be a measure of catch-up in any ultimate settlement.

—go back to the bargaining table and negotiate an agreement. It is within their power and in the national interest to avoid continuing and further losses.

That statement was not a bludgeon by the government. That was the action of a government totally dedicated to the idea of bringing in a fair settlement on behalf of both sides in this dispute.

Senator Flynn: The appeal was to one side.

Senator Perrault: Not at all. We have the Perry report. That was the basis of an agreement which could have been reached had both sides returned to the bargaining table. But both parties would not come back to the bargaining table.

These are the facts. The recommendations contained in the report were accepted by the union membership on May 5, but were rejected by the companies on May 13. Every effort was made to develop a method of producing a negotiated settlement. I assure honourable senators—because many of us in this chamber are aware of the diligent but fruitless efforts made by people in government, labour relations and in private industry to bring about a negotiated settlement—that the intensity of those efforts has rarely been matched in the history of labour-management relations in this country.

So far as the parties were concerned, the end of the road had been reached. The union said, "We want the Perry report. We want the essence of the Perry report and nothing less." The employers' position, although never precisely specified at that time, was that only something much less than the Perry report would be acceptable. It was very difficult to ascertain exactly what the companies would really settle for.

This is where a responsible government "bites the bullet." The government faced a complete impasse—and more than government faced an impasse. The people of Canada were faced with an impasse—an impasse in which there was no possibility of achieving a negotiated settlement.

The fact that there was no possibility of further negotiations was underlined most forcibly to the government when representatives of the Cabinet met with representatives of the companies a few days after this rejection. The companies indicated to the ministers that the alternative, as they saw it, could well be a work stoppage. The only responsible view for the government to take was that a work stoppage was not only unnecessary, in the view of the existence of a reasonable and viable alternative in the form of the Perry report—a report prepared over eight long weeks by one of the top negotiators in this country—but it would certainly adversely affect the national interest. How, in heaven's name, Canada's interest could be advanced by a $10 million loss—on whatever is the final cost of a protracted dispute—is utterly incomprehensible.

As a result of this view, and because at that time Parliament had been dissolved—and I ask honourable senators to appreciate the fact, as I know they do, that at a time when there is no Parliament, and when a dispute affecting the national interest is hanging over the heads of Canadians, the Governor in Council can take any necessary action—the Governor in Council, having decided that any work stoppage would adversely affect the national interest, made an order pursuant to section 181 of the Canada Labour Code to suspend any work stoppage until the election was over.

The government then received telegrams from the companies involved, in which they expressed concern over what they termed the inflationary consequences of Dr. Perry's report. In a sense they were saying, "Well, we are not that concerned about the financial impact of this, because we are getting a far better price for wheat than we had three years ago; but we feel we have a national responsibility to stand like Horatio at the bridge and protect Canada against inflation. We suggest, with respect, that granting parity to 500 grain handlers in Vancouver is not necessarily the way to stop inflation in this country." But they said they wanted to stop inflation, that they had this responsibility to the nation.

The Prime Minister replied to the company presidents to the effect that the recommendations took into account the parity issue between grain handlers and Vancouver longshoremen, and that it should not set a precedent for wage settlements for other workers.

Senator Grosart: But it has.

Senator Walker: What was the date of that?

Senator Perrault: It was shortly before the election when the special measure was passed. On August 20 the Minister of Labour and the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, together with senior officials of the Department of Labour, made a pilgrimage to Saskatoon to meet personally with the four company presidents. It has been very difficult, as Senator Argue has said, to get the presidents down to Ottawa on any occasion.

The same difficulty was experienced in 1953. On that occasion the heads of grain companies refused to come to Ottawa, so much so, that the late respected Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent, said, "Unless you show a more constructive attitude, we must consider taking over the companies."

Senator Argue: May I ask the Leader of the Government a question?

Senator Perrault: Yes.

Senator Argue: Can he inform us whether or not the leaders of the grain companies were asked to be in Ottawa this week?

Senator Perrault: I cannot tell the honourable senator whether a specific invitation for a meeting was issued, but I can say that every effort was made to move the mountain to Mahomet.

Senator Flynn: Mahomet is the government, I suppose?

Senator Perrault: Perhaps I used an unfortunate analogy, but I think honourable senators know what I mean.

Senator Walker: I know what you meant, but it sounded pretty good.

Senator Perrault: The four company presidents were in Saskatoon with the federal government representatives. Three days later the government was advised that almost all the grain elevator companies had posted layoff notices, affecting about half their work force, effective August 23 and 26. Do honourable senators really think that posting layoff notices is the way to negotiate a constructive settlement of any dispute in this country? Of course not. It further exacerbated the situation and made the union representatives apprehensive.

I hardly think it was in the fine tradition of labour-management relations in Canada, at a time when the Government of Canada was earnestly trying to find a solution, for the four grain companies unilaterally to post layoff notices and say, "We are going to shut down." As a direct result, the union saw fit to withdraw the services of the four operations.

Senator Grosart: Would the Leader of the Government tell us what had been the action of the workers prior to the posting of the layoff notices? My understanding is that they had started a slowdown. There were also acts of sabotage, and that was the reason for the posting of the notices.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator has said he is a great friend of the labour movement. It is obvious that in this matter he has not discussed the problem with both sides. I suggest that he do so.

Senator Grosart: You have not answered my question.

Senator Perrault: I suggest that the duration of this dispute, extending from well before November 30, 1973—weeks before that—perhaps caused certain actions to be taken by both sides which were not really conducive to a negotiated settlement.

● (1620)

Senator Grosart: That is a fair statement of the situation.

Senator Perrault: Between September 13 and September 30 a number of private discussions were held between the parties and departmental officials, both in Ottawa and Vancouver. This, in part, answers Senator Argue's question as to whether meetings were held in Ottawa. Yes, there were meetings, but whether all four grain company presidents were present, I am unable to say.

Following these discussions, the government was satisfied that only two items were separating the parties—the pension issue and the cost of living allowance formula. As a result, on September 30 the government made a proposal for settlement of these two items, a settlement that would have cost considerably less than the 61 per cent figure which has been widely referred to by management, and a great deal less, had the dispute been settled then, than the ultimate cost of this dispute to the farmers of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta.

Senator Flynn: That is interesting.

Senator Perrault: The union accepted the government's proposal, but the grain elevator companies rejected it.

Senator Flynn: The union accepted?

Senator Perrault: The union accepted the proposal. These are facts which are not generally known.

Senator Flynn: That is interesting.

Senator Perrault: As I said, the union accepted the proposal and the grain companies rejected it. Issue should be taken, as well, with those who consider that by endorsing the commissioner's recommendation the government has not acted impartially, and is, in effect, encouraging so-called inflationary settlements. It should be made clear that the companies and the union, in the view of the government, had ample time to engage in genuine good faith bargaining during the months that followed the expiration of the old contract, almost a year ago. It was not until the parties reached a deadlock that the Department of Labour became involved, offering expert mediation and conciliation services. Any government, whether it be Liberal, Conservative, Social Credit or NDP, would have acted in the same way, and have so acted in the past. It was only after all other efforts had failed that a conciliation commissioner was appointed.

I should like to come back to Dr. Perry's report very briefly. During the course of the debate in this chamber, the suggestion was made, "Well, why are we accepting any conciliation report? The government was wrong in the first place in suggesting that the conciliation report should be the basis of settlement." Dr. Perry is a skilled, reasonable, impartial expert. In fact, he served the very same parties in 1965 as an industrial inquiry commissioner, negotiating between the grain companies and grain handlers.

Senator Grosart: But he failed.

Senator Perrault: His wide experience in labour relations also includes chairmanships of federal conciliation boards and being an industrial inquiry commissioner at the provincial level. It is neither surprising nor unusual that the government should accept his report as a basis for settlement. The presumption behind the appointment of an outside adjudicator in any labour dispute is that the government will give credence and weight to his findings.

Can honourable senators really conceive of any situation where a government, regardless of political stripe, after appointing a conciliator or an industrial inquiry commissioner, takes the position, "Very well, you brought your report in, but we think only 50 per cent of that should be given; we think that would be the ideal situation"?

Senator Grosart: That has often been done.

Senator Perrault: Any government taking that kind of extreme measure would be laughed right out of court.

Senator Flynn: It should have stayed out of it. It was none of the government's business at that time.

Senator Perrault: So, it was neither surprising nor unusual for the government to accept his report. To do so was certainly not to undermine the bargaining position of either of the parties, or to sabotage the negotiations. Not to have done so would have been unreasonable and unrealistic. To do otherwise would have been to undermine the respective positions of both parties. The government, in accepting the report, took the position that the report was the basis of negotiation. It took the position, "Here is the report. Put it on the bargaining table and see whether you cannot arrive at a settlement around that report." But they would not meet. They would not come together to discuss the report. It was rejected out of hand by one side.

The fact of conciliation does not rule out further bargaining. It simply means that subsequent discussions have to take place within the new parameters of the conciliation report. No union in this day and age is likely to accept less than a conciliation report recommends, but there is flexibility in every report. Every honourable senator is aware of that, and no democratic government prevailed upon to enforce a settlement would even think of imposing terms lower than those advocated by a neutral expert. If any honourable senator disagrees with that statement, let him cite one instance where a government of any standing in this country has repudiated completely the terms of a report of this type.

In this case there was no real bargaining between the grain companies and the union once the Perry report was released. You could not get them to sit down at the same table to discuss it—not because the government accepted the report as a basis of settlement, but because the union accepted it and the companies did not. Attitudes hardened on both sides. Many strenuous efforts were made to get the parties back to the bargaining table, but with no success. The Minister of Labour travelled to the west coast for further meetings, but again his efforts were to no avail.

The government has by no means sided with the union, as has been suggested in some quarters. It has simply recognized that any eventual settlement, however reached, would have to be based on the conciliation commissioner's recommendations. It is obvious that the companies would be aware of that.

Some have said that the settlement is too high. Reference was made to the fact that it calls for too much money. The Perry report calls for a two-year total wage increase of $1.52 an hour on a base rate of $4.96. I do not intend to go into those details again. We do know that the wage component of the Perry proposals averages fractionally above 15 per cent a year, exclusive of the cost of living adjustment. It should be noted that the preliminary figure for the second quarter of this year shows an annual average increase in British Columbia of 15.7 per cent, so the Perry proposals are certainly not out of line with prevailing levels on the west coast.

The introduction of a pension plan fills a long-standing gap in the grain handlers' employment benefits, and the terms of a cost of living allowance are by no means unreasonable or unique in today's labour-management agreements.

It is not argued by the government that the total cost of settlement based on the Perry report is trivial. It is going to be substantial. Much of it—and this has been overlooked by some honourable senators—amounts to a catch-up in relation to wages and pensions which workers doing comparable work on the waterfront in Vancouver receive. However high the settlement may appear to be to some honourable senators, much of it amounts to catch-up in relation to those other workers.

The Perry findings may not be perfect. I certainly do not know whether they are perfect, as no other honourable senator can know. The government was not an independent third party injected into this dispute. It was not there to study the briefs that were submitted, or to hear the rationale on both sides. Dr. Perry was. His is the expertise; his is the knowledge; his, the eight solid weeks of endeavour. We believe his report must be viewed as the most reasoned and reasonable basis for a final settlement.

Throughout this dispute the Department of Labour and the government have acted scrupulously within the framework and the confines of the Canada Labour Code and the public interest. The government exhausted every avenue to bring about a peaceful settlement to this dispute.

Reference was made to the calling of Parliament. The question was asked: Why was Parliament not called earlier? To have called Parliament for a special emergency session to deal with this dispute would simply have turned Parliament into an easily accessible court of last resort. If labour and management are confident habitually that if they wait long enough their disputes will end up in Parliament, then we will effectively destroy the collective bargaining process in this country.

Senator Flynn: This is exactly what happened in this case.

Senator Perrault: It should be made extremely tough to get any labour-management dispute into Parliament.

Senator Flynn: What difference does it make if Parliament is dealing with this legislation today rather than two months ago?

Senator Perrault: Because two months ago that route would have been all too easy. Because then there was hope that at some time during the two-month period sanity would prevail and labour and management would see that delaying a settlement would cost the Canadian people countless millions of dollars unnecessarily.

Senator Flynn: In what way?

Senator Grosart: Will the Leader of the Government agree that the decision so to do it was a costly way?

Senator van Roggen: It is the companies' decision.

Senator Grosart: I am speaking about the delay in calling Parliament.

Senator Perrault: The Deputy Leader of the Opposition is quite aware of the problems of government, of timing, judgment and so on.

Senator Grosart: A good answer.

Senator Perrault: I believe that in every labour-management dispute every effort ought to be made to get the parties to sit down—voluntarily—to look after their own problems without looking to the government. And that view applies to many other areas of human activity as well.

Parliament cannot be transformed into a labour court. Such an action, in these particular circumstances, would have been irreconcilable with the government's stated position of supporting the free collective bargaining process by giving it every opportunity, every encouragement and assistance to make it work, and everyone would have been far better off if this thing had been worked out between management and labour. The Canadian people would have been saved millions of dollars. It is the height of folly that the dispute has had to come to this costly state.

To say this dispute is disturbing is to understate the case. It marks yet another labour relations fiasco in an industry that for years has been characterized by confrontation, and even hostility. It is a doleful history that includes frequent rejection by management of third-party conciliation reports as a basis for settlement of disputes, although this is not intended to infer that the union has always been blameless.

Perhaps just one illustration of how long governments have had to contend with the rather ridiculous crises inspired in this industry will be of interest to newer members of this house, and may refresh the memories of some senators who have served here for a number of years. In April 1953, when a work stoppage had closed the elevators for two months, the Prime Minister of the day, the late Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent, hinted strongly that the government would, if deemed necessary, seize the elevators. He was understandably aroused by the refusal of the company presidents to come to Ottawa, sending their lawyers instead. Twenty-one years and six months later the attitudes and the situation remain very much the same, and the government is not going to continue to tolerate this kind of thing.

Honourable senators, we all know that good will and reasonable attitudes cannot be legislated. At the same time, there has to be an improvement in this poisonous labour relations situation; the government and the country cannot and must not endure the continuing disruptive and damaging consequences of disputes of this kind.

Therefore, it is the government's intention to appoint an industrial inquiry commission. This commission will have broad terms of reference, and will, among other things, conduct a thorough examination of the history of this industry's labour relations, and its impact upon efficiency and productivity. Hopefully, this commission will bring forth recommendations that will lead to a reasonable, acceptable industrial relationship. In the meantime, to meet the immediate problem with which all of us are confronted, I urge your support of this measure this afternoon.

Senator Flynn: Before the motion is put, may I ask the Leader of the Government about this last announcement of the appointment of an industrial commissioner? Will the mandate be in reference to this specific case, or what exactly are the terms of reference? I have not heard that this announcement has been made in the other place. If the terms of reference have been indicated, I would be interested in knowing more about them.

Senator Perrault: I can assure the Leader of the Opposition that this matter has been the subject of full discussion by the government, and the terms of reference will be broad enough to include the difficulties that have developed during the recent dispute, but they will go beyond that and apply to the entire grain-handling system. We must ensure that the grain products of this country find their way to world markets without this kind of disruption. We must act to save the Canadian taxpayers a great deal of money, and in the process save Canada's reputation abroad.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Senator Bourget): Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Perrault: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Senator Bourget): Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Senator Flynn: Before leave is granted, may I ask the Leader of the Government if anyone in this house has indicated a desire to have this bill sent to a committee?

Senator Perrault: There has been no indication of that.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker (Senator Bourget): Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I should just like to tell the Leader of the Government that I listened with great attention to his rebuttal of the criticism that was levelled at the government on the handling of this dispute that we are now trying to settle, or that I think we are now settling.

I want to say that his speech was well prepared. But I do not think it was entirely his. I listened to it very attentively and noticed that he was speaking out of both sides of his mouth on many aspects of the problem. I do not intend to analyse his speech in depth, because I do not want to delay the proceedings. If the situation were not as pressing as it is, I would have asked that third reading be put over until tomorrow so that I could point out to the honourable leader these blatant contradictions of which he was guilty in his speech today.

To sum up the situation, I think the case has been made; the facts are there to show that the government has put the gun to the head of the companies by saying, "These are the conditions you will have to accept, otherwise we are going to go to Parliament," and the conditions were the mechanics of the Perry recommendations.

I was also interested to note that the Leader of the Government mentioned that at one point the department submitted counter proposals that were accepted by the unions. He said that if a settlement had been reached on that basis it would have saved the companies and the employers many millions of dollars. If the unions were willing to accept terms inferior to those of the Perry report, I cannot understand why the government would not have imposed those minimum conditions as a settlement on the unions. Had the unions accepted those terms it would not have mattered whether the employers refused them, because more always includes less. It seems to me that it is entirely unrealistic to say that, "If you don't accept less, we'll force you to accept more." I don't know if the Leader of the Government wants to correct the impression that I got, but I think that is clearly what he said. I will give him a chance to explain.

● (1640)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I appreciate the comments of the Leader of the Opposition. It gives me an opportunity to clarify my meaning. I meant "country," not "company." I am thinking in terms of the demurrage charges, the cost to the farmer, not the company, in talking about early settlement of this dispute and the saving to the country.

Senator Flynn: I can appreciate that an earlier settlement would have saved money, but I understand that with respect to two items in the Perry report a solution on the basis of less cost to the companies had been proposed to the unions by the Minister of Labour, or by the Minister of Justice, and that this had been accepted by the unions, but, because the companies had not accepted totally the Perry report, this was just pushed under the rug and forgotten.

Senator Perrault: May I further clarify my position by saying that during this particularly difficult series of negotiations involving cost-of-living and pension proposals, the Department of Labour, in discussing the matter with the companies, felt that the companies had misinterpreted the financial impact of these two clauses, and as a result meetings were held with labour to determine their actual interpretation of the so-called "COLA" clause and the pension section, and the information was then conveyed to management that their estimate of the cost was at considerable variance with the union's own lower cost interpretation.

In that sense, then, there was an earnest effort by the officials of the Department of Labour to clarify one party to the other on the real financial impact of these two clauses.

Senator Flynn: That is quite interesting. It would prove the last point I want to make, namely, that Parliament and the Senate are not in a position really to assess the terms, the conditions, of the collective agreement which are embodied in the legislation we are called upon to pass today.

As I have said, the government has put the gun to the head of the companies and said, "You accept this or else!"

[Senator Flynn.]

Now it is putting the gun to the head of Parliament and saying, "You accept this or else!" We are not in a position, as I have said before, to appreciate really what it means in a practical way. The only thing we can appreciate is that, if we do not pass this legislation now, the economy of Canada will be gravely hurt. I repeat once more that Parliament is put in an awful situation, and I express again the hope that this will not serve as a precedent for handling other problems that lie ahead of us. I hope the government will be wiser in future with respect to problems of this kind.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

TEAM CANADA

PRESS REPORT OF SENATE SPEECH—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. Last Tuesday I made some remarks about Rick Ley of Team Canada which were widely reported in the press. In the same report I was quoted as saying that Canada should apologize to Russia over the incident. As everyone who was present or has read Hansard will know, I said nothing of the kind and, furthermore, there is nothing I said from which you could even faintly draw such an inference. I have been criticized for these remarks, which I never made, by some columnists, some of my friends, and many members of the public who can hardly be blamed after reading the papers for believing that I actually said something as foolish as that.

In case there is any doubt in anyone's mind, not only did I not say that Canada should apologize to Russia, I most emphatically don't believe so, for reasons so obvious I don't need to take up the time of this chamber by stating them.

In the same newspaper reports, Senator Buckwold is reported to have said that my remarks were "inexcusable." While Senator Buckwold felt that my remarks were a "very unfair and unjustified attack on Team Canada," he did not use the word "inexcusable." I don't think I am nitpicking when I say that there is a difference and that reporters should not substitute their own words, when quoting an honourable senator, for those actually spoken in this chamber.

At the end of last week I did call the Canadian Press office in Ottawa to draw their attention to the error they made in reporting my speech. I got a sympathetic response from a nice person who answered the telephone. While Canadian Press may very well have made the correction, I have not seen it published in any newspapers. It has certainly not been published in the Toronto papers.

In the Capital Report program broadcast by the CBC last Sunday morning, reference was made to the members of Team Canada being called "hooligans." I stated last Tuesday night as emphatically as I could that I was criticizing only Rick Ley and not any other member of Team Canada. To say, therefore, that members of Team Canada were called "hooligans" is a complete misstatement of what I said.

Senator Sullivan: Honourable senators, I am afraid that the verbatim report sounds a little different from the written report.

If I may be pardoned for a moment, I would like to pay my respects to you, Madam Speaker, on your elevation to the high office of Speaker of this august body.

It has been my practice during my years in this chamber to speak on subjects in which I have some background, or where my qualifications allow me to do so. I would have preferred to have been able to participate in the Throne Speech debate to enunciate a new phase of medical science in relation to a common prevailing condition in the world today, namely, violence. It would not have been a report compiled by sociologists, psychologists—or psychiatrists. I must get them in. God willing, if my health permits, I may be able to do this in the future.

Having said that, I come to my point. A week ago this evening, remarks were made which were singularly unfitting for this chamber. I would have thought that the remarks of all speakers should have been addressed to the ever-prevailing rampant inflation that besets our country. I therefore wish to qualify myself before enunciating a few conclusions that I feel are necessary.

It was my privilege as a young man to have been a member of the Canadian Junior Hockey Champions, and Memorial Cup winners, the University of Toronto Schools, when the Memorial Cup was first played for in 1918-19. It was also my privilege to have played on three Allan Cup teams, and on the Olympic Gold Medallists of 1928, the famous Varsity Grads, picked in 1954 as the greatest team of the first half of this century.

Senator Walker: And you were the greatest Canadian goalkeeper of all time.

Senator Sullivan: That was an era when passing, stick-handling, speed and team play predominated. This style of play did not originate with the Russians—they have their own questionable code—and the goalkeeper stayed on his feet. I immediately go on record to refute with all the emphasis at my command the unwarranted and unjustified remarks made by the senator who just preceded me, not only about Rick Ley—I do not accept that—but about Team Canada. To me it was an insult, not only to the game of hockey in Canada, but to Team Canada, the hockey officials and all those associated with that gallant endeavour of our fellow Canadians.

● (2010)

I would draw the attention of Senator Godfrey to two outstanding features of the play of the Russian hockey team. They are past masters in the art of spearing, and they have no equal in wounding or offending their opponents by kicking with their skates, witness the incident involving Bruce MacGregor. What is preferable, honourable senators—a man to drop his gloves or to deliberately kick someone with the point of a skate? All who watched the 1972 series between Russia and Canada caught that episode.

I suggest to Senator Godfrey that when he looks at a hockey game of this nature he should forget the puck carrier, and concentrate on the individual checking him while the referee has his back to the play, and he would see the amount of spearing and kicking that goes on. It was all too evident, and I join with Senator Buckwold in his remarks.

As young Rick Ley stated when he was informed that he was called a hooligan, "I don't think any true Canadian would criticize me for that. A politician has his battlefield where he is protected, and a hockey player has his on the ice. Kharlamov gave me a bit of the stick so I fought him, and by 'a bit of the stick' you know exactly what I mean." What was he to do? Get a game misconduct from that incompetent official and be out of the next game? Very shortly before the end of the game, this same man speared Gerry Cheevers, the Canadian goaltender, in the groin. It is rather coincidental that Scott Young observed those instances as well.

An apology to Russia? No, I do not accept that, but an apology is owed to Team Canada, the hockey officials associated with that team, to the good name of hockey in this country, to Rick Ley himself and, above all, to this chamber where such remarks constitute, in my opinion, a breach of privilege of the Senate. I resent it; I refute it.

Senator Norrie: Honourable senators, I should like to speak on this subject as well. The hockey fans of my home town in Nova Scotia are very angry at Senator Godfrey's comments regarding what he felt was poor sportsmanship on the part of Team Canada. For my part, I am proud of Team Canada for their magnificent play, and, on the whole, their restraint in the entire series. Senator Godfrey's denunciation of Rick Ley in particular, and the Canadian officials in general, for their conduct is deplorable. Rick Ley is not a hooligan. I have spoken with Billy Harris, the coach of Team Canada, and he told me that Rick Ley is a fine athlete and a man of principle. His praise of Rick Ley was unlimited.

Senator Godfrey apparently has no conception of the tensions, the trauma and the harassment that Team Canada endured while in Moscow. The frustration of deliberate, unfair refereeing was almost unbearable.

Perhaps Senator Godfrey is not aware that Ralph Backstrom played 14 seasons in the National Hockey League without receiving a major penalty. Yet, he received one in Russia, which all observers from Canada agree was not deserved. The honourable senator may not know that Bruce MacGregor took six punches, without retaliating, from a Russian player who hit him so hard he could not play in the final game because of an injured knee.

In the words of Senator Godfrey, "A fine Canadian hockey team lost to a superb Russian team on the ice, and nowhere else." I contend that they did lose somewhere else, because they were so harassed and so tired outside the games, off the ice, that they could not play their best on the ice.

The Russians were superb skaters and players, but so were our men. If we had not had so many jabs from hockey sticks in the ribs and groin, the results could have been different. Unfortunately, the cameramen were elsewhere at these times, but hundreds of Canadian eyes are just as good as any cameraman's. Also, our goalie, Gerry Cheevers, could count on the Russians poking him in the ribs with a hockey stick every time there was an attempted goal by them.

In Russia everything that could be done before the games to lower the morale of our team, or inconvenience our players, was done, while in Canada every courtesy was extended to the Russians. It must be realized that in Moscow good accommodation as we know it is not available. This our players from Canada could understand and accept, but not the loss of several hours' sleep at five o'clock in the morning, when their bags had to be searched by customs or security officers.

Senator Godfrey opened the door for slurs and degrading remarks to be flung at senators in general. The honourable senator apparently did not remember that the Senate is a place of "sober second thought."

HEALTH AND WELFARE

PRODUCTION OF INSULIN—QUESTION

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. I have just read in the newspapers, as I am sure many of you have, the rather disturbing statement by Dr. Albert Fisher, the President of the Canadian Diabetic Association. Dr. Fisher said that he believed there was a serious hoarding of cow and pig pancreases by at least one packer, and perhaps others, and that it was having the effect of raising the cost of pancreases because of the resulting shortage.

This is a serious matter, honourable senators, because it does involve the life and death of hundreds of thousands of Canadians and others around the world who are, in fact, kept alive by insulin, which is produced from these pancreases. Therefore, I would ask the Leader of the Government to place this matter before the government department concerned, and determine whether this statement can be justified. If it is justified, then I would like the leader's reply to indicate what action the federal government is taking to prevent or halt such an occurrence.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I share with Senator Buckwold a concern about this news report, which I am sure has troubled members in all parts of the Senate. I will take his question as notice, and undertake to obtain as full an explanation as possible for the next sitting of the Senate.

FEDERAL TRUST COMPANIES AND LOAN COMPANIES BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Salter A. Hayden moved the second reading of Bill S-7, to authorize federal trust companies and loan companies to increase the monetary limit of their borrowing power and to issue subordinated notes.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is not very long, but it is complex. I think it is complex because it follows the current practice, which is almost invariably followed these days, of providing amendments to acts by repealing the section intended to be affected by the amendment. And that is the case with respect to the present bill.

This bill deals with both the Trust Companies Act and the Loan Companies Act. Section 70 of the Trust Companies Act is repealed by this bill, and yet for quite a number of the subsections the wording that appears in the bill is in substance the wording that appears in the original section 70. But then there are amended subsections, and for that purpose the theory nowadays seems to be to repeal and substitute. It is supposed to be less confusing than simply providing in the amending bill the amendments by reference to certain sections, or subsections of a section, of the act. Other than that, I can state to you in not too many words—although don't hold me to that—the purpose of the bill.

[Senator Petten.]

The purpose of the bill is to amend the Trust Companies Act and the Loan Companies Act. Those acts provide for federally incorporated trust companies and loan companies respectively. The public funds for trust companies come by way of accepting deposits and by way of selling guaranteed trust certificates. So far as the loan companies are concerned, the source of their money, which they gather from the public, is by way of selling debentures and by way of accepting deposits.

Under the law as it presently stands, there is a maximum limit on the borrowing power of trust companies and loan companies. We established that borrowing limit in 1970, and the limit of borrowing in the case of the trust company and the loan company is 20 times the excess of assets over liabilities, but borrowings up to that limit are subject to the approval of the minister. This bill, in its essential and basic feature, is designed to increase the maximum limit of borrowing of both trust companies and loan companies.

The provisions that are contained in the bill—and I shall tell you about them shortly—are designed to protect the public, the creditors and, I suppose you might even say, the shareholders. The increase in the borrowing limit is justified according to certain tests or certain standards, the first of which is that the minister may not permit an increase in the borrowing limit above 20 times the excess of assets over liabilities unless he is satisfied that the financial condition of the company complies with the standards which are established by regulation.

The other provision involves the introduction of a new element into trust companies and loan companies. This element we put into the Bank Act at the last revision, when we permitted banks to issue what are called subordinated debentures. Here, in both the Trust Companies Act revisions, which run from page 1 to page 7, and the Loan Companies Act revisions, which run from page 7 to the end, you will find the definition of a "subordinated note" and a "subordinated shareholder loan". The subordinated note is part of the rule which governs the determination of whether the borrowing limit will be raised above 20 times the excess of assets over liabilities. This is the way it works. If you look on page 4, you will find there subsection (10) of the proposed new section 70 of the Trust Companies Act, under which the minister must satisfy himself that the financial conditions meet the standards established by regulation. Then subsection (11) provides:

Where the Minister approves or prescribes a limit greater than twenty times the excess of the company's assets over its liabilities, the company shall maintain outstanding subordinated notes issued by the company and having more than one year to run to maturity, in an amount not less than such proportion, if any, as the Minister may from time to time specify of the amount by which

(a) the aggregate of the amounts of money borrowed and the guaranteed trust money held by the company

(b) twenty times the excess of the company's assets over its liabilities.

These are the criteria by which the minister will determine the borrowing limit in relation to trust companies—and I can say that the same borrowing limit is prescribed in the sections that deal with loan companies. These are the tests that must be applied.

● (2030)

The increase in the borrowing limit of trust companies is found on page 5, where there is a long formula that is continued on page 6. The effect of it is that the aggregate of the amounts of money borrowed and the guaranteed trust money held by a trust company may at any time exceed the limit otherwise imposed by or under this section—and that is up to 20 times—by an amount not greater than the amount by which the cash and other elements which secure the liquid assets of a trust company exceed 20 per cent of the liabilities of the trust company. In other words, if I might use an expression which I have made a note of here, it is the extent to which the highly liquid assets of the company—in this case the trust company—exceed 20 times the present minimum under the act of the excess of assets over liabilities.

Honourable senators, I hope I have not been too free in my paraphrasing of this page, but I am satisfied that I have given a correct interpretation of it, and of what the plan is in order to support an increase in the lending limit above 20 times the excess of assets over liabilities.

There is an alternative provision that is applicable to both the trust company and the loan company. It is an alternative to the choice I have just explained, and it is set out at the bottom of page 5, where it says:

(b) subject to such terms and conditions as the Minister deems appropriate, by an amount not greater than the sum of

(i) the amount calculated under paragraph (a), and—

That is the formula I just talked about, the highly liquid asset comparison.

(ii) the product obtained by multiplying the outstanding amount of subordinated shareholder loans by the limit approved or prescribed by the Minister under this section—

What this does is to import the subordinated shareholder loans; it makes them part of the capital base in arriving at the top limit of the borrowing power of the trust company, and in the same degree, as you will see later in subsequent sections, this applies in the case of loan companies.

I have not referred to the definitions of “subordinated note” and “subordinated shareholder loan”, but they are there and they are quite simple to read. In the order of priority, when it comes to their ranking against the assets of the company, the subordinated note ranks second to last, and the subordinated shareholder loan ranks last, in the order of any claims, if such a situation should develop, against the assets of a trust company. The same rule applies in relation to loan companies.

That, honourable senators, is a brief explanation of what I call the core of this bill. There are other clauses that I might refer to briefly, but the purpose of the bill is to increase the borrowing limit of trust companies and loan companies. The reason for that, as I understand it, is that many of the loan companies, which up until 1970 operated under the 15 times rule, have since 1970 been operating in a period of expansion, in a period of substantial availability of money, but also in a period of high cost money, and the problem of meshing all those together is quite considerable.

I have deliberately not referred to the other sources of incomes which trust companies have. As you know, they have sources of income due to the infinite variety of services that they perform—trusts that they carry on and administer, and their functions as transfer agents. They also act as trustees in connection with sinking fund administration, and that sort of thing, which also produces money. I saw a statement recently—I think it was in the Financial Post—which indicated the almost infinite variety of functions involved in the operation of trust companies. For instance, for one trust company a substantial part of its income may be derived from these various services I have enumerated and from the collection of interest on the moneys they invest. So far as other companies are concerned, a substantial part of their income may come from straight mortgage investment. The attempt here is to arrive at a plan that will meet all these situations.

In representations made to the Department of Finance and the Superintendent of Insurance, many of the trust companies are now asking that the borrowing limit be increased, because they have expanded up to that 20 times limit, and in the public interest this should be given some attention. I say this because the moneys of the trust companies and the moneys of the loan companies are an important source of funds for residential mortgages, and it is expected that these amendments may enable these companies to expand their lending facilities while still maintaining their stability, by reason of the tests which have to be applied, and permit them to move up above the 20-times limit.

I have here an item of information which may be of interest to you. There is at the present time a total of 17 federally incorporated trust companies in Canada, and their assets have a value of $3½ billion. There are also in Canada today federally incorporated loan companies to the number of 14, and their assets at this time total $3¼ billion. So in both cases there is a very substantial pot of money. If it can be given the proper direction, so as to be permitted to continue in the direction in which it is going, in an area that is much needed today—that is, in the financing of private residences—it is felt that this is in the public interest.

There are several points on which I have not touched, and perhaps I should do so very briefly. I have commented on the core of the bill, in informing you of its purpose. I have read and re-read this bill a number of times, and have gone back to the “bible,” the Loan Companies Act and the Trust Companies Act, which forms the governing base to which these amendments are added. I believe, therefore, that I have a fair understanding of the law in that regard and the scope of the act, its purpose and how it works.

In my opinion, however, the real test is that which must be followed before that 20 times limit can be increased at all. Mind you, even if it is desired to increase borrowings to the 20 times limit, the minister must approve. First, the directors must pass a by-law, then three-quarters of the shareholders must vote and pass such by-law, which can provide under this bill for any borrowing limit, and the directors, if the by-law is so drawn, can raise the limit seriatim. The basic limit for trust companies is 13½ times the excess of assets over liabilities, and for loan companies it is four times the excess of assets over liabilities.

Senator Walker: Excuse my interrupting, but may I ask what it is for banks?

Senator Hayden: I am sorry, I do not have that information. I will obtain it and pass it along to you.

I was about to say that in the case of both trust companies and loan companies the directors may attempt to increase the borrowing limit in the by-law by the full permissible amount, and trust that the minister will approve. If he does not approve, then it is not effective for any purpose. Remember also that the minister has the power to lower the 20 times limit, if that is the figure contained in the by-law, but he cannot lower it below 13½ times the excess of assets over liabilities. Whatever the directors may do in the way of stipulating what the borrowing limit should be, it cannot become enforced without the approval of the minister.

Secondly, the minister cannot recognize an increase of more than 20 times the excess of assets over liabilities without meeting the criteria which I have just described to you.

It would appear, therefore, that from all the different angles the situation has been well covered in relation to checking on the stability of these financial institutions, and ensuring that their financial state is such that will permit these increases, within limits all the time, where the minister himself, on the recommendation of the Superintendent in some cases, will have a hand in the determination before it can really become effective.

This may be a good time to sit down, but the—Senator Walker: May I ask my friend one further question? How will the bill affect the borrowing powers of the provincially incorporated trust and loan companies?

Senator Hayden: It does not.

Senator Walker: It does not at all?

Senator Hayden: No, it deals only with federally incorporated companies, because the Trust Companies Act and the Loan Companies Act are federal statutes. So they do not step over the line here. It is hoped that by persuasion or by the need to be at a proper level of competition with the federally incorporated companies, the provincially incorporated companies will move up in the same fashion. In my opinion, that is a fair assumption to make. I do not believe you could describe it as just a pious hope.

I should tell you that there is a provision enabling the Governor in Council to make regulations respecting the establishment of standards for the purpose of the minister's determination as to whether the financial condition of the trust company or the loan company meets certain standards of financial worth. The only thought I have in that regard is that we do not know what standards will be established by regulation. I did presume to have a chat with the Superintendent of Insurance, who I believe is most highly regarded by all the committees and by everyone in this house and outside. His explanation to me was that the rules which the department applies annually in assessing the status and the real financial worth of these companies will not necessarily be those which will be incorporated into the regulations. This bill and the provisions to increase the borrowing limit are designed to produce some flexibility. It is expected that the condition that would make the application of this increase in the borrowing limit advisable is to govern the situation where suddenly a trust company or a loan company finds itself crushing against the top limit of its borrowing. How does it meet that, and how much time does it have to meet it? In the financing of these days, you know, it could take three, four or five months to prepare all the necessary material, the prospectus, and obtain clearances.

The design of this bill, therefore, is to provide the means, or a vehicle, however you wish to express it, by which the trust company can stay on base while it is searching for and perfecting whatever machinery is required in order to raise more capital, or to secure more in the way of subordinated shareholder loans, because the subordinated shareholder loans, being at the base of the ladder and having everything else up above them, are the closest thing to share capital.

This is a question which, in my opinion, we should discuss with the Superintendent in committee. We should have the details of the rules which are followed ordinarily in the examination of the returns of trust companies and loan companies. We should also have some indication from him as to the direction and the extent to which he feels these standards, for purposes of determining the financial condition of a trust company or a loan company, should be applied by the minister in making that determination. I can readily see how it would be, I would say, an impossibility to include this in a bill, because to do so would defeat the flexibility.

I suppose we should be thankful for small favours. Instead of providing in this bill that the minister may establish regulations, it does say that the Governor in Council may do so, so I suppose in that way we escape from what we have been calling ministerial discretion. It is rather the discretion reflected in the regulations passed by the Governor in Council. So if there is discretion, it is the discretion of the combination of all the ministers, to the extent that they apply themselves to this particular question.

I have not attempted to give you the details, the terms and conditions of the subordinated notes, because they are set out clearly in the bill before you. In relation to loan companies, you will find those definitions set out on page 9; in relation to trust companies, you will find them set out on page 2. Whoever reads them will easily get an understanding of the terms and conditions.

I note that the denomination of a subordinated note cannot be less than $25,000. The reason for that, perhaps, relates to the places which they hope will provide a market for the securities. It is not the sort of thing that would appeal to Mr. Average Investor. The institutional market may be the one they are looking to; I do not know. That is just speculation on my part.

[Senator Hayden]

Other than that, there are things which, while they may be important, are not really matters of substance. I think I have dealt with what might be called matters of substance. This is an important bill, and we should get the benefit of the evidence of the Superintendent of Insurance in relation to it. Of course, if any of the trust companies or loan companies wish to have their officials appear before the committee, we shall be very happy to hear from them.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, before making some remarks, may I assume that after second reading this bill will be referred to Senator Hayden's committee, the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce?

Senator Hayden: Well, it will be referred to that committee, but as of this moment the First Report of the Committee of Selection has not been approved, so it is not my committee.

Senator Walker: Senator Hayden never leaves himself open. That was such a simple and yet explicit and understandable resumé of this bill, it ill behooves me to take the time of the Senate to go over it again. We will have an opportunity in committee to conduct a clause-by-clause examination of the bill. It seems to me that the overall pattern of this bill, making provision for increasing the borrowing limits in an amount exceeding the present maximum of 20 times the excess of the company's assets over its liabilities, is justified, particularly with all the safeguards and conditions set out in the bill. It is long overdue. That is really the be all and the end all of this bill. Certainly, under all the circumstances prevailing in the marketplace at the present time, it is necessary. I think we on this side are in favour of it. There are some details which we do not understand at the moment, but this is not the place to keep pestering Senator Hayden with questions. He has given the chamber a very clear and satisfactory explanation of the bill. It is very, very seldom that I agree with him, but I do tonight.

Senator Hayden: I can now provide my friend with the information he requested as to the limit in relation to banks. There is no statutory limit with respect to borrowing on the part of banks.

Senator Walker: But they are subject to the Bank of Canada Act, are they not?

Senator Hayden: I am referring now to subordinated debentures.

Senator Walker: Yes. The other thing I wanted to say in relation to this bill is that the safeguards are manifold and, I would think, very satisfactory.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I find I am a member of an advisory board of a federally incorporated trust company. This may be considered a possible conflict of interest. I therefore want my fellow senators to know that I am declaring myself as such and, as a result, I shall not participate in this debate.

Senator Hayden: Honourable senators, as soon as the First Report of the Committee of Selection has been adopted, I intend to move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Hayden: Later this day.

Motion agreed to and bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day.

SUPREME COURT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the second reading of Bill S-2, to amend the Supreme Court Act and to make related amendments to the Federal Court Act.

He said: Honourable senators, before I come to the bill itself I should like to say to the Leader of the Government (Senator Perrault) how delighted I am, as I am sure all senators are, at the number of bills he has been able to secure for introduction in the Senate at this stage. It is an extremely good practice. We are a legislative body, and the more we practice the art of legislating and the more opportunities we have to introduce bills in this chamber in the first instance, the greater will be the efficiency of Parliament and the quality of the legislation that is produced by Parliament. I want to add my tributes to those that have already been paid to the Leader of the Government for his efforts in this regard.

Honourable senators, Bill S-2 proposes to amend the act which is known as Chapter S-19 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, as amended by Chapter 44 of the 1st Supplement to the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970. The purpose of the bill is threefold. First of all, it is to allow judges of the Supreme Court of Canada and the Registrar and Deputy Registrar of the court to reside either within the National Capital Region or within 25 miles thereof. Honourable senators will remember that originally the judges of the federal courts had by statute to reside in the City of Ottawa. That seems to be an impractical kind of proposal to have in a statute of this kind. This gives a little more leeway to judges and to the Registrar and Deputy Registrar as to where they might buy property in which to live. Probably some of the outer limits are a little impractical. A judge could live in Renfrew, Perth, Cornwall, Alfred, Montebello or Gracefield. But the practical application of this is that he is not required to live within the city limits of Ottawa.

The second purpose of the bill is to allow interest on judgments in the Supreme Court of Canada in respect of certain awards of money. These are awards made in the Supreme Court of Canada in appeals from lower courts where no award of money was made—where the award of money was denied. This simple section provides that interest will run on judgments issued by the Supreme Court of Canada in such cases from the time of the original application to the lower courts.

The third and most important of the amendments to be made is to restrict appeals to the Supreme Court of Canada to cases in which leave to appeal has been granted. May I draw the attention of the Senate first of all to the fact that this amendment, restricting appeals to cases where leave to appeal has been granted, applies to civil cases only. It does not apply to criminal appeals and it does not apply to references. The rules with respect to criminal appeals and references which have been in force heretofore will continue to apply.

I think in the first instance one should ask why this particular amendment is being sought. A number of years ago it was discovered that there was an excessive case load in the Supreme Court of Canada. There was an overload of work for the court and for the judges who composed the court. There was a tremendous carryover of cases from one session of the court to another, and as a result there was great delay in getting judgments in cases that had to be heard.

In 1972, the Honourable John Turner, when he was Minister of Justice, asked the then President of the Canadian Bar Association, Mr. John Farris, now Chief Justice Farris, and the son of one of our former colleagues here, to have a committee of the Canadian Bar Association appointed to study, and to advise the minister on, the problems of the case overload and the delays in the Supreme Court of Canada. I think I should put on record the fact that the committee was composed of eminent Queen's counsel from many parts of Canada. The chairman was B. J. MacKinnon, Q.C. of Ontario; from British Columbia there was G. S. Cumming, Q.C.; from Alberta, J. H. Laycraft, Q.C.; from Manitoba, Keith Turner, Q.C., from Quebec, François Mercier, Q.C.; and from New Brunswick, D. M. Gillis, Q.C. Mr. Norman Smith of the Ottawa Journal was also appointed a member of this committee. The research director was Professor W. R. Lederman of Queen's University, formerly the Dean of Law at that university. The committee reported some time late in 1973, and I shall outline briefly what it had to say about the problem.

On the question of the establishment and the production of the courts they had a good many things to say. For example, honourable senators know that the court is composed of nine judges. What everybody does not know is that they sit an average of 208 days a year in three sessions—the winter session which begins in January, the spring session which begins in April, and the fall session which begins in October.

Under section 25 of the Supreme Court Act the court is required to have a quorum of five, but the court sometimes sits with a panel of seven, and sometimes, in very important constitutional and other cases of that order, with a panel of nine. The average number of judgments issued by the court each year is approximately 120. For example, between 1961 and 1971, the low was 101 judgments in 1961; the high was 134 in 1968.

This establishment and this production compares very much with the establishment and production of the Supreme Court of the United States, where there are also nine judges, and where the number of judgments issued every year is approximately 120. It compares favourably, too, with the highest courts of appeal in the United Kingdom, namely, the House of Lords and the Privy Council, where some 60 to 80 judgments on average are released each year.

Of the 120 cases upon which judgment is pronounced in the Supreme Court of Canada each year, and particularly between the years 1961 and 1971, 20 per cent, or approximately 24 of the judgments, were before the court because the court had given leave for the case to be there. Otherwise, it would not have qualified as there would not have been an automatic right of appeal. If the court gave leave, then the appeal would lie. This means that 80 per cent of the cases, or some 96 of the cases heard by the court, were there because the case could be appealed as of right. Later, I will outline some of the conditions for appealing as of right heretofore. All of that 80 per cent, of course, would not be civil appeals; some would be criminal appeals and there would be a few references, as references were proposed for consideration of the court.

Referring again to the report of the Canadian Bar Association, I should like to say something of what they found about the kind of congestion that was beginning to develop in the court. Remember, the average number of judgments issued each year, as I have said, has been about 120. In 1973, for the spring term, a term that would be about 65 days in length, 200 appeals had been lodged—had been before the court at the opening of that term—of which 100 were ready, 77 were set down, and 40 to 50 were heard.

The committee also commented that starting in 1970 the overload of cases inscribed was beyond the reasonable maximum. The average carryover per session at that time was approximately 34 cases. In 1972 the actual carryover for each session—winter, spring and fall—was, respectively, 62, 52 and 43 cases. The only control the court had over the volume of work submitted to it was in cases where leave to appeal was required.

Honourable senators, particularly those who are lawyers, might wonder where these delays developed. The committee found that from the date that a notice of appeal was prepared and issued until the date of hearing, some two years would have to elapse. There would be emergencies, of course, in which the delays would be shortened—and they were shortened—but the average length of time required to have a case before the court for hearing was two years. The committee also found that, between the date of hearing and the date of judgment, in the majority of cases less than six months would elapse. This meant that the court was very assiduous in getting out its judgments. Honourable senators who are acquainted with these judges know that that is because a good many of their reasons for judgment are prepared during the holidays—the long summer vacation and the Christmas and Easter vacations.

The committee found that the root of the trouble, or the reason for the congestion in the court, was that under section 36 of the act there were too many appeals being launched.

I have said already that 80 per cent of the cases heard by the court were cases which were there as of right under section 36. Under section 36, any case in which the amounts or the value of property in controversy exceeded $10,000 automatically could go to the Supreme Court; and cases of habeas corpus and of mandamus could also go there as of right without leave.

The committee found that the offending cases, the cases which were causing the congestion, were the appeals—too great in number—which were based on cases in which the money or value of the property involved was at least $10,000. Frequently these cases involved disputes about the quantum of damage in negligence cases. These matters may be of great interest to the litigants themselves, but they are not considered to be matters necessarily of public importance.

The argument made by the committee of the Canadian Bar Association was that cases involving quantum of damages and money amounts—if those are the principal matters at issue—have already had the benefit of at least two judicial reviews—one by the court of first instance, the other by the court of appeal in the province.

This bill, of course, does not preclude cases involving $10,000, or involving even greater property value than that, from getting to the Supreme Court. If an important principle of law is involved, or of mixed fact and law, the litigant concerned can apply to the court for leave. And he could succeed.

The rule which is proposed in this legislation was adopted by the House of Lords in England as long ago as 1934. Appeals to the highest court of the land, which is the House of Lords, were restricted to appeals for which leave had been given. Appeals as of right were abolished. I should say that the problem in the United Kingdom in 1934, when this was done, was not one of case overload, as is the situation in the Supreme Court of Canada today. It was one of abuse. Perhaps, to illustrate that, I might refer to a speech in the House of Lords made by Lord Atkin, which is reported in the House of Lords Reports, Volume 92, June 5, 1934, at page 794. Honourable senators who are lawyers will know that Lord Atkin was one of the most eminent jurists of his time in the United Kingdom. He said:

The great importance of this reform is this, that a rich corporation—or perhaps I might say a strong government department—will not for the future be able in any way to terrorize the person with whom they may have a dispute by a threat that the case will certainly be taken to the House of Lords. I think it is a great advantage that a case will not now come to your Lordships' House unless there are substantial grounds for so taking it either in the opinion of the Court of Appeal or of your Lordships' House.

A similar view was expressed by the Vice-Chairman of the Bar Council of that time in the United Kingdom, Sir Walter Greaves-Lord.

The rule proposed to be adopted by this measure has been in force in the United States since 1925. They have had nearly 50 years of experience with it. There, the appeals which are heard by the Supreme Court of the United States from lower courts, either federal or state, are heard only after leave. It may be of interest to know that in 1972 the nine judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, in addition to the 120 cases upon which they issued judgments, dealt with 4,500 applications for leave.

Honourable senators, what were the remedies available to the committee of the Canadian Bar Association? First of all, they might have been able to solve the problem by increasing the monetary amount from $10,000 to some rather substantially higher amount. That suggestion was rejected for the reason given by the committee that today money or property value alone is no real criterion for a right of access to Canada's highest court.

A second tentative solution was to increase the number of judges so that the work could be more widely dispersed. However, the experience in the United States—where there are only nine judges on the Supreme Court despite the fact that they have so big and populous a country—seemed to mitigate against the proposal that our court should be larger than nine.

I believe the same reasoning applies also to the establishment in the United Kingdom. Honourable senators do know, of course, that in the House of Lords there are 12 or 14 law lords and there are other jurists who are qualified to sit in the Privy Council. Our appeals do not go there any more, but there are appeals to the Privy Council from other countries of the Commonwealth. They have a good many judges available both for the House of Lords and for the Privy Council. It is perhaps a little easier for them to deal with a situation like the problem in Canada.

The third alternative, the one which the committee of the Bar Association came to, was to require all appellants in civil cases to secure leave to appeal before they could come to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The test that was to apply on an application for leave gave the committee considerable concern. It came down upon one standard, one test, one criterion, which it simply announced as "the public importance" of the case. This expression is not defined in the committee's report. In a sense it is really not defined in the bill, although it is somewhat expanded.

Generally speaking, the leave is a matter of discretion in the House of Lords, and also in the United States Supreme Court. Both courts have issued reasons which are helpful, not only to the profession but as well to the litigants. A good deal of jurisprudence has been built up in both the United Kingdom and the United States setting out what are good grounds upon which an application for leave to appeal will succeed. This is also true of the converse—of the grounds upon which leave can be refused, and the grounds upon which a motion to quash can succeed.

I suppose that if one were to ask one of the judges what class of case he would describe as a case of public importance, he would say, generally, constitutional issues, conflicting judgments of lower courts with respect to the interpretation of federal statutes and provincial statutes, and perhaps different approaches by courts in different provinces as to the interpretation of the common law with respect to, for example, crown liability in a case of tort.

The procedure proposed is to have the court sit in panels for the hearing of applications for leave, and indeed that practice has been established for a number of years and is enshrined in section 45. The quorum of the panel is three. So at the present time, theoretically, there could be three panels of three judges sitting simultaneously if the number of applications for leave to appeal should grow to any great extent.

Honourable senators, I have taken too long in my explanation of this bill, but I am about to finish. However, I thought it would be useful if I highlighted one or two clauses.

Clause 3 abolishes appeals to the Supreme Court of Canada as of right.

Clause 5 spells out the main recommendation of the committee of the Canadian Bar Association, and it sets out the criteria to be applied by the court in applications for leave to appeal.

I said a moment ago that the question of what is an important public matter upon which the court should give its decision to allow an appeal to be taken or not is spelled out a little bit better in the proposed legislation. In cases in which the Supreme Court is of the opinion that any question involved in the application for leave is, by reason of its public importance or the importance of any issue of law or any issue of mixed law and fact involved in such question, one that ought to be decided by the Supreme Court or is, for any other reason, of such a nature or significance as to warrant decision by the court, then leave can be granted. The discretion is very broad, and I think it must be read in conjunction with the considerable body of jurisprudence that has been built up in the area.

Clause 9 provides that the rules proposed for appeals from the provincial courts are to be the same in cases of appeals from the Federal Court of Appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The last clause I would comment on is clause 10. This clause provides that the new law shall come into force on proclamation, but with regard to existing cases ready for the Supreme Court of Canada, or cases not ready but in which a notice of appeal has been filed in the lower court, or has been served on any of the parties involved in the litigation, or has been deposited with the Registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada, or cases which have already been removed from the provincial courts to the Supreme Court of Canada under section 62 of the Supreme Court Act—these are cases in which action of the provincial government is involved—in all of these cases the rules will be the rules that have applied heretofore. In other words, this legislation will not be retroactive.

Honourable senators, if the bill receives second reading I shall move, when the committee is established, that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I intend to move the adjournment of this debate. Before doing so, however, may I put a question to the honourable sponsor of the bill. He mentioned that the United States Supreme Court had heard in 1972, 4,500 applications for leave to appeal. I was wondering if he had any such figures for the Supreme Court of Canada. Can he tell me how much time the court took in, say, 1972 or 1973 in hearing these applications, and what the proportion is of leaves granted to the number applied for.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Unfortunately I do not have any figures on the number of applications that were refused. The report says 20 per cent of the cases heard—which would be about 24 cases a year on an average—were cases in which leave was granted. Such appeals were before the court because leave had been granted but the committee did not have any comment on the number of applications for leave that had been refused. I have no information, but I shall certainly see to it that when the committee deals with those bills the officials provide that information.

There was another part to Senator Flynn's question, I believe.

Senator Flynn: How much time was spent—

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): On the applications for leave? I do not think that is covered in the report of the committee of the Canadian Bar Association. I think we shall have to get that information in committee.

Senator Walker: May I ask the senator a question? How many judges in the Supreme Court of the United States sit on applications for leave?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): I understand that the panel is the same as it is here, namely, three.

Senator Flynn: I heard that the whole court was hearing the applications but, in any event, this is one question we may deal with in committee.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Frankly, I am not an expert on the Supreme Court of the United States. I have been in that court only as a spectator. I do remember, however, an application before the whole court for leave to appeal, a restricted amount of time available for argument, a big brief filed and a very short argument made, and no reasons given from the bench. They just adjourned and handed their judgment down later. I think, though, they can sit in panels of three. Again, we can get that information in committee.

Senator Hicks: Before this debate is adjourned, may I ask the honourable senator a question? Is the "public importance" aspect new to this bill, or does this exist as part of the ratio decidendi in relation to leave to appeal in the House of Lords or in the Supreme Court of the United States?

● (2130)

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, I shall not take the time of the Senate now to go into them in detail, but I have a number of references from both the House of Lords and the Supreme Court of the United States. Indeed I have one from the Supreme Court of Canada, where Mr. Justice Nesbitt, as he then was, wrote a judgment back before World War I. I think it was in the Lake Erie case when he laid down pretty well the proposition that is contained in clause 5 of the bill. This was one of the few cases available both on an application to quash an appeal that was taken as of right, or an application for leave to appeal. I remember being before the court as a very young man, when Sir Lyman Duff was Chief Justice, and he used to say, "We still rely on Nesbitt for our decision in the case of application for leave." There is a considerable body of jurisprudence on this point.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold moved the second reading of Bill S-6, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

He said: Honourable senators, we have heard speeches in relation to two very important and involved bills this evening, S-7 and S-2. I guess it is due to the cost of paper that the bill assigned to me consists of one page. It is relatively simple. Perhaps there are other reasons also for assigning this to me.

I should like to remind honourable senators who may not be aware of it that we have an expert on the Canadian Wheat Board in this chamber in the person of Senator McNamara. This provides me with an opportunity to pay tribute to him as a great Canadian who has made an outstanding contribution to the marketing of grain and to the benefit of farmers in western Canada, where his name is long remembered and very much honoured. I am sorry Senator McNamara is not in a position to sponsor this bill himself, but you will find some of his advice very much in evidence in my remarks.

Honourable senators, this is a bill to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act. As most of you are aware, the Canadian Wheat Board markets wheat, oats and barley handled by that board on an annual crop year basis which starts on August 1 and ends on July 31 the following year. The producer on delivering his grain receives what is known as the "initial price." This initial price is usually announced in March, and it is at that time that the farmer or the producer learns what the initial price will be. The initial price is set on the basis of what is known as a "safe price." Historically this has been followed at a later date by a final payment, and this normally has been a very modest one.

For the present crop year the initial price is set at $2.25 a bushel for wheat, $1.65 a bushel for barley and $1.10 a bushel for oats. I would like to suggest at this stage that those payments should be higher, and I think Senator Argue spoke about this in his address to the Senate on Thursday last. Last year, after some adjustments, the initial prices were $3.75 per bushel for wheat, $2.25 per bushel for barley and $1.10 per bushel for oats. May I say here, and I know I am going a little beyond the particular subject under discussion, that I am hopeful the Wheat Board will see fit to raise this initial price relatively soon.

The amendment we have in front of us tonight is intended to be for the benefit of farmers and for their financial planning. For example, on June 10, 1974, the Wheat Board gave an estimate as to what the final payment would be for the crop year ending July 31, 1974. For top-grade wheat it would be 72 cents per bushel, for top-grade barley, 76 cents per bushel, for No. 1 feed barley 26 cents, and for No. 1 oats 50 cents. Here let me emphasize, as it is always emphasized to the farmers, that these are not the final figures, but are estimates so that the producer may have some idea of what he is likely to get as a final payment.

Traditionally the final payment is made in the following calendar year, but in 1973 it was made in the same calendar year as the initial price. This was because of the great demand which resulted in the pool being sold out early. So, as I have said, the final payment was made in the same year as the initial price, and that greatly added to the difficulties facing the farmer in his financial planning because of the resultant income tax burden.

The Canadian Wheat Board is required under the act to close its pool accounts for wheat, oats and barley as soon as it has sold the grain which it has acquired in each pool during the crop year and proceed with the necessary audits and procedure leading to the actual distribution of the final payments to producers. In other words, as soon as the pool is closed, they have to pay out and this is what creates the need for this legislation.

In 1973 producers received two sets of final payments as a result of the above requirement and consequently a much higher than anticipated income tax assessment for that taxation year. This amendment will ensure that final payments for any pool periods will not be made before January 1 of the calendar year commencing after the end of the pool periods and will thus prevent the recurrence of a situation where more than one set of final payments is made in a single taxation year.

Therefore, honourable senators, the farmer delivering grain now would know that there would not be a further payment made to him, that is to say a final payment, this year. The deferring of such payments as provided for in Bill S-6 will enable the farmer better to organize his financial planning. This is an attempt to stabilize and equalize farm income to some degree and to give producers a better indication as to when final payments will be made. This change is required because of the very heavy demand for grain products, and because it is likely that the grain pools will be ready for final payments earlier now than when demand is poor.

Honourable senators, I would ask for your favourable consideration of this bill, and in due course, when the committee is appointed, it is my intention to move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture for further consideration.

On motion of Senator Grosart, for Senator Yuzyk, debate ajourned.

STANDING COMMITTEES

FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF SELECTION ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the first report of the Committee of Selection which was presented Thursday, October 10, 1974.

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, the report was presented on Thursday, October 10, and I move its adoption now.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

FEDERAL TRUST COMPANIES AND LOAN COMPANIES BILL

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On the Order:

Third reading of the Bill S-7, intituled: "An Act to authorize federal trust companies and loan companies to increase the monetary limit of their borrowing power and to issue subordinated notes.—(Honourable Senator Hayden.)

Senator Langlois moved that the bill be not now read the third time but that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES

NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE AND REPORT

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1975, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, 8th October, 1974.

Senator Grosart: Is this a reference to the main estimates only?

Senator Langlois: The main estimates, yes.

Senator Grosart: Will there be a similar motion respecting supplementary estimates (A)?

Senator Langlois: Yes. That is my next motion.
Motion agreed to.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) REFERRED TO NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Senator Langlois, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the supplementary estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1975, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, 8th October, 1974.

Senator Langlois: Before the question is put, probably I should answer the question that my honourable friend was about to ask of me. My purpose in moving these two motions is to pave the way for a meeting of the Standing

Senate Committee on National Finance which is scheduled for Thursday of this week at 10.30 in the morning, when the new President of the Treasury Board will be in attendance. As I have said, it is in order to pave the way for this important meeting of the committee that I have referred these estimates to the committee tonight. I felt that honourable senators would be interested in having this advance information. The notice will be in the mail, I suppose, some time tomorrow.

Senator Grosart: I wonder, honourable senators, if I could ask the Leader of the Government or his deputy if there is any urgency in the report back from committee? In the corridors we heard rumours that there may be a very definite deadline in the matter of the government's meeting its expenditures and having at least the supplementaries approved.

Senator Langlois: I have no knowledge that there is any special urgency. There is always urgency in connection with fiscal matters and the provision of funds for the administration of the Public Service, but beyond that I cannot go. As I said, I thought that honourable senators would like to have this advance information regarding the sitting which is scheduled for Thursday morning.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I raise the question because it is rather unusual for us to have the main estimates before us together with a supplementary (A) under those estimates.

Senator Langlois: Both are now tabled.

Senator Grosart: I thought you might want to speak about the warrants.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, October 16, 1974

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

Senator Flynn: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: No comment.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION AT UNITED NATIONS—POSITION TAKEN BY CANADIAN DELEGATION—QUESTION

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether in the United Nations the Canadian Delegation, in speaking against the seating of the Palestinian Liberation Organization and then abstaining from voting, were acting on the orders of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, or whether this was as a result of their assessment of the situation as they saw it?

I ask that question because it seems a rather extraordinary performance, when one reads the background of the application to seat that group, which certainly we would not call peaceful.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, as one who has represented Canada on the United Nations committee concerned with the Palestinian refugee situation, I can only suggest that the spokesman for the Canadian position during that debate would have been under instruction from the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the government. I do not wish to comment further at this time. However, if the honourable senator would like a more complete report, I shall endeavour to communicate with the minister.

Senator Molson: I would be grateful if we could have further information, if possible.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

USE OF SENATE ROOMS BY MEMBERS OF HOUSE OF COMMONS AND OTHERS—QUESTION

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I should also like to ask the Leader of the Government, in view of the shortage of space for the Senate in this building, whether the giving up of the committee room 263-S for House of Commons use was approved by the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not believe that any formal alienation of space has occurred, although the committee room in question is, I understand, used occasionally for deliberative purposes by the House of Commons and by the Cabinet. I shall take the question as notice and endeavour to provide a more complete reply at a later date.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps I could ask a supplementary to Senator Molson's question. At the same time would the Leader of the Government inquire as to whether we have been able to make some acquisition?

PROPOSED USE OF EAST BLOCK BY SENATORS—QUESTION

Senator Croll: The Department of External Affairs now has a very extensive office complex which was specially built for it. That department had been partly housed in the East Block. I can understand that the Cabinet Room and some of the immediate offices, including that of the Secretary to the Prime Minister, shall remain there, but what are the rest of the personnel doing in the East Block when they now have this large complex, one of the best available? Perhaps the East Block could now be made available to the Senate.

● (1410)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators are aware of the inexorable pressure of space posed by an expansion of the activities of government on Parliament Hill. It is a continuing concern of the government to provide adequate accommodation, not only for members who serve in the other place but for members who serve in this place. I assure honourable senators that efforts are currently under way to improve the space situation for those who serve in this chamber.

THE ESTIMATES

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, may I be permitted to make a slight but important correction to a statement I made in this house last evening. I announced the sitting of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, which was scheduled then to sit tomorrow morning at 10.30. I was informed this morning that the time has been changed to 9.30, and this will be confirmed by the notices for that meeting which are presently in the mail.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

PRODUCTION OF INSULIN—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators will recall that at yesterday evening's sitting a question was posed by Senator Buckwold with respect to an alleged shortage of insulin. The office of the Minister of National Health and Welfare has supplied me with certain briefing material on the shortage of beef pancreas tissue, which was prepared by the Health Protection Branch of the department. I believe this briefing information will answer Senator Buckwold's question and the questions in the minds of other members of this chamber. It is a short statement, and with your indulgence I shall read it.

The Health Protection Branch has been alerted to the concerns of the Canadian Diabetic Association with respect to both the price and the future supply of insulin in Canada. We have been informed by Dr. A. Fisher, the President of the Canadian Diabetic Association, that there will soon be an approximate increase of 10 per cent in the price of insulin in Canada due to increased production costs. Most of the insulin sold in Canada is manufactured from beef pancreas by Connaught Laboratories Limited and sold at a price which is generally lower than that of most other countries.

Present domestic and international market uncertainties in beef production have created strong demands for beef pancreas tissue. Dr. Fisher has intimated that some meat packers, in anticipation of short supplies, heavy demands and increased costs, may in some instances be stockpiling pancreas tissue. At least one major meat packer, Swift Canadian Company, has denied that it is stockpiling pancreas tissue.

Initial contacts with Connaught Laboratories Limited have indicated that there is no immediate shortage of insulin, but officers of the company have indicated some concern about long-range prospects for insulin supply.

We have been informed by officials of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce that at present meat packers are not allowed to export beef pancreas tissue without an export permit. For the past two years all domestic supply has been available to Canadian processors. Connaught Laboratories Limited could obtain more of this supply if they were more competitive. A portion of the supply of this tissue is being utilized to make pancreatic enzymes which are used in the treatment of cystic fibrosis and other digestive ailments.

At present there are no similar controls over the export of pork pancreatic tissue. For purely economic reasons, which relate to the size of the organ, it has not been extensively utilized in the production of insulin.

Officers of the Health Protection Branch presently are investigating the situation and will be meeting in the near future with representatives of the drug industry, meat packers, the Canadian Diabetic Association, and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to discuss the matter further.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, October 9, consideration of His Excellency the Administrator's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Senator Neiman, seconded by Senator Côtteau, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Madam Speaker, may I at the outset associate myself with the words of compliment and congratulation which have been expressed by those who have preceded me in this debate in relation to your accession to the Speakership. In referring to you, may I also say how pleased I was to have entered this chamber two and a half years ago when it was presided over by your predecessor, another gracious lady who came from my own part of Canada and with whom I had had long associations as a Regent of Mount Allison University and in other activities that drew us together. It is indeed fortunate for us that the Senate will on successive occasions be presided over by members of the fair sex, who, I am bound to say, are not doing too badly for themselves these days, notwithstanding some expressions of opinion to the contrary.

I also want at the outset to congratulate the Honourable Senator Perrault on having been chosen as government leader. It seems to me that he has gotten off to a good start, and I am sure all of us in this chamber look forward to working with him and to making his leadership of the government activities in this house as productive and useful as possible.

I listened with interest to the speeches made by the mover and seconder of the motion for an Address in reply, and I congratulate them. I mention particularly my colleague Senator Côtteau, whom I welcome to this chamber as a new senator from Nova Scotia. He has come along with Senator Barrow who has been a lifelong friend of mine. I am sure that their advice and sound judgment will be of use to this chamber and to the Parliament of Canada.

The previous government leader, the Honourable Paul Martin, who, I think it is safe to assume, is now going as an ambassador to the Court of St. James, is a person with whom I, like many in this chamber, have had a long association. It is not necessary for me to refer at any length to his distinguished career as a Canadian public servant, parliamentarian and minister of government. I would like to comment briefly that Senator Martin is a politician who did not succeed in achieving the ultimate goal, which at least on some occasions during his career he set for himself, when he sought the leadership of the Liberal Party of Canada. It may be a remarkable thing that he did not attain the leadership of the Government of Canada, because certainly a man of his quality would easily and ably carry that mantle, but the remarkable thing about Senator Martin is that, although he did not succeed in becoming leader of his party, he never hesitated to continue to support the chosen leader of his party, on at least two occasions, with what I must describe as undiminished loyalty and great enthusiasm. He thereby contributed not only to the success of the party which he supported but to the success of the governments under at least two Prime Ministers of Canada, who might not have succeeded so well had Senator Martin chosen to take a different position, a less generous position, than the one which he did take. This always has impressed me. It is an example to persons who give themselves to public life, that we know we do not always get our own way, that we do not always succeed in landing in exactly the place where we would like to land.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, this afternoon I want to refer to only three or four items in the Throne Speech. Quite properly, prime importance was given in the Throne Speech to the problems of inflation and control of the economy of our country. I noticed with interest that one of the chief devices that the government relied upon, to enable it to control inflation, was an increase in the supply of goods and services.

● (1420)

I am not an economist, and I know that the views of economists differ substantially and widely as to how one goes about this; but it has seemed to me for some time now that one of the chief elements in inflation in our country—one of the chiefest elements—which may have had the effect of slowing down the increase in the supply of goods and services—is the high cost of money itself. I do not know why our bankers and economists always feel that you control inflation by increasing the cost of money, because when you increase the cost of money it seems to me that you increase the cost of everything you need money to do: to manufacture, to buy, to provide services, and so on. I am wondering if some economists, far better qualified than I, should not take another look at the question of the high cost of money and the influence that it is having in encouraging inflation and perhaps in contributing toward what we all hope will not amount to a runaway in our national economy.

I could not help but note with interest that in the great country to the south of us this same proposition was put to President Ford, according to an Associated Press dispatch which was published in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald on September 6. I will read from it:

President Ford heard more than a dozen of the United States' leading economists urge Thursday that the federal government ease its tight-money policy in a move to bring down record-high interest rates.

The article then goes on to develop to some extent the very theory that I have postulated before you this afternoon. I am not at all satisfied, myself, that the high cost of money is a healthy factor in our economy. I am not at all satisfied that we would not do better to control inflation by increasing the supply of goods and services, and, in order to do that, make the money necessary to effect this desired result more readily available, or at least, not so intolerably expensive as it has become in the last year.

A second factor which flows naturally out of concern for inflation led to a reference in the Throne Speech to the high price of oil and the difficulties attendant upon its production and distribution. They proposed, in relation to this, that there should be established a national petroleum corporation. I shall await with interest the legislation referring to this, because it is not quite clear to me at this stage how a national petroleum corporation is going to achieve the desired results in respect to oil prices and fuel prices generally that have risen so fantastically during the past two or three years in our country.

I do feel, however, that there is one element of national policy in relation to oil that is deserving of the continued and urgent attention of the Government of Canada, and that is the completion of our pipeline structure across the whole country. It seems to me that it is of vital national importance that we, as one of the few countries in the world that at least at the present time is self-sufficient in supplies of oil, ought to put ourselves in the position where that oil can be moved about the country where it is needed, and that we ought not again to be placed in the kind of condition of dependence which seemed to threaten us a year or so ago when difficulties with Arab and off-shore oil supplies were of such great concern to all of us. We in Canada can supply our own oil in quantities that would appear to be capable of looking after our needs for at least the next decade, and hopefully, with further discoveries, for much longer than that. I think it is in the national interest that we should make certain that we can transport that oil within the country wherever it is needed. On the other hand, if large off-shore oil reserves should be discovered off the coast of Nova Scotia and the other Atlantic provinces, or even if a turn-down in the price of other off-shore oil should occur, it might very well be in the interests of our country that that oil could be pumped in the other direction, from the Atlantic ports to Montreal and Toronto, and even to points farther west. I noted the other day that, according to reports in the Globe and Mail of October 10, the President of Interprovincial Pipelines questioned the usefulness and the economic feasibility of the extensions of the oil pipelines in Canada. He suggested, I think, that a guaranteed minimum revenue of something like $25 million per year would be necessary to justify the continuation of a pipeline from Sarnia to Montreal. The only thing I can say is that these points of view ought to be examined very, very carefully. I would hope that the Government of Canada would not make its final decision on the basis of short-term economics but would look at the long-term point of view of protecting our resources and ensuring their continued use by Canadians in all parts of Canada.

Honourable senators, there is another aspect of energy and the supply of power which is of great interest to me and indeed to a great many people in the province I come from. I speak of the potentially enormous reserve of power that could be made available if the tides in the Bay of Fundy could be harnessed. I do not consider this to be a pipe-dream; I think it is a project deserving of continued study by economists and engineers. The last complete study of the question of tidal power from the Bay of Fundy was completed in 1969, and I should like to read a few extracts from a paper which was read by George C. Baker, P. Eng., M.E.I.C., to the Atlantic Region Technical Conference of the Engineering Institute of Canada, held in Moncton, New Brunswick, on April 20 of this year, 1974.

George Baker has spent a great deal of time and effort in studying the question of tidal power, and his paper sums up the situation as it appeared in April of 1974. He starts off by saying:

After two years of study, the Tidal Power Programming Board in 1969 rendered a verdict on tidal power from the Bay of Fundy. It was declared technically feasible, but economically unattractive. In the five years since that time, little has changed in a technical sense, but the economic climate has altered almost beyond recognition.

He then points out that at that time, making certain assumptions in relation to one initial development of Fundy tidal power, that power could have been produced at a cost of 5.6 mils per kilowatt hour at site. Today, only five years later, that figure looks exceedingly attractive. He then goes on:

Yet as early as 1970, some of the assumptions implicit in the comparisons had become a bit shaky. The interveners and lengthening construction periods for new generating plants in the United States had started to undermine utility reserves. Displacement energy was becoming scarce. Environmental regulations had started to put up the cost of thermal generation. Suitable fuels were no longer abundant.

● (1430)

Then Mr. Baker deals with the inflation in fuel costs, which has been far greater even than that in construction cost of tidal power or nuclear plants today. He says—upgrading the 1969 report on the assumptions which I referred to before, which would have provided power at about 5.6 mils at site—it would appear that in 1974 the figure moved up to something like 15 mils per kilowatt hour. His paper states:

If inflation is applied to oil prices at the same rate, from a $7 base—

Elsewhere Mr. Baker has said that he thinks the higher bases of $12 and $13 for oil prices were only devised to justify royalties on oil and were not real base prices of oil from which he should work. However, I do not think we can accept that assumption today and I do not think we will see oil prices at a $7 base again in the future. In any event, he says:

If inflation is applied to oil prices at the same rate, from a $7 base, then thermal displacement energy in 1982—

Which is the earliest that you could get a plant going, or get a tidal plant going.

—would cost about 13.6 mils at a heat rate of 9,000 British thermal units per kilowatt hour. However, these figures cannot be directly compared, because year by year the cost of thermal energy would creep upward, while the cost of tidal energy would be more or less fixed by the actual construction cost and interest rate. For the example given, the single equivalent price of tidal energy over a 25-year period—

Now, these are based on figures which might have been applicable in the spring of 1974.

—with inflation at 4 per cent per annum is 15.6 mils. The single equivalent price of thermal displacement energy is 19.45 mils. After the 25-year period, for another half-century, the gap would continue to widen dramatically.

The economics would all fall in favour of the tidal power, because it would not be affected by the inflated fuel costs that will apply to both nuclear power and, more particularly, to conventional fossil fuel power, such as oil.

To continue with another quotation:

Inflation would, of course, affect costs of successor nuclear plants. A tidal plant completed in 1982 might be producing energy for 36 mils in the year 2050. If a nuclear plant were built instead, its third generation successor would probably be producing energy for 145 mils!

Honourable senators, all I can say is that if we had gone ahead with the tidal power proposition and had commenced construction of the plant in 1969, we would have been very pleased indeed, in view of today's prices, to have had that energy. I do not know that there is any change in the trend, and I just hope that we will not continue to lag behind for generation after generation so that we never get the benefit of this great energy. It could be translated into electric power by a cooperative effort of, at least, the governments of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, in addition to the federal government of course. Concerning distribution, sale and marketing, it would almost certainly require the cooperation of the hydro authorities of the province of Quebec and, perhaps, even of the province of Ontario. I am not referring, of course, to the quick sale that could be made, as soon as we have it ready, to the New England States.

Again, we should be more concerned with respect to the value of an asset such as this in the Canadian economy, and we ought to be able to justify it on the contribution it can make in Canada alone, without depending on arrangements with our great neighbour to the south.

I wish, finally, to quote the conclusion of Mr. Baker in his paper. He says this:

Further work is needed:

(1) Because of the commodity aspect, to make further market studies;

(2) On the technical level, to fine-tune some of the design work. Under present conditions, even relatively minor improvements would go far to enhance the prospects;

(3) On basic research, because, although the matter has been studied often, the studies have not in general pursued the development of tidal technology.

Finally, further work is justified because of the long-term benefits to these provinces which a successful development would confer. We would be happy today to have some of that 5.6 mil energy offered in 1969. Development now, if it could be made to just break even over the first 15 or 20 years, would make coming generations happy in a completely analogous way.

Let us hope that the federal government will be willing to give serious thought and consideration to the development of the tidal power resources of the Bay of Fundy, which may be one of the great sources of electrical energy left in North America today.

I wish now, honourable senators, to deal briefly with science policy and, particularly, with the granting agencies that support research in our country. The Throne Speech which opened the Second Session of the Twenty-ninth Parliament dealt at some length with the changes which it was proposed to make in the National Research Council, the Canada Council, the Medical Research Council and the Defence Research Board. I believe that honourable senators are generally familiar with the nature of those changes, which were the subject also of a substantial news release by the Ministry of State for Science and Technology.

If I may remind you, generally speaking many of these proposals were attributed to the recommendations made by the Senate Special Committee on Science Policy, and had the effect of separating the granting functions for supporting research in universities and other agencies in Canada from the basic research capability of the National Research Council itself, and making similar changes in relation to the Canada Council. The justifications for doing this, as expressed in the paper of the Ministry of State for Science and Technology distributed to us earlier this year, make interesting but not convincing reading. They state, first of all:

Generally, the councils have been successful in achieving their major objectives. However, the disciplinary approach to financial assistance, has not produced sufficient balance among the various research disciplines. Further, the increasing importance of inter-disciplinary research demands increased financial assistance to this field of endeavour.

Increased financial assistance, yes, but not necessarily a splitting up of the National Research Council in order to do it.

I wish to quote one or two more passages. Elsewhere in the paper this is said:

The granting function of NRC is highly respected in the science community and the agency has performed its task well. However, there is an increasing interaction among scientific disciplines and activities and, therefore, a need for better co-ordination with other granting bodies.

I do not see how the splitting off of the granting function from the National Research Council and the Canada Council has anything at all to do with disciplinary-oriented research as opposed to inter-disciplinary-oriented research. In my opinion, this is a complete non sequitur into which the authors of this paper, and perhaps to some extent the authors of Senator Lamontagne's report on Science Policy, were drawn because they became infatuated with the popular talk about inter-disciplinary research. There is nothing so different about inter-disciplinary research that it requires a different handling technique than other kinds of research. It may mean more money, it may require individual institutions, such as universities, where the research is being carried out, to see that a greater measure of cooperation and coordination is assured among their biologists, chemists, medical doctors and those who carry on the research. It seems to me, however, that this will not be furthered one bit by breaking apart these councils.

I hope we are not about to downgrade the role of the National Research Council, which, it seems to me, has served Canada so well and has been an example for more than 50 years—indeed, for nearly 60 years—to many other countries.

It seems to me that our sophisticated scientific community in Canada is still a relatively small one. Whoever is going to do the evaluation work on research projects in Canada will have to be chosen from the same pool of adjudicators, panelists or judges which is now used to evaluate the proposals that are supported by the National Research Council.

I do not think it is wrong for the National Research Council to claim, as it has done, that:

NRC is the one Federal organization with an operating but non-regulatory role across the interfaces of research in the three sectors of government, industry and universities. With the NRC Laboratories as the essential core, a coordinated set of programs has been developed with close links in universities and industry through the use of research support programs, Associate Committees and a variety of other scientific activities. These interactive elements in NRC's structure and programs make it a unique research agency which is flexible and responsive to national needs and opportunities. Evolving national strategies and priorities will undoubtedly create an even greater need in future for a national scientific organization with the range and capabilities of NRC to serve the nation.

Honourable senators I have developed the case with respect to the National Research Council somewhat more, but one could also develop the same case in respect to the Canada Council and, to a lesser extent, in respect to the other granting agencies.

On October 5 the Globe and Mail carried a report from the Director of the Science Council of Canada, Dr. P. D. McTaggart-Cowan, in which he is quoted as saying:

The reorganization of the federal Government's research and science funding establishment recommended in the last two reports of the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy "has the potential of inflicting serious, long term damage on Canada's scientific community."

I think we should give sober second thought to this situation when we have been party to a proposal which is opposed by the National Research Council itself and the Canada Council—perhaps that is not surprising—by the Science Council of Canada, or its director, in the report I have just referred to, and by the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, virtually without exception, in representations they have made to the Prime Minister and to the Minister of State for Science and Technology.

Perhaps, before leaving the subject, I should say one more thing about the Defence Research Board. It is proposed that the National Research Council would continue with its laboratories and its research, and that there would then be another council, perhaps to be called the Natural Sciences Research Council, to look after the granting function. The Canada Council would continue to support the arts and there would be created a new granting agency for the social sciences and the humanities.

It was proposed to remove the granting function entirely from the Defence Research Board without replacing it, the assumption being that research relating to national defence would be supported, where appropriate, by the Natural Sciences Research Council or by the new granting agency for the social sciences and humanities.

Honourable senators, if we feel that an effort is necessary in relation to the defence of this country to keep abreast of modern scientific developments in warfare and defence, I for one do not believe that as responsible citizens we can leave that to the kind of agencies and the kind of people who are apt to make up the granting and adjudicating committees, either in the Natural Sciences Research Council or the granting agency for the social sciences and the humanities.

For one thing, if it is left to academics, in the traditional sense of the term, too many of them will turn their back on the whole effort and say, "We do not believe it is necessary for Canada to maintain any effort in research in relation to national defence."

I do not happen to believe that myself, honourable senators, but I can assure you, from my experience both within and outside the academic community, that in my judgment it would not be safe to leave research for our national defence in the hands of the kind of academic bodies that are quite capable of directing basic research in the natural sciences, the medical sciences, and the humanities and social sciences.

Therefore, I view with some alarm the removal of the research-granting function from the Defence Research Board. This is a matter to which careful consideration or, as it is popular to say in the Senate, sober second thought should be given by us and by the Government of Canada.

Finally, honourable senators, in relation to science policy, all these activities are going to be coordinated by a committee which has been called the Inter-Council Coordinating Committee.

Really it seems to me that all we are doing, in an effort to try to integrate research by promoting inter-disciplinary research in the sciences, is to fragment the agencies that are going to have to support and coordinate this research. I think we are taking a wrong step.

As for the interposition of the Inter-Council Coordinating Committee, I fear that we are adding yet another layer of bureaucracy which will place more people, more bureaucrats, between the granting agencies, the source of funds for scientific and other research, and those who are going to do the work in the universities and the other institutions of Canada. Therefore I would hope that we would look at this very carefully.

It has been suggested that the Inter-Council Coordinating Committee would merely consist of a few government officials and the chief executive officers of the councils concerned, those being the National Research Council, the Medical Research Council and the Canada Council, I presume. This, again, seems to be removing all the influence which has been so valuable in both the National Research Council and the Canada Council which has been brought to those bodies by Canadian citizens from all walks of life and from different backgrounds who have been able to take a broad, general view of the support of the activities of those councils in the past and their relationship to the welfare and the lives of the people of Canada. I, for one, do not believe that this input will be received from the Inter-Council Coordinating Committee comprised only of senior public servants and bureaucrats.

It is the intention of the government to separate the granting function from the National Research Council and the Canada Council while leaving it, incidentally, with the Medical Research Council. I should interject here that I am glad that the Minister of State for Science and Technology did not adopt the suggestion of the Lamontagne committee that research in biology should be removed from the Natural Sciences Research Council and put into the Medical Research Council. That takes altogether too narrow a view of modern biology, particularly as modern biology relates to our great interest in the oceans and the development of marine sciences. I hope that is not going to be done.

If the government does go ahead with an Inter-Council Coordinating Committee, in any event, I hope it will put representatives of the universities on that committee. The universities will be the chief users of the services provided by the granting agency. This, by the way, has been recommended to the Minister of State for Science and Technology, not only by the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, but also by the National Research Council and, I think, by some other agencies as well.

In summary, I am glad to take note of the interest and involvement of the federal government in research in our universities and other institutions, and I am glad to know this interest is to continue. I am also glad to know—and I do not think that the appearances in this respect are deceiving—that the support will continue to be given directly to the institution which does the research and to the individuals who do the research, by federal government agencies. I note that these funds are not going to be channelled through provincial governments, which was the request that had been made by the Council of Ministers of Education, largely, perhaps, because of the influence of the Western Ministers of Education, who, I think, are wrong in wanting to have as much control as they have asked for in connection with federal funds going to universities and other institutions. I am not against proper consultation and coordination with provincial-granting agencies where such agencies exist for the support of scientific and other research, although I must say that no such agencies exist in my home province or in any of the other Atlantic provinces, with minor exceptions—usually the kind of research that is mission-oriented, as we call it, towards the solution of problems of direct interest and concern to the government.

To repeat, I am concerned at the addition to the level of bureaucracy that seems to be inherent in this proposal, and particularly to the creation of the Inter-Council Coordinating Committee which, it seems to me, is bound to add to the frustrations of scientific and other workers in getting the support they need to keep this country's efforts in research and in all fields on a par with the reputation which Canada deserves and, indeed, largely has in the world today.

Let me repeat once again, these changes have been opposed by the National Research Council itself, by the Canada Council, by the Science Council of Canada and by the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, speaking for all the universities of our country.

It seems to me that this is an area to which sober second thought ought to be given, even in reviewing our own previous position, in the light of the additional information and in the light of what we know about the attitudes of the people who have to work under these arrangements. I also hope that the Government of Canada will be willing to give sober second thought to this. I note, with satisfaction, that no reference to these matters was contained in the Speech from the Throne which opened the 30th Parliament. I hope that means that the government is reconsidering its policies in this regard.

Having referred to these few items in the Speech from the Throne, I think I have had my say. Most of the items contained in the Speech are obviously sound and sensible, and I hope that the legislation and governmental action in relation thereto will improve the economy of Canada and enhance and enrich the lives of our people.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators, at the outset I should like to compliment all those who have preceded me in this debate on the excellence of their contributions. I want to associate myself completely with all the good wishes that have been tendered to our new Speaker, Senator Lapointe, and to our new government leader, Senator Perrault, and also with the well deserved tributes that have been paid to our former Speaker, Senator Muriel Fergusson, and our former Leader of the Government, Senator Paul Martin. I fully endorse everything that has been said about their talents, their charms, their devotion to duty, and the great service they have rendered to the Senate and to Canada. I shall not try to gild the lily by adding further comments of my own. I should also like to congratulate Senator Grosart on his appointment as Deputy Leader of the Opposition, and my colleague, Senator Petten, on his appointment as Government Whip. I wish them both well in their new positions.

Special compliments are due to the mover and seconder of the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, not only on the excellence of their presentations, but also on the manner in which they discharged their respective assignments.

The Speech from the Throne is nothing more than a general outline of the government's legislative program for the new Parliament.

Senator Flynn: Pious hopes.

Senator Carter: As a matter of course, it naturally contains legislative items left over from the previous session, as well as new proposals arising out of commitments made during the election campaign. The general theme running through the Speech from the Throne now under debate is that inflation is the number one problem, not only in Canada but throughout the world, and unless it can be brought under control there is grave danger that the world's economies might collapse. It is, therefore, in a global context that the Speech from the Throne should be considered.

Along with national security, the most important responsibility of the government of any country is to protect the value of its currency. To do that, all countries must try to keep their trade balances within reasonable limits. Every country must export to obtain the foreign exchange necessary to pay for imports. The quadrupling of the price of oil has thrown everything out of gear. Oil, like air and water, is one of those basic commodities that no country can do without. It not only provides the energy which turns the wheels of industry and powers the farm machinery, but it also provides raw material for such essential products as fertilizer, plastics and other commodities.

To find the extra money to pay the increased cost of oil, every oil importing country is practically forced to try to increase exports as much as possible, while at the same time keeping imports from other countries at a minimum. This can only result in a restriction of world trade at the very time when trade expansion is absolutely necessary.

[Senator Hicks.]

The very fact that the oil bill of the Western World and Japan has risen from $15 billion or $20 billion to $80 billion or $100 billion per year means a reduction of $65 billion or $80 billion per year in world trade in other commodities, and that in itself is a heavy damper on the world economy.

Our Minister of Finance, Mr. Turner, has said that the world economy is fragile. That is a very apt description, because it has to be handled very carefully or it could be damaged beyond repair. To keep the world economy from breaking down some way must be found to recycle the surplus dollars of the oil producers to those countries who must have credit on easy terms to keep their own economies from disintegrating. In addition, there must be the closest cooperation and collaboration between oil producing countries and oil consuming countries, not only in the sharing of oil and other sources of energy, but also in the sharing of raw materials and other matters. The world has become a global village where persons and nations alike are dependent on one another.

As we look out over the world today the sight is not very encouraging. Of the nearly four billion people inhabiting this globe, more than half are undernourished and one billion are on the brink of starvation, while millions have actually starved to death.

Droughts in Africa and India, floods in Bangladesh, and southeast Asia coupled with a shortage of fertilizer due to the excessive price of oil, and early frosts in western food producing countries have combined to curtail food production, thus making the situation much worse than had been expected. Knowledgeable people are now predicting that in the months ahead the number of people who will die of starvation in Africa, India and southeast Asia will be even greater than last year.

Under those circumstances there is bound to be a worldwide shortage of food, which will keep food prices from coming down and may well drive them higher. In Canada we are fortunate to be able to produce more basic food-stuffs than we need to feed ourselves and therefore can export to others. It is heartening to note from the Throne Speech that the general policy of the government in dealing with inflation is to increase the supply of goods and services and that the measures to increase food production include:

- incentives to farmers and fishermen including the stabilization of incomes and markets;
- continued international action to ensure that Canada has the right to manage its coastal resources and environment, including the conservation of fish stocks.

Here I should like to congratulate the Honourable Eugene Whelan, the Minister of Agriculture, on the stand he has taken on behalf of the farmers. He is on the right track, and I hope the new minister responsible for fisheries will take a similar stand on behalf of fishermen.

Primary producers are very important people in any society, because without them there would be no secondary industry at all. This is particularly true of farmers and fishermen, on whom we depend for the very sustenance of life itself.

Surely our priorities are all wrong when those employed in secondary industry get the lion's share of the wealth produced, while the primary producers get the smallest share, although they work the longest hours, take the gravest risks—often risking their very lives—and at the same time make secondary industry possible. By producing the food that keeps us alive the farmer and the fisherman make an essential contribution to society, and are therefore as valuable and important as the business executive or the labour leader who receive $40,000 or $50,000 a year for their efforts.

I fully support the government's policy of increasing food production and Mr. Whelan's efforts to increase farmers' income to the point where they can stay on the farm producing food and be guaranteed a standard of living equal to that of those who work in industry and live in an urban environment. That is not only wise but essential, because it is the only way we can assure ourselves of a continuous food supply in the future at reasonable prices, and at the same time discharge our moral obligation to do everything possible to feed our starving brothers and sisters in other parts of the world.

As for the fishermen, in my province they have always been the lowest men on the totem pole. In spite of the dangers and risks attendant on his occupation and his long, arduous hours of work, the fisherman has had to be content with what was left after all the others had taken their cut out of the wealth he produced. Fortunately, there are signs that this is beginning to change as the fishermen organize themselves to fight for a better deal.

This year the Newfoundland fishery has been greatly curtailed due to ice conditions on the north and east coasts, and by trawlermen strikes on the south coast of the province. This year on the northeast coast and the Labrador coast easterly winds kept the ice pressed on the shore for six to eight weeks longer than usual, thus the already short season was rendered six weeks shorter than normal. Fishermen receiving unemployment insurance had their benefits expire long before the fishing season began, and their families suffered severe economic hardship. When the ice eventually began to move off, the fishermen, impatient at the long delay, put out their nets, traps and trawls, only to have the ice move back in again and destroy all their gear. Individual losses were valued in the thousands and, in many cases, in the tens of thousands of dollars, and the fishermen found themselves without any means of production at all.

Both the provincial and the federal governments were extremely slow in recognizing the plight of the fishermen and in coming to their aid. When they did start to do something it was, as usual, too little and too late, as by the time gear had been replaced the fishing season was just about over. It is to be hoped, therefore, that the federal government will lose no time in bringing in the legislation on fishermen's income support which was intended to be passed at the last session of Parliament.

There is general disappointment in my province that the three-month Law of the Sea Conference in Caracas last summer did not make better progress towards an international agreement with respect to the extension of the limits of jurisdiction and the better management of marine resources. Foreign fleets are still depleting our fish stocks and destroying our fishermen's gear. This is true not only of Newfoundland but of Nova Scotia fishermen as well. Several Nova Scotia operators engaged in the deep sea lobster fishery have had their traps destroyed, resulting in losses valued in the hundreds of thousands of dollars. Aerial photographs of Russian trawlers with those traps on their decks leave no room for doubt as to who are the culprits, and, since the traps themselves are apparently marked in accordance with international requirements, it appears this wanton destruction was deliberate rather than accidental.

The slow progress of the Caracas Conference and the fact that critical decisions have had to be postponed until the Geneva Conference scheduled for next spring or summer have caused a great deal of pessimism in my province with respect to the future of the fishing industry. The prevailing opinion is that by next summer any agreement will be too late, because, at the current rate of depletion, by that time there will not be sufficient fish stocks left to manage. It is generally agreed that the extension of jurisdiction to the continental shelf—and in any case not less than 200 miles offshore—is an absolute necessity and that to save our fish stocks from complete destruction Canada should take unilateral action immediately instead of waiting another year or more. However, in view of the present disregard of international agreements by the trawlers of certain countries, a 200-mile limit, even if established, will not likely make much difference anyway because we have no means of patrolling such a vast expanse of ocean. We cannot even patrol our present 12-mile limit. More, better and faster patrol boats are urgently needed, together with better means of surveillance.

The world political and economic picture is just as bleak and gloomy as the world food picture. Crime, violence, terrorism and blatant disregard for law and order are increasing everywhere at a rapid rate. A recent article in the Christian Science Monitor stated that in the United States the increase in crime is becoming as serious a problem as inflation.

Political and economic stability are so interwoven and interdependent that it is futile to consider them separately. The key to the situation is in the Middle East, particularly the oil-producing countries, but Arab-Israeli relations remain so precarious that the Middle East must still be considered a powder keg which could explode at any minute.

In Europe, Italy is on the verge of political and economic collapse, and for the first time in history fears are being openly expressed that the same might happen in Britain, the mother of parliamentary democracy—a thought that would have been not only unutterable but unthinkable even two years ago. France is grappling with serious economic problems arising out of severe inflation and increased energy costs, and in Portugal there is growing economic and political upheaval. The Communist Party has openly declared that its prime goal is to destroy capitalism in Britain, to convert Britain completely into a socialist state and to use it as a bridgehead for the destruction of capitalism in Europe and throughout the world.

On our side of the Atlantic, the new government in Chile, though apparently stable, seems to be making little progress towards a solution of that country's economic problems, while in Argentina the situation, both politically and economically, is becoming more precarious every day. Regarding our great neighbour to the south, the Watergate nightmare has receded somewhat into the background.

Nevertheless, nobody seems to have any clear idea as to what should be done about inflation and the economic situation generally, either in the United States or throughout the world. The proposals put forward by President Ford and Mr. Kissinger to bring down the price of oil have not met with much enthusiasm from the other oil-consuming nations; on the other hand, the proposal of those nations to recycle the revenue of oil-producing countries has, in turn, been received most coolly by the United States.

Apart from Canada, the brighter spots in the world economic picture are West Germany, Japan and Brazil. In West Germany the rate of increase of inflation has been kept at a relatively lower level than in the rest of Europe; Japan has recovered from the initial panic and is now making good progress towards adjusting to the exorbitant increase in oil prices; and Brazil has managed to coexist with runaway inflation by indexing prices, wages, salaries, profits, taxes, interest rates and other types of costs and incomes.

Here in Canada we have more to be thankful for than any other people on earth. We have a stable government and free democratic institutions. We have plenty of good food at prices much lower than in other industrialized nations. We have adequate supplies of oil and other forms of energy at a cost which is about 40 per cent lower than the world price and, by and large, inflation, though high by previous standards, has been much less severe and has caused much less hardship than in other countries, with the possible exception of the United States.

That is not to say that there are not some dark spots in the Canadian picture. Crime and disregard for law and order seem to be on the increase in Canada, as in other parts of the world. Illegal strikes are commonplace, court injunctions are disregarded with impunity, and the absence of fines and penalties amounts to condonation of such tactics and can only encourage their use. One cannot help being concerned about the growing tendency of both labour and management to try to turn Parliament into a labour tribunal to settle their disputes instead of trying to find a just solution to their differences by bargaining with each other in good faith. Of even greater concern is the growing militancy of labour unions led by leftist leaders and their tendency to consider themselves above the law or a law unto themselves. When we compare ourselves with other countries on this basis, we must not allow ourselves to become complacent and think it cannot happen here. As Senator Desruisseaux pointed out in his excellent speech on October 3, the shocking revelations brought to light by the provincial inquiry into the construction industry in Quebec are proof not only that it can happen here but that it actually is happening here already.

The Throne Speech makes note of this situation when it refers to consultation with business, professions, farmers, labour and provincial governments. It states:

They will be asked if improvements can be made to the basically adversarial nature of the collective bargaining system, leading toward a joint search for solutions to mutual problems.

[Senator Carter.]

gaining system, leading toward a joint search for solutions to mutual problems.

It should be apparent, however, that what is really needed is a new spirit in all Canadians, and that unless Canadians can be inspired with a new sense of responsibility, purpose and discipline, ideas resulting from such consultations, however good in themselves, are not likely to work.

● (1520)

There is a great tendency in Canada today to condemn the Speech from the Throne for not providing instant solutions to the problem of inflation. The press generally, and intellectuals who ought to know better, by utilizing their access to press, radio and television, all propagate this idea that government should come up with some instant solution, or, at least, should do something new, but no one says what the government should do.

On the Sunday following the opening of Parliament, the CBC carried an open line program discussing the Throne Speech and conducting a poll for or against it. The anchor-man, or one of the anchor-men, on this program, a member of the Press Gallery, also propagated this idea of instant solution and condemned the government for not taking action. He was very careful, however, not to say what action should be taken. His brand of thinking can be gauged by his own statement that he was in favour of the Throne Speech when it was brought down, but turned against it because the Prime Minister did not make any extended reference to inflation in his leaders' day speech in the house. How anything the Prime Minister said or left unsaid could change the Throne Speech which he originally favoured he did not explain. This kind of activity is a disservice to Canada.

Nobody in the world knows what to do about inflation. A week or so ago President Ford called a summit meeting of all the top economists in the United States. They could not come up with any new ideas, and could not even agree among themselves as to what should be done. A couple of weeks ago the President announced some measures, many of which our government has already taken. Inflation is rampant in Japan, Italy, Britain, France and other European countries, and is much worse than it is in Canada. There are very clever people in those countries, but the most brilliant minds among them have not been able to find an answer to inflation. If they could, they would certainly lose no time in putting it into operation. Why should Canadian cabinet ministers be expected to succeed where all others in the world have failed?

I said earlier such broadcasting was a disservice to Canada. It is a disservice because it hides the real truth from the people, and the truth is that the government's policy to fight inflation was announced in the last session of Parliament and is already being implemented. That policy is to encourage increased production of food and other commodities and services and to lessen the impact of inflation on low and fixed income groups, first, by increasing and indexing family allowances, pensions and other social security payments; secondly, by subsidizing certain basic food items along with oil, gas and fuel; thirdly, by increasing the stabilizing effect of the unemployment insurance program and higher income tax exemptions for low income groups.

These policies were all announced and put into effect at the last session of Parliament. The Speech from the Throne confirms the continuation of these policies, and lists a number of extensions and refinements. Furthermore, these policies are working reasonably well. The proof of the pudding is in the eating; and inflation in Canada, though high, is among the lowest in the world. Why should the government change a policy that is working fairly well and go off half-cocked in some unknown direction just for the appearance of taking action without knowing what the end result will be? Surely it is wiser "to leave well enough alone" than to do something that might make the problem worse instead of better. Most economists agree it is impossible for any country to have a rate of inflation significantly lower than that of the United States of America.

It is now generally conceded that it will take at least four or five years to bring inflation under control in the world at large, and that is based on a number of assumptions that may not materialize. Those who advocate instant solution, or action for action's sake, either are deliberately misleading the people or they don't know what they are talking about.

Actually there are three main kinds of inflation: demand-pull inflation caused by a surplus of money chasing a scarcity of goods; cost-push inflation which results when wage increases are higher than productivity increases; and structural inflation due to scarcities caused by droughts, floods or early frost, and caused also by arbitrary price fixing by monopolistic cartels of oil, energy, steel and other basic commodities.

The standard remedy for demand-pull inflation is to increase the supply of goods and reduce the money supply through high interest rates and restraint of credit. In so far as high interest rates contribute to inflation by increasing production costs, as Senator Hicks pointed out earlier today, this remedy does not work too well. For that reason the government must restrain its own spending and help prevent interest rates from going higher than necessary by curtailing its own demands on the money market. The Throne Speech says that the government intends to do this, but as Senator Perrault pointed out in his excellent leaders' day speech, provincial and municipal spending now greatly exceeds expenditures by the federal government.

The real remedy for cost-push inflation is higher productivity. The government has encouraged this by incentives brought down in the last budget. If productivity increases remain below wage increases, the next best remedy is voluntary wage and price restraints. Honourable senators will recall that in 1969/70, Prime Minister Trudeau and his government made an all-out assault on inflation and set up a Prices and Incomes Commission which called for voluntary restraints, but although management indicated its willingness to comply, labour flatly refused to co-operate in any way whatsoever.

Mr. Trudeau, however, persisted in his war on inflation with the only other means at his disposal—fiscal and monetary measures—but when unemployment began to increase there was a tremendous hue and cry from the very people who are now howling because they say the government is not doing enough about inflation.

Had there been more co-operation on the part of labour in 1969/70, unemployment might not have been so high, inflation would certainly not have been so severe, and the Canadian economy would have been in a better position to cope with the unexpected exorbitant increase in the price of oil.

As for structural inflation, what can anybody do about drought, floods and early frosts, or for that matter about multinational cartels and monopolies? I have already mentioned the lack of unanimity in dealing with the oil cartel, OPEC. There are, however, some other causes of inflation which I was conveniently prefer to ignore. They are greed, selfishness and dishonesty, and to the extent we indulge in these vices we each make our own contribution to inflation.

The problem of inflation is, therefore, in some respects a measure of our morality as a people. Millions of dollars worth of goods are stolen in transit to the retail stores, and many more millions of dollars worth from the stores themselves. I was staggered when a garage owner told me the cost of parts, tools and materials stolen from his repair shop and the damage caused by his employees which could not be recovered. It ran into many thousands of dollars, and besides that other thousands were lost through absenteeism, carelessness, shoddy workmanship, and failure to give an honest day's work for an honest day's pay. The construction, plumbing and electrical industries have the same experience. On the other hand, greed and selfishness on the part of management result in dishonest prices and unconscionable profits. While we have no satisfactory way of measuring it, there is no doubt this dishonesty, this irresponsible "don't care" attitude on the part of both employers and employees, makes a significant contribution to inflation.

I see no hope of solving our problem unless we can first develop a new spirit in Canada based on a new sense of responsibility resulting from a higher level of morality, and I believe that, as senators, we should impress this upon our people and do all we can to bring it about. In this way we can give real leadership to the nation.

It is apparent now that the world cannot go on, as it has in the past, wasting precious energy and resources with reckless abandon. The industrialized world cannot go on doubling its consumption of energy and water and raw materials every 10, 15 or 20 years. Rich countries cannot go on piling up their own wealth while the rest of the world gets poorer. Sooner or later a change in our life styles will be forced upon us whether we want it or not. The longer it is postponed the more drastic and violent will be the adjustment.

The sensible thing is to start now to adjust our life styles on a voluntary basis and to change our present wasteful "throw-away," "built in obsolescence" society into a responsible society that will take into consideration the needs of humanity as a whole, as well as a more equal distribution of the wealth we produce ourselves. The world seems to be heading towards economic disaster. But it may not happen and it need not happen. The problems we face are beyond man's capacity to solve. Unless we recognize that, I see no grounds for hope. We will go the way we see other nations going now. An outbreak of honesty and unselfishness in Canada can go a long way towards solving our own problems, and if we Canadians humbly seek divine aid to see ourselves honestly as we really are and to discipline ourselves to put our own house in order we can greatly help to bring about a better world for all mankind.

Hon. Margaret Norrie: Honourable senators, before taking part in the debate on the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I wish to express my delight at hearing the news that the Governor General is making such a good recovery from his recent illness. I am sure that all honourable senators feel as I do when I say that I look forward to the day when His Excellency and Madame Léger will be able to continue their official functions.

[Translation]

To you, Senator Renaude Lapointe, I wish to convey my most sincere congratulations for your recent appointment as Speaker of the Senate.

You may be assured of my fullest support and I wish to extend my best wishes for the years to come.

[English]

Since I have been in the Senate I have been impressed by your quiet dignity, strength, ability and intelligence. Our Prime Minister has made a wise choice, and has appointed a worthy successor to our former Speaker, the Honourable Muriel McQueen Fergusson, who carried out her duties so graciously and confidently. Needless to say, having two such outstanding and capable woman senators in this office will have a lasting and beneficial effect on the status of women not only in Canada, but indeed in the democratic world.

To the new Leader of the Government in the Senate, Senator Perrault from British Columbia, I extend my sincere welcome. May your term of office be strong in constructive legislation for the good of all Canadians, strong in wisdom to tackle the complex problems of inflation, and strong in terms of the inspired and courageous leadership needed to help our countrymen to avoid the pitfalls in today's business and social world.

To the former Leader of the Government in the Senate, Senator Martin, I say: You will be greatly missed. Your fame as a statesman is well known in Canada as well as abroad, and we know you will fill any new appointment with honour and distinction, as you have filled so many other posts while serving Canada.

Senator Joan Neiman is worthy of much praise for her scholarly speech in moving the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Congratulations, Senator Joan.

I am delighted by the appointment of my new brother colleagues from Nova Scotia. Senator Cottreau in seconding the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, made an excellent maiden speech. During my life I have been closely associated with Acadian French people from Westmorland County, New Brunswick. They are a fine, intelligent segment of our society, and I am happy that you are here, Senator Cottreau, to present the problems of this minority group of our Nova Scotia population at the federal level. They will be well served, I know.

[Senator Carter.]

I have known Senator Barrow for a long time. His guidance many years ago helped me in my work with women's groups in Nova Scotia. He is a distinguished citizen of Nova Scotia in the educational and business world. I know that he will offer a great deal to our deliberations in the Senate.

Honourable senators, we in the Senate are very much aware of the outstanding ability of Senator Grosart. May I say to you, Senator Grosart, that you have a heavy task, but we know that you will carry out your new duties with dexterity. Your vast knowledge of parliamentary protocol as well as national and international affairs will mean a great deal to us all on both sides of the house in the conduct of our business.

Senator Petten's appointment as Government Whip in the Senate was formally announced a few days ago. This is a well-earned position for our Newfoundland senator, and I extend my best wishes and congratulations to him.

The celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the entry of Newfoundland into Confederation is an important event for Canadians. This island, rich in history and unexcelled in beauty, is virtually unexplored by most Canadians. This year has been educational as well as revealing to tourists who visited the island, and it is hoped that as a result there will be an acceleration of tourism which will benefit all concerned.

Honourable senators, we are all suffering from the ravages of inflation. We are told that we in Canada are in a more favoured position than that of any other nation in the world. This may be comforting in one sense, but the fact that world-wide inflation is raging is much more ominous and foreboding. The other factors involved I will leave to the monetary and fiscal experts to puzzle over.

Honourable senators, I wish to refer to a national issue, not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, but, in my opinion, nevertheless an urgent one. I hope that we can prevail upon the present government to remove all references to abortion from the Criminal Code. It is high time for us to bring this deplorable practice to a safe and honourable end. Let us go further in our legislation and give to women of all classes, ages, races and creeds a chance to choose according to their consciences whether they wish to bear the child already developing within their body. This is an urgent matter because every day that we postpone a decision on this issue, women and girls are going to unqualified sources for help, and risking their lives in obtaining an abortion.

I commend the National Action Committee on the Status of Women for their humane and broadminded approach to this controversial problem. I quote from the June 1974 issue of their publication Status of Women News:

We the members of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women wish to call your attention to the convictions of more than a million women in the matter of abortion and to request immediate action.

There are problems with the present law.

Abortion is a moral issue which must be resolved by individual conscience in a pluralistic society.

Abortion is an issue on which our society is divided. All affirm the worth of human life, but there is strong disagreement as to when it begins, how to define human life, and how to weigh priorities when the interests of mother and foetus are in conflict. Since there is no unanimity on these questions, we are convinced that the morality of abortion is an issue for private conscience and not public decision-making.

The function of law should not be to reinforce one particular view of morality, but to protect the right of every citizen to choose a moral view according to his or her own conscience and in relation to the best interests of society...

Therefore, the National Action Committee on the Status of Women urges the Government of Canada to put an end to interference by the law in a decision which should be made between a patient and a doctor.

The present law is unfair, discriminatory, and unworkable...

In fact, the present law is being interpreted very differently from region to region, and financial circumstances heighten these differences...

The result of the present discriminating law is that women in desperation try to circumvent it in whatever ways are possible. They have difficulty in obtaining appointments, suffer delay between the initial appointment and final procedure and this often leads to unnecessarily late abortions with a higher risk of complications. Rural women, poorer women, and new Canadians who do not know how to use medical services are at a special disadvantage. They go to other parts of Canada or out of the country, they sustain severe emotional stress in order to have their application approved by the hospital committee, or they seek abortion from illegal and incompetent people. Even more important, they continue the pregnancy and have unwanted children. All of this is because of a law which, although liberalized, is unjust and denies many women their basic right to make the most reasonable and personal decision in accordance with their own values, needs, and situation, and in consultation with their doctor and hopefully their male partner.

The following appears under the heading: "Priorities for Government Action."

We believe that the Government of Canada must:

1. remove all reference to abortion from the Criminal Code...

3. act on the recommendations of the 1972 First National Conference on Family Planning, convened by the Department of National Health and Welfare which reads as follows:

"Family planning policy, programs and services should encompass the full range of birth control methods..."

4. give high priority to the allocation of much larger amounts of money than have previously been stipulated for research, training, and services related to conception and fertility in Canada.

I quote Pierre Berton and June Callwood on only one of several items in a telegram they sent to the Minister of Justice, the Honourable Otto Lang:

We believe that medical facilities where abortions can be performed in maximum safety should be available to all Canadian women, even if they live in areas without such facilities, even if they are poor, even if they are young. A law which provides access to abortion only to a few and only in some locations is unjust.

Let women and their consciences decide their own destiny with regard to abortion. Due to the abhorrent circumstances which usually confront women who are contemplating abortion, I wish to urge that this unfair, discriminatory and unworkable law be removed from the Criminal Code. I hope we can urge the Government to remove all reference to abortion from the Criminal Code.

The Throne Speech states that one way to battle inflation is to try to increase the supply of goods and services. A large supply of goods slows down rising prices. Then the Speech goes on to propose an increase in food production. Now, this sounds very logical. One has only to be a farmer working with limited capital to make one very cautious as to how much to produce. He is confronted with many risks such as rising costs of fuel to run his equipment, slow service in replacing broken machinery parts, bad weather—too much rain, too little rain, early frost—and pests. The list is very long and the guarantees of a market, if one has lots of produce, is uncertain.

Last week I heard on the news the startling fact that the world is running out of food. I ask, what is new? What has been going on in Bangladesh and in parts of Africa for the last few years? We farmers have been shouting this warning for several years, and it is true. Even in the grocery store where I shop I see empty shelves more often than I care to admit. I do not see this in Toronto or Ottawa, but I do see it in Nova Scotia. The farmers are not producing, because they cannot afford to supply the public at below cost prices. The Honourable Eugene Whelan only yesterday, October 15, said if he does not get a better deal for farmers we are all going to be out of luck, paying higher prices than ever for food, if we can get it. Farmers want some security.

The provincial governments first of all must prevent our farm land from disappearing under asphalt and urban sprawl. The forces ignoring this encroachment are gigantic and selfish beyond belief. We need stringent laws, both federally and provincially, to save this farmland for food production. The federations of agriculture in our provinces are trying hard to win this battle of conservation of our farmland. Encroachment of urban sprawl also causes unending harassment to the farmer by those ignorant of the work and problems of farmers. This usually becomes so bad that the farmer has no choice but to pull out and move to a more isolated area. I am looking forward with eagerness to the implementation of the methods proposed for stabilization of incomes and markets for farm produce, as stated in the Throne Speech.

When the Senate Agriculture Committee toured the Kent Country region of New Brunswick last year, we were shocked to find no replacements for retired French-speaking agricultural representatives. The farmers on the east coast are reluctant to go to the west side of New Brunswick to meetings for discussing agricultural problems at the experimental station. This is too far to travel, and means a day away from work, apart from the fact that all the discussions are in English, which they would not understand. I would like to recommend at this point that an experimental station be set up in the Kent County area to service the French-speaking people employed in agriculture. They need an experimental station near at hand for it to be of any use in revitalizing the farming industry in this depressed region.

The Faculty of Agriculture of Laval University was also made aware of their lack of contact with this area when they met last year at the invitation of the Senate Agriculture Committee. Under the leadership of Principal Lavoie, they have now made a real effort to attract French-speaking students from New Brunswick, and their enrolment has increased this year from two to 24. Senator Michaud was inquiring about them recently, and learned that the students have made fine adjustments and are working very well with the department in Quebec.

The Nova Scotia Agricultural College in Truro has in the past interested many students from eastern New Brunswick. However, that college is not bilingual. This is a step in the right direction, but the benefits will be revealed slowly. We still need stimulating incentives of a quicker and more urgent nature.

I wish now to say a few words about the beef industry, which in particular has been very hard hit. A farmer invests heavily in good breeding stock and then, a year or two later, finds that for his calves he can get only half the sum he needs to make ends meet, and is facing a disastrous future.

This is happening all across Canada. At present beef sells at sales in Nova Scotia from 30 cents to 52 cents per pound, but beef at the counter has not come down one cent. There remains no incentive for farmers facing such hazards, to continue their operations.

Transportation is still a major problem. The government must come to grips with it and find a solution, to save both eastern and western farmers from certain extinction.

The Most Reverend Bishop Power of Antigonish, Nova Scotia, when speaking at Vatican City on world food problems—this was reported in the Toronto Star a day or two ago—voiced his alarm at the world shortage of food for the starving millions. "Food or war" was the theme of the article headlined in the Toronto Star. We are all aware of this vast problem which faces us today.

Hon. G. Percival Burchill: Honourable senators, I did not intend to make a speech when I came into the Senate this afternoon, and I promise that I shall not detain you very long.

Despite the fact that when I first came to the Senate almost 30 years ago I was advised never to tell a story, because a story did not go down well in the Senate, I want to tell this very brief tale about a gentleman who went to bed one night in a highly inebriated state.

Senator Grosart: Careful.

Senator Burchill: In fact, he was so far gone that he could not remember the words of the Lord's Prayer. When he got down on his knees he started off all right, but could not continue. He finished by saying, "Them's my sentiments."

[Senator Norrie.]

I have listened with great pleasure to the gracious compliments paid by numerous speakers to the Governor General, to you, Madam Speaker, to our distinguished former Speaker, to the Leader of the Government, and to the Deputy Leader of the Opposition. I shall not repeat what has already been said. All I shall say is, "Them's my sentiments."

I want to make just one or two observations. Some years ago a distinguished president of a university in the West visited my home community. One of my friends who, with me, was invited to meet him, told me afterwards what a delightful gentleman he found the president to be. "He is," he said, "such a good listener."

Listening today has become a lost virtue among our generation. There are all kinds of speakers. We have television and radio, and, God knows, there are all kinds of books written. Everyone seems to be able to read and talk. However, looking around this chamber this afternoon, and seeing the vacant seats, I have come to the conclusion that one of the graces we have lost is that of being a good listener. Certainly we are not good listeners in the Senate.

This afternoon we have been privileged to hear three excellent speeches. They were all by senators from the Atlantic provinces. Nevertheless, they were excellent speeches. But, my goodness, I have sat here for one or two hours and looked at empty benches across the way, and regretted very much that more senators could not have found the time to enjoy what I have enjoyed listening to this afternoon.

I want to make one or two further observations. I enjoyed Senator Carter's speech about Newfoundland, and I join him in saying that it would be a grand thing if we could cultivate more camaraderie among Canadian citizens and perhaps combat inflation by a better spirit. The province of New Brunswick exports lumber, but it is becoming more and more difficult to do so. The people who buy our lumber—our plywood, particle board and other exportable products—are now unable to pay for them. We are having to tear up our contracts with various countries because they simply do not have the money to pay for our lumber. The result, of course, is that our factories and plants are being closed down, leaving more and more of our citizens without employment.

In spite of all the good we can do here in Canada by arousing a spirit of morality, promoting less wasteful habits, and that sort of thing, we simply cannot do anything about the course of events in other countries. That is the problem with which we in New Brunswick are faced. The process is just now starting. We have had only two or three instances of what I have just described, but I am afraid it is going to get much worse. We are dependent, as is Newfoundland and other provinces, on the export trade. Canada cannot survive without exporting. I have been preaching that all my life. We have to build up export markets. That is one of the reasons why we are feeling the pinch of inflation today.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

AGINGTHE ANATOMY OF A SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE REPORT—
INQUIRY STANDS

On the Inquiry of Senator Croll:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the anatomy of a special Senate committee report, and in particular to

- (a) its evaluation,

(c) as a follow-up, to a suggested future course of action for the Senate.

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, the inquiry standing in my name was on the Order Paper in similar terms in the last days of the last session. However, the election intervened. It has now been on the agenda for 14 days, and I intend to proceed with it on Tuesday next.

Inquiry stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of the Company of Young Canadians, including accounts and financial statements certified by the Auditor General, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1974, pursuant to section 25 of the Company of Young Canadians Act, Chapter C-26, R.S.C., 1970.

Addendum to the actuarial report on the operation of the Canada Pension Plan as at December 31, 1973, tabled in the Senate April 22, 1974, pursuant to section 116(3) of the said Plan, Chapter C-5, R.S.C., 1970.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the Notice of Motion for Adjournment:

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, October 22, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

I would like to tell honourable senators what is in store for us next week. On Tuesday afternoon we will resume the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and Senator Croll will likely proceed with the inquiry standing in his name. On Tuesday evening we will revert to legislation, and we will also deal with legislation on Wednesday and Thursday. Of course, next week we will have several committee meetings to deal with whatever legislation is ready for referral to the committees.

Senator Flynn: I take it the Deputy Leader of the Government is referring to government legislation?

Senator Langlois: Yes.

Senator Flynn: What bills are we going to consider today and next week, and what is the relative urgency of these bills being adopted by the Senate, or at least being referred to a committee of the Senate?

Senator Langlois: As far as the agenda for today is concerned, my honourable friend has a copy of the scroll, on which is listed the legislation for consideration this afternoon. With respect to next week, except for Bill S-5, the other pieces of legislation will be in the hands of my honourable friends, who I suppose will today adjourn the debates on them until next week. The answer to the question is more in the hands of honourable members opposite than in mine.

So far as the urgency is concerned, we have before us now some ten pieces of legislation. Committees have been set up and the sooner we can get them to work on that legislation the better. Without putting pressure on anybody, I think it is our duty to deal with legislation as soon as it reaches us or as soon as we are in a position to deal with it, and that is what I am suggesting. I suggest that we deal with the legislation next week and revert, if need be, to the debate on the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne as soon as we finish with the legislation.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, we are, of course willing to proceed as quickly as is reasonable with respect to all legislation, but may I point out that having before us ten pieces of legislation at the beginning of a session is somewhat unusual and, as a result, presents certain difficulties. Naturally, I am very much in accord with the decision taken by the government, probably at the suggestion of the Leader of the Government here, to initiate legislation in this place, but the difficulty is that in this chamber we do not have available the type of research facilities available in the other place. As a result, we have to choose, on the basis of its urgency, which legislation we are going to give priority to in the matter of research.

As I mentioned to the honourable deputy leader yesterday, I adjourned the debate on Bill S-2, to amend the Supreme Court Act, but I am not prepared to deal with it today. Most probably I will be next week, but, not having the facilities which are available to the members of the other place, the task becomes more difficult, the work becomes much heavier. For these reasons I would urge the government side to help us to establish certain priorities in order to facilitate our tasks as well as the work, generally, of the Senate.

Senator Langlois: If I may add a word to what I have said already, I would submit that the sooner we refer these pieces of legislation to the appropriate committees the sooner we will be in a better position to arrange for the orderly disposal of the legislation and the work of our committees.

As I said earlier, there is no intention on our part to put pressure on anybody to deal with legislation, but the fact is that, logistically, we cannot have more than two or three committees sitting at one time, and I think my honourable friend is not insensible to the difficulties resulting from the shortage of members on his own side of the house. The point is that, if we can avoid that difficulty by spreading the committee work over a number of days, we will have more leisure in which to consider the legislation fully.

Incidentally, I omitted mentioning that there is a strong likelihood that some time next week we will have before us for consideration the appropriation bill from the other place. As the President of the Treasury Board pointed out in our National Finance Committee this morning, it will be necessary for us to deal with this bill before the end of the month. All in all we will have some twelve bills before us, counting the private bill scheduled for second reading later on today.

Senator Grosart: I should like to add a word or two to what the Leader of the Opposition has said. We are, of course, anxious to cooperate and to expedite passage of these bills. However, I have to point out that we cannot do that unless we are given adequate notice of what is going to come up from day to day. In the absence of the Leader of the Opposition I was given assurance that there would, from day to day, be prior consultation with respect to forthcoming legislation. My understanding is that this has not happened. Indeed, when Bill S-7 was introduced yesterday or the day before we had no idea it was going to be. I inquired as late as noon today if we would be given any indication of what bills would be coming up today and I was told that there had been no consultation.

I suggest again to the Leader of the Government and his deputy that it would help us expedite matters if we could be notified as soon as possible just what bills are coming up on a particular day. We would like to deal with them as expeditiously as possible, but we cannot do it if we do not have some warning.

I might add this to what the Leader of the Government has said: Not only do we not have the facilities here that are available to members of the House of Commons, but we do not have the facilities that are available to honourable members opposite.

Senator Perrault: I assure the Leader of the Opposition and his deputy that we are cognizant of some of the problems faced by Her Majesty's Opposition here, and we shall continue to attempt to schedule proposed government activities in conjunction with the Opposition in order to assist their situation.

Motion agreed to.

On the Order:

Second reading of the Bill S-11, intituled: "An Act respecting British Columbia Telephone Company".—
(Honourable Senator Heath.)

Senator Heath: Stand until later this day.

Order stands.

MOTOR VEHICLE TIRE SAFETY BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Joan Neiman moved the second reading of Bill S-8, respecting the use of national safety marks in relation to motor vehicle tires and to provide for safety standards for certain motor vehicle tires imported into or exported from Canada or sent or conveyed from one province to another.

She said: Honourable senators, if it seems, in the words of an old song, that you have heard these words before, you will be quite right. This bill, which is to receive second reading today is, in essence, almost exactly the same bill which was introduced in the Senate during the last session of our previous Parliament. It was moved for second reading on March 21, 1974, and honourable senators who were here at that time may recall that it was then referred to our Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. On April 4 of this year the committee considered the bill in detail in the presence of officials of the Ministry of Transport and of representatives of the Rubber Association of Canada. I will refer to this in detail later on. Subsequently, on April 8, the bill received third reading in this chamber, but it died on the Order Paper of the other place when Parliament dissolved. So the bill has come back to us in substantially the same form, in fact in exactly the same form, as it was presented during the last session. Therefore I feel it is not necessary to deal with the substance of the bill in the same detail as I did last time. I shall simply refer honourable senators to Senate Hansard of March 21, 1974. However, for the information of those senators who did not happen to be here at that time or who did not have the opportunity of attending the committee meeting, I shall recapitulate briefly some of the chief points, the more important points, in the bill itself.

Honourable senators may recall that this bill is also quite similar in substance to another bill passed in 1971, which was called the Motor Vehicle Safety Act. That was some years after the federal government had assumed jurisdiction over all aspects of motor vehicle safety and it was done, of course, in conjunction with and with the full agreement and cooperation of all the provinces.

The Motor Vehicle Safety Act really pertains to all features governing the safety of new motor vehicles, including the tires which came with the original equipment. It was only after the passage of that act that the federal government as well as the provincial governments realized that there was a hiatus as far as safety requirements were concerned in that what is known as replacement tires or after-market tires were not covered in the original bill.

I noted from comments made in committee that there are approximately 20 million tires sold each year in Canada, of which six million fall within the description of original equipment. That means that about 14 million replacement tires are sold each year in Canada. It is towards this market that the present bill is directed to ensure that the same standards are applied to the manufacture, distribution and sale of these replacement tires as are applied to original equipment tires. I might also add that for a number of years now the department has been testing replacement tires as part of their duties although they were not required to do so. The federal government was the only governing body that had the equipment to do this. This was another reason that the provincial governments asked the federal government to assume jurisdiction in this area as well.

I shall recite just briefly some of the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Tire Safety Bill. It, of course, establishes a national tire safety mark as a trade mark which must be used on all tires in order to comply with the regulations. This is comparable to the type of mark placed on new vehicles. There will be prescribed classes covering not only motor vehicles but also types and sizes of passenger car tires, motorcycle tires and heavy-duty highway vehicle tires. All requirements for type of mark and standards of safety, of course, will be prescribed by regulation, of which we do not as yet have copies. I checked with the department again today and was informed that Dr. G. D. Campbell, Director of the Road and Motor Vehicle Safety Branch, happens to be out of the city at the moment. I was informed, however, by his deputy, that until such time as this bill is passed they plan to rely chiefly on the regulations, which are similar in content, under the parent Motor Vehicle Safety Act. I believe, however, that they will be making amendments as they are more pertinent simply to tires.

The bill, of course, also provides that the government will have powers of maintaining and enforcing standards. I recall that at the meeting of the committee a considerable discussion also took place about the power of recall. Some representatives of the Rubber Association of Canada who were present felt that, perhaps, these powers were a little too stringent or too onerous. It was felt that they would involve a greater expenditure of money which, inevitably, would be passed on to the consumer, than the efficacy of this section would warrant. However, it was decided by the members of that committee that it would be preferable to leave the wording of this section as it was and rely on the regulations to interpret it in such a way as not to be too onerous on the manufacturers and distributors who would have to comply with that particular section.

As I said earlier, during the testimony given at that meeting, several representatives of the department were present as were all the major members of the Rubber Association of Canada. Included among these were the presidents of Uniroyal Ltd., Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company of Canada Ltd., Firestone Tire and Rubber Company of Canada Ltd., and B.F. Goodrich Canada Ltd., together with a number of their technical advisers. They did observe during the course of the committee meeting that they supported the bill in general and were thoroughly in agreement with its objectives. Their few objections were directed to minor amendments in wording which, together with most of the problems they foresaw, we hope will be resolved when the regulations are drafted.

If it is the wish of honourable senators, this bill can be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

On motion of Senator Haig, debate adjourned.

[Senator Neiman.]

PROPRIETARY OR PATENT MEDICINE ACT TRADE MARKS ACT

BILL TO REPEAL AND TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell moved the second reading of Bill S-9, to repeal the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act and to amend the Trade Marks Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill S-9, to repeal the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act and to amend the Trade Marks Act becomes effective January 1, 1976, and marks another milestone in the development of the Canadian drug legislation. In taking this step, some thought should be devoted to the development and history of the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act as paralleled with the Food and Drugs Act and its regulations. With the repeal of this act there will be one statute and one set of regulations governing non-prescription drugs in Canada. It is also necessary to examine whether the proposed regulations replacing the act retain the best features of the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act while discarding those features which are out of date.

The Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act came into effect in 1908, and was amended in 1919. Provision was made in the act for regulations, but no such regulations were made. The act has remained virtually intact since 1919. The word "patent" as it applies to medicines had its origin in England in the early part of the 18th century. At that time many people had secret formulae for medicines, and because they did not want anyone else using their formulae, they had them patented for their own use. Once patented, these formulae were put into the British Pharmacopoeia so that the medical people of that day would know what the ingredients were. However, once patented, no one else could use a formula.

I believe the time has now come when we should do away with secrecy in medicine. When this act is repealed it will be the intention of the government to bring in regulations under the Food and Drugs Act which will necessitate the listing on every label of each and every ingredient contained in the medicine. At the present time anyone can manufacture any drug, as long as it meets the requirements of the Food and Drugs Act. Under the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act as it exists now, you can mix up a secret formula, have it registered with the Health Protection Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare, and retail it as a patent medicine.

Generally, the products that are registered under the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act offer relief for minor ailments. The act, in keeping with the philosophy that some medication for minor ailments is necessary, states that only a limited number of drugs can be involved. In other words, it is the feeling of the Department of Health and Welfare that medication for minor ailments should be available to the general public without the necessity of having to obtain a prescription from a physician, but that these medicines, when compounded, must not be made up of too many complicated drugs. In other words, the amount and type of drugs used in patent medicines are regulated by the Department of National Health and Welfare.

The Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act provided a valuable service. Prior to 1908 there were some 5,600 different patent drugs on the market. Since the introduction of the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act that number has been cut down to 2,000.

By way of explanation, drugs are divided into two categories, those requiring a prescription and those which are sold over the counter. All medicines under the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act can be sold over the counter. The pharmacy acts of each of the provinces allow all medicines under the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act to be sold in general stores. Once this act is repealed, the pharmacy acts of the various provinces will be amended to allow proprietary or patent medicines to be sold through general stores without having to be sold through pharmacies.

Last year the Minister of National Health and Welfare commissioned a major study of the factors influencing consumers in their buying behaviours in the drug field, with special reference to the use of non-prescription drugs. That study is addressing itself to such important questions as the degree of use, the type of use and the underlying reasons affecting the degree of use, as well as the conceptions held by the public about non-prescription drugs. When that study is completed, the results will be made available to the public. A portion of the first phase of this study has been completed and I expect that preliminary data will be available in a few weeks. At this stage I can only say that the data indicate widespread use of non-prescription drugs by Canadians.

The Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act does not require a quantitative list of ingredients on the labels of drug products, as does the Food and Drugs Act. These ingredients are secret, known only to the manufacturer and the Health Protection Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare. The government, the medical profession, pharmaceutical experts and the drug industry itself take the view that the secrecy provisions of the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act are outdated. It is inconceivable that a consumer should not know the ingredients of a medicine that he can buy in a grocery store and take without medical supervision. It may very well be necessary for the consumer to know, so that he may seek proper assistance in the case of poisoning or allergies. May I stress again, honourable senators, that once under the food and drug regulations proprietary medicines will require a quantitative list of ingredients on the label.

In the food and drug regulations covering proprietary medicines, all the positive aspects of the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act are to be retained, and at the same time proprietary medicines become subject to the Food and Drugs Act regulations.

It is intended that the regulations controlling proprietary medicines will contain provisions enabling regulatory authorities to respond rapidly to the changing scientific and technological environment in the drug field. Thus, the regulations will contain sections enabling a continuous scientific review of data pertaining to the manufacture, quality, safety and effectiveness of proprietary medicines. I must stress that when controlled under food and drug regulations proprietary medicines will continue to be available in non-pharmacy outlets, as they are now.

The government intends to include in the regulations controlling proprietary medicines various powers enabling a continuous scientific review of data pertaining to the quality, manufacture, safety and effectiveness of proprietary medicines. For example, when it is felt that more manufacturing data or more information on efficacy and safety are required, the manufacturer may be required to supply the Health Protection Branch with certain information when he changes the medicine in such a way that it may affect its safety and effectiveness.

Provision will also be made for the cancellation of certificates of registration of proprietary medicines which have failed a scientific review. The medicines can only be sold as proprietary medicines. Further controls on the sale would depend upon the circumstances of the review.

It is envisaged that the current Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act and the proposed regulations will exist in parallel until January 1, 1976, when the repeal of the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act becomes effective. This parallel existence will give the proprietary industry and the provinces over a year to adjust to the new regulations. Since both the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act and the proposed new proprietary division of the food and drug regulations are voluntary regulations, in the sense that a manufacturer is free to apply for registration as he wishes, manufacturers could decide which set of regulations would govern the sale of their product up until January 1, 1976. After that date, of course, only the regulations under the Food and Drugs Act would apply.

In summary, I am confident that the creation of a proprietary medicines division in the food and drug regulations, with necessary additional controls contained therein, will provide the Canadian public with safer and more effective proprietary medicines. The Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act has outlived its usefulness, and the time has arrived to treat all drugs under the food and drug regulations.

As far as the Trade Marks Act is concerned, the amendment to the act only refers proprietary medicines to the Food and Drugs Act in the future rather than to the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act, since it will no longer be in existence after that date; it is more a housekeeping measure.

After this bill has been debated on second reading, I think it could be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science for further study.

Senator Buckwold: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Bonnell: Yes.

Senator Buckwold: I do not know whether this bothers other honourable senators, but to me it seems important. You have included in the regulations, quite properly, according to what you said, provisions regarding quality, safety and effectiveness, but you did not mention anything about advertising claims, false advertising. I realize that presently that may be dealt with under a different government department, but I am wondering whether this is not the place where that kind of control would be more effective.

Senator Bonnell: I am not an expert in the administration of the Department of National Health and Welfare, but I would venture to say that that would come under Consumer Affairs to protect the public against false advertising. This bill and the Food and Drugs Act are intended to assure the public of what drugs are actually in the medicine. The label will be there for the protection and safety of the person taking it, so that if they take an overdose or are allergic to it the doctor treating the patient will know what medicine the patient was receiving, rather than having a secret formula, when no one knows what is in it.

Senator Buckwold: I agree that it now comes under Consumer Affairs. The point of my question, which was not answered, is whether it would not be better under these regulations to control that type of advertising, which may not be based exactly on the facts.

Senator Bonnell: The answer to that question would be no.

Senator Grosart: I wonder if I could direct a question to the sponsor of the bill (Senator Bonnell). In view of the fact that the general purport of the bill seems to be to substitute regulations under the Food and Drugs Act for the certificate of registration now under the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act, might I ask who makes these regulations under the Food and Drugs Act? Is it the minister or the Governor in Council? What is the wording? On a number of occasions in this Senate we have stressed the importance of knowing the authority for making the regulations, and the wording. I would be interested to know what the wording is. Is it that the minister may make regulations "which in his opinion are necessary to implement the act," or is the phrasing "which are necessary to implement the act"? It is most important that we know the phrasing and the authority for these regulations under the Food and Drugs Act, which are now taking over a very important aspect of the former act.

• (1450)

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I cannot answer the question as to just exactly how the wording is in the act or where the authority comes from, but I believe that in the regulations under the Food and Drugs Act a new section will be added, which will go before the Governor in Council and will then be reviewed by the appropriate committee of this house and the other place to determine whether it meets all the requirements of the legislation. The matter has not reached that stage of planning yet, because this act does not come into effect until 1976. It is more or less giving notice to the provinces and proprietary medicine people of Canada that this is going to take place, so that they can start making adjustments to accord with this legislation. For the moment, therefore, proprietary medicines can still be sold by drugstores or pharmacies to the general public.

However, these amendments have not been drawn up yet, and I am not just sure of the wording under the act by which the minister has his authority.

Senator Grosart: Would the sponsor of the bill be good enough to obtain that information, and so inform the Senate in due course?

Senator Bonnell: I would be glad to do that.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

[Senator Buckwold.]

STATUTE REVISION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury moved the second reading of Bill S-3, to provide for a continuing revision and consolidation of the statutes and regulations of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, it is a pleasure to be able to introduce this bill because I think it is one which has been needed for a long time. It provides for the establishment of a permanent statutory revision commission within the Department of Justice. The commission would be permanent in the sense that, unlike previous commissions established by Parliament to revise the public general statutes of Canada, it would not be set up solely for the purposes of a specific revision and consolidation of the statutes. Its duties, rather, would extend on into the future; it would revise and consolidate the statutes on a continuing basis. The commission would be authorized to maintain an on-going consolidation of the statutes for the purpose of producing complete revisions at periodic intervals.

It might shock some a little bit to learn that since Confederation the statutes have been consolidated and revised on only five occasions. The first revision was in 1886. The revisions which followed were in 1906, 1927, 1952 and 1970. The periods between those revisions ranged from 18 to 25 years. People who are required to make constant use of the public general statutes of this country, and also those who only occasionally refer to them, are put to considerable inconvenience if the period between the revisions is too long. By establishing a permanent commission consisting of designated revisers who would carry out their duties under the direction of the Minister of Justice, it will be possible to arrange for consolidations and revision of the statutes to occur more frequently in the future.

Ever since the first consolidation of statutes in Canada, which was the consolidation of the Statutes of the Province of Canada in 1859, two basic methods have been used to give parliamentary sanction to the revision work. One method used particularly in the earlier revisions was to enact a validating bill or a statute revision act after the completion of the consolidation, when the work on the revision was available to Parliament in its final form. The other method, which has been more common in later revisions, was to enact a statute revision act before the commencement of the work of revision. Such a statute normally empowered a commission to arrange, revise and consolidate the statutes and provided for the coming into force of the revision by proclamation.

This new bill not only represents a combination of the best features of both of the old systems, but it adds an important new procedure—one which I think is particularly important to this chamber—a provision that, for the first time in our history, Parliament would be involved more directly in the actual work of revision. Under the new procedure a committee of each house, or a joint committee of both houses, would be required to examine and approve drafts of the revision, either during the progress of the preparation of the revision or at the conclusion thereof. After such approval the revision would be brought into force by a validating act, substantially in accord with the model bill which is attached to this bill. Such a process would not only make parliamentarians aware of the scope and manner of a revision, but would also make the revision a more direct product of Parliament itself.

In addition to authorizing the continuing revision of the statutes, the bill also embodies for the first time in a statute revision bill the authority and the duty to consolidate and revise the regulations of Canada.

If you think the situation has been bad with respect to the statutes, you might consider the problem with respect to regulations. Since Confederation there have been only two general consolidations of the statutory orders and regulations in Canada. One was in 1949 and the other was in 1955. In each case the consolidation represented a compilation rather than a revision of the regulations then in force, and the regulations that were consolidated did not revoke and replace the regulatory law that was in effect at the time.

Under the bill we now have before us, the commission, for the first time, would have in respect of the regulations powers similar to those that are provided in respect of a revision of the statutes. These powers include the authority to omit from a revision "all Acts or parts thereof that have expired, have been repealed or suspended, or have had their effect," and to "alter the numbering and arrangement of the statutes and of the different Parts, sections and other divisions thereof," and to "make such alterations in the language of the statutes as may be required to preserve a uniform mode of expression, without changing the substance of any enactment." They also include the authority to "correct editing, grammatical or typographical errors in the statutes," and to use drafting devices such as the division of sentences into lettered paragraphs in order to bring out more clearly the intent of the legislative enactment.

Because those powers are so broad, honourable senators, the role of Parliament in the whole process is extremely important.

In addition to providing for the preparation and publication of bound volumes of both the revised statutes and the consolidated regulations, the bill also gives the commission the authority to publish loose-leaf editions. There are also provisions which empower the commission to make editions of its work available in microfilm form, or by electronic data processing techniques for visual display on computer terminals, or for such other technological devices as automated typing or high-speed printouts.

In recognition of the need for a comprehensive indexing system, the bill authorizes the commission to cause indices to both statutes and regulations to be published on a continuing basis.

The bill also authorizes the commission to publish tables of acts of Parliament that have been omitted from, but not repealed by, earlier revisions of the statutes as well as tables of private acts. The commission would also have authority to publish special editions of constitutional or quasi-constitutional statutes, and special editions of local or private statutes.

● (1500)

The basic purpose of the bill is to make the law more readily available to the public, to the legal profession, and to parliamentarians.

Honourable senators, I regard this bill as being long past due. I believe it is likely to improve our role in keeping our legislation and regulations current, and will deal, finally, with a situation which has been most awkward for anyone whose interests or profession require him to consult the federal statutes and regulations.

Senator Laird: Will the honourable senator permit a question? I note with interest that there is talk, first, of consolidation, and second, of a loose-leaf system. Is he able to tell us whether the intention is to make the loose-leaf proposition permanent, with our having to add and subtract from time to time, as we do with the publications of the tax services, or is this to be done, say, annually, with a bound edition of the revised statutes and/or regulations being brought out at regular intervals?

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, the power to create a loose-leaf edition is a permissive one. It is not obligatory upon the commission, and therefore I think it must be said at this point that no decision has been made in the area in which this question lies. I think the distinction between consolidation and revision, as the honourable senator knows, is that the revision has legal effectiveness. It can be used in court as evidence of the existence of the wording of the act, and so on. Consolidations do not have that legal status, but are there for the convenience of the people using them. It is possible that the commission will use the loose-leaf method of compiling and developing a consolidation, but when it finally becomes a revision it will be a fully consolidated, permanent book. I am speculating in that regard, because it is permissive in those terms.

Senator Laird: Is there any provision in the act making it obligatory to consolidate at any specified period?

Senator Stanbury: No. That is a weakness of this measure, in my opinion. The feeling has been expressed in the other place that it would be too inflexible, without a period of experience, if a time were fixed. I think it has been said that there should not be more than 15 years between revisions, but it seems that a period of experience is desired to see how the system works, and to see whether Parliament can handle a continuing review of legislation in terms of consolidation and revision, and then be in a position to go ahead with the revision.

On motion of Senator Choquette, debate adjourned.

FEEDS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Hazen Argue moved the second reading of Bill S-10, to amend the Feeds Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I am sure Bill S-10 will commend itself to the Senate. We had a bill before us last year in the same general area, I would suggest, namely, a bill to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. When that bill went to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture we had three very detailed hearings. We heard from all interested organizations and from the department. A number of amendments were suggested and adopted by the committee, and the bill passed the Senate but died in the other place when the last Parliament was dissolved.

I would hope that that kind of bill, or that bill itself, might be re-introduced in the Senate this year, because I feel that the progress that was made last year should not be wasted. We would be in a position to give it an expeditious hearing at this time.

I can understand the position of the official Opposition when faced with a number of bills, in view of the fact that its numbers are not great. I think the Leader of the Opposition said that they do not have access to the research resources that are available to members opposite. Well, I have not found too many research resources available to senators sitting on the government side, but it is true that when a senator moves the second reading of a government bill he or she is provided with a number of notes from the particular department. These are most helpful, and I would like to suggest to the Leader of the Government in the Senate that we might consider making them available to members of the Opposition. I have not seen anything particularly secret about any of the material I have ever had, and I think that kind of general background information would be of help.

I have the departmental notes on this bill in my hand, and when I am finished I guess most of them will be on the record, because I intend to read the material that has been provided to me. I could make my own ad lib speech—I think I have a bit of understanding of what the bill is about—but I do not think I could improve on the precise nature of the material that has been provided.

Senator Flynn: Even if you did not have an understanding of it you could speak about it.

Senator Argue: I might point this out to honourable senators, that I agree with those who feel that there is a need in discussing a bill like this, and other legislation, to have some research facilities available to us so that we can have a bit of back-up, and so that we can get some material that would help us in the discussion of legislation. In this regard, I would like to pass the following information on to honourable senators. Some may already know it; to others it may be new.

Some of us have taken an interest in seeing whether the committees branch of the Senate might be able, at least to some extent and when they have time, to provide us with the kind of basic research material we need on a given subject, if the request is made to them. The principle has now been established that if a senator asks the committees branch of the Senate to provide some research material then, with their limited resources, they are prepared to help. I might say that I personally had one example of this. I asked them for research material on the subject of the Turks and Caicos Islands. They took a few weeks to produce the material, but I want to say they did an excellent job as far as I was concerned. The material was most comprehensive; it covered the subject. I would think that those facilities, modest, moderate and limited as they are, might be of some help, if I may say so, to senators on the Opposition side, as well as to those on the government side.

Bill S-10 is an act to amend the Feeds Act. The present Feeds Act provides for the regulation of livestock feeds, as to their composition, packaging, and labelling. Under these provisions mixed feeds are required to be registered prior to sale, a device used to assure that the properties of the feed may be assessed and sale permitted only for those feeds with properties consistent with current nutritional and health standards for livestock, and the resulting products which for human consumption may meet food quality standards under the Food and Drugs Act.

The last major revision of the act was in 1960, and since then there have been many advances in animal nutrition, in manufacturing and distribution methods and in feed testing. There are many new products such as synthetic amino acids, and by-products of other industries proposed for use in feeds, preservatives, enzyme products and colouring agents, for use in feeding animals that are not included under the present definition for "feed," and hence are not subject to regulation.

An increasing proportion of mixed feeds are now formulated at the farmer-producer level. The present act does not provide authority for control over such feeds, since they are not sold in the marketplace as such. They can contain additives and other ingredients that can have an adverse effect on livestock, man and environmental quality.

Feeds can be carriers of disease-causing organisms, such as Salmonella, and act as a reservoir for reinfection of animals with resulting adulteration of food for human use. Eradication of such infection cannot be accomplished only by checking feeds offered for sale. Manufacturing plant inspection and cleanup are also necessary.

For these reasons it was found necessary to consider changes in the legislation.

Bill S-10 does not change the basic provisions of the present act, but rather extends its provisions to maintain its relevancy to current and anticipated development in the livestock industry and animal husbandry generally.

The major modifications contained in this bill are to:

- extend the definition of "feed" to all those ingredients used in livestock feeding which are not covered by definition for "feed" in the present Act;
- provide authority to regulate feeds manufactured by a producer for his own use that may contain substances harmful to human health or the environment;
- provide authority to regulate facets of the manufacturing of feeds that result in the production of feeds containing disease organisms or substances harmful to livestock, man or the environment; and
- provide for the regulation of feeds manufactured or sold for commercial fish production for human consumption.

Honourable senators, it is my intention, if this bill receives second reading, to move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture for a very thorough examination. I am sure the committee will be happy to hear not only the minister and officials from the department, but also any persons or organizations that may wish to present submissions on this subject.

In my view this is another instance of where the Senate can do useful work by passing, initially, a bill which should recommend itself to the House of Commons and to the country generally.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Yuzyk, debate adjourned.

CUSTOMS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Eric Cook moved the second reading of Bill S-4, to amend the Customs Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the bill before us will, if passed, amend the Customs Act to give the customs authorities jurisdiction over a 12-mile limit in place of the existing three-mile limit. As a result the jurisdiction of the customs will be extended to the outer limits of Canada's territorial sea as defined in the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act.

It will be of interest, particularly to new members of the Senate, if I mention that the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act, which was passed in 1964, was first introduced and passed by the Senate. Indeed, I had the privilege of introducing and explaining the bill on April 30, 1964. By that act, speaking in very general terms, the territorial sea of Canada was defined as comprising the areas of the sea within three nautical miles from the baselines described in the act. However, the act also created and defined the fishing zones of Canada as comprising those areas of the sea extending a further nine nautical miles beyond the territorial seas.

This continued to be the law up until 1970 when Parliament passed an amending act. That amending act repealed the old definitions, abolished the old three-mile territorial sea limit and the previous nine-mile fishing zone, and substituted the new Canada territorial sea which is now defined as extending for the full 12 miles. By law, therefore, Canada's territorial sea now extends a full 12 miles from the baselines as determined by the Governor in Council, or from the low water line along the coast.

For the purpose of levying duty or for any other purpose relating to customs, the Customs Act as now worded provides that the importation of any goods by sea is deemed to have been completed at the time such goods are brought within three miles of the coast of Canada. In the same way a number of sections of the Customs Act define or limit Canadian waters to three miles for virtually all customs jurisdictional purposes.

If Parliament passes the bill before us, then in all cases the three-mile limit or restriction will be extended to 12 miles. This would alleviate a number of the problems now faced by both Canadian industry and government. For example, Revenue Canada is at present prevented from providing duty and tax protection to Canadian industry in Arctic offshore mineral resource activities within our territorial sea except for three miles. A substantial percentage of Arctic mineral resource activities at present are within the 12-mile limit but beyond the three-mile limit.

Benefits would accrue to local residents in our Arctic in that the use of Canadian equipment and supplies, and the incentive to use more Canadian registered vessels, within the 12-mile limit would result in employment for a number of the native population. At present, the explorations in the Arctic between the three and 12-mile limits are carried out by foreign personnel using non-dutiable foreign equipment and supplies and foreign vessels.

With the recent increase in offshore oil and mineral exploration, it is important that our policies stem from a consistent legislative base, which necessitates removal of any statutory anomalies. By the use of the phrase "Canadian waters," which is defined as including all waters in the territorial sea of Canada, in describing Canadian customs jurisdictional limits, as opposed to specifying the limits in miles, the proposed amendments would bring the Customs Act permanently into alignment with the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act. This means that any future changes in the limits of the territorial sea of Canada would not necessitate further consequential amendments to the Customs Act.

Where for any reason it is considered to be against Canada's interests to extend customs control to 12 miles, or whatever distance the territorial sea may be defined as in the future, provision exists in section 2(1) of the Customs Act, whereby:

—the Governor in Council may from time to time by proclamation temporarily restrict, for customs purposes, the extent of Canadian waters, and such proclamation shall not be construed as foregoing any Canadian rights in respect of waters thus restricted.

In summary, this bill is designed to strengthen Canada's control of its own waters and to extend the opportunities for employment of Canadians.

It will be noted in clause 7 of the bill that the act when passed shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation. At the present time equipment and goods used in seismic surveys or mineral explorations between the three-mile limit and the twelve-mile limit at the time of passage of the amendment could pose a problem in so far as their customs status is concerned, in that such goods and equipment would become subject to customs assessment. This could be resolved by proclamation of the bill at a future date to permit the parties concerned to either complete the operation now under way, pay the duty owing at a depreciated value, or permit the government to grant an exemption from duty under the provisions of section 17 of the Financial Administration Act. Proclamation at a future date would also enable foreign companies to continue with existing plans in the Arctic for the coming navigation season, and give adequate notice of Canada's intention to exercise customs control within the 12-mile limit.

Honourable senators, if the bill receives second reading, I shall in due course move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

On motion of Senator Bélisle, debated adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEPHONE COMPANY—SECOND READING

Hon. A. E. Haddon Heath moved the second reading of Bill S-11, respecting British Columbia Telephone Company.

She said: Honourable senators, this is the first opportunity I have had to tell you of my shock and dismay at the appointment of Senator Lapointe as our Speaker. Madame le Président was my deskmate, on whose unfailing good humour, erudition and support I relied, not to say

[Translation]

... her translation services for a poor English-speaking woman from British Columbia.

[English]

However, in a spirit of unselfishness I gladly share with you these talents which she has already demonstrated as our Speaker. Because Madam Speaker has a difficult role in filling that of her predecessor, Senator Fergusson, we wish her well. Senator Fergusson showed such tact, warmth and humanity while carrying out her job that I think a new standard was established.

I would like also to welcome the new Government Leader in the Senate. From many years of sharing experiences with Senator Perrault, I know that he will be an outstanding Government Leader in the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Heath: I would like to add my best wishes to the Leader of the Opposition, with whom it is so often tempting to agree, and who is always a delight to hear. We shall miss Senator Martin very much, but know that his unique talents will be employed to the best of his ability on behalf of all Canadians.

The act with which we are now dealing, respecting the British Columbia Telephone Company, is to amend the special act passed in 1916 incorporating the company.

This is the second largest telephone company in Canada and, with its subsidiary, the Okanagan Telephone Company, it furnishes a complete modern telecommunications service, covering not only the province of British Columbia but also parts of Alberta. Ninety-nine per cent of the population of British Columbia are within its area of service.

The proposed amendments are largely limited in their scope to matters relating to the capital stock of the company. They deal also with the rights of shareholders and the debt financing of the company.

In explanation, the proposed amendments will permit an increase in the total authorized capital stock of the company in order to take care of its future requirements—that is, to construct plant and facilities to meet the telecommunications needs in the area it serves. The amendments will also provide the company with a range of financing alternatives and arrangements that will be consistent with the provisions of the Canada Corporations Act. Existing rights of present preference and preferred shareholders, particularly with regard to the voting rights, will be maintained unaltered.

The company's special act has already been amended on five previous occasions. The prime purpose of the amendments has been to increase the authorized capitalization from the original $10 million in 1916 to the present $250 million. By the end of October this year, 1974, the company will have issued almost $200 million of its authorized capital stock. The unissued balance of $50 million is insufficient to meet the estimated requirements through 1976. Since the last increase in authorized capitalization, in 1958, the company has financed gross plant additions of over $1.25 billion. This financing has been carried out, in part, through capital stock issues totalling $155 million.

I hope no one will ask me if I have my slide rule with me, and what percentage this is of that, but I think, having regard to the way increases are going, the needs of and demands on this type of company are apparent.

For the next decade the company estimates that, to meet the various and growing telecommunications needs of British Columbia's scattered population and diverse industrial development, a gross construction expenditure of not less than $4.5 billion will be needed. This will be for added plant and equipment, as well as for modernizing the system consistent with the changing technology of today. The proposed increase of $1 billion in authorized capital stock should be sufficient to cover the company's share capital needs for a period of 10 to 15 years without return for parliamentary approval.

A public utility is highly capital intensive, and has to respond to the needs of the people it serves. It should be assured that it has flexibility in its financing options so that it can meet the demands of the capital markets. It has to be in a position to respond to changing conditions regarding rights, conditions, privileges, restrictions, or limitations in issuing new shares. The company, because of the absence of specific authorizations in its special act of incorporation, does not have some of these financing alternatives—alternatives such as the issue of convertible preferred shares, redemption or retraction privileges at the option of shareholders, and other corporate financial arrangements and modifications that are now widely employed by competitive companies in the marketplace.

It is widely recognized that the capital requirements necessary to sustain the social and economic development of this nation over the next ten years will strain our financing capacity. There will certainly be a highly competitive market for capital. It is therefore vital, when the supply of new capital may be deficient for all demands, that an essential public service, such as the British Columbia Telephone Company, has the financing flexibility and options commonly available to other Canadian companies.

For those reasons, Bill S-11 is presented for the consideration of honourable senators. It is my hope, if this bill receives second reading, that it will be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, if I may, I should like to direct a question or two to the sponsor of this bill.

Has this bill received approval from the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs which, I believe, would be the department concerned? Also, who would appear before the committee other than the officials of the company? I am wondering whether officials of the department concerned will be appearing before the committee.

Senator Heath: I cannot answer that with any assurance. I assume, since it is a private company incorporated by an act of Parliament, that the officials of the company would be present for questioning. Whether there would be government officials present, I do not know.

Senator Greene: Can provision be made for consumer groups and minority shareholders to appear before the committee? If the committee hears only from those who control the company, it seems to me we will get a very one-sided view of the need for this. If we had someone representing the consumers and minority shareholders, we would have a much broader view. That will not happen unless we make resources available to those groups. Consumers of a telephone service are not organized as a group and, therefore, would not have the funds to appear in Ottawa before our committee.

Senator Heath: I am glad to hear the comments of Senator Greene, but I feel that those of us who are members of the committee are representing the consumers of the country and all people who would be involved in this. It is my view that the members of the committee can adequately represent consumer interests as well as the interests of the minority shareholders.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, to follow up the question raised by Senator Greene, it is up to the committee to call any witnesses it feels should be heard. After hearing the witnesses on behalf of the company, it will be up to the committee to call any further witnesses it feels should be heard. I would assume that officials of the Department of Transport would take part in our committee proceedings on this bill.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I wonder whether the sponsor of the bill can tell us what degree of advertising of this bill has taken place to date?

Senator Heath: I am unable to answer that question.

Senator Grosart: The reason I ask that question, following Senator Greene's comments, is that it is vitally important that all those who may be affected by a bill such as this be given an opportunity to present any case they may wish to present before the Senate committee. It could happen, as has been the case in the past, that a bill such as this would not go to committee in the other place. It might be dealt with in Committee of the Whole instead of being referred to a specific committee. For that reason, I think the Senate has a duty with respect to a bill such as this, affecting, as it does, so many people, to ensure that adequate notification has been given under our rules, and, if our rules do not appear to be adequate in this case, to insist that additional notice be given.

I feel the Senate should have that information. I am sure the sponsor of the bill will, in due course, be able to give it to the committee.

I agree with Senator Langlois that the committee can, of course, call its own witnesses. On the other hand, that committee has not as yet held its organizational meeting and, therefore, is without a chairman. I would ask the Leader of the Government to assume the responsibility—and this has been done in many other cases by Leaders of the Government in this place—of making sure that there is adequate representation from the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It is the general practice, when dealing with legislation affecting banks, trust companies or insurance companies, to have the departmental officials appear before the committee so that the committee can determine whether or not the department concerned approves of the bill. That is a very important question when dealing with sums of $250 million, such as is the case in the bill now before us.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, if second reading is given to this bill, and if following that it is referred to committee, the committee can then call any witnesses it feels should be heard. Officials from the Canadian Transport Commission, the regulatory agency, could be called, if desired, as could representatives from the consumer sector.

Rule 86 deals with the advertising of private bills. It reads as follows:

86.(1) Every application to Parliament for a private bill shall be advertised by notice published in the Canada Gazette. Such notice shall clearly and distinctly state the nature and objects of the application, and shall be signed by or on behalf of the applicants, with the address of the party signing the same; and when the application is for an act of incorporation the name of the proposed company shall be stated in the notice.

(2) In addition to the notice in the Canada Gazette aforesaid, a similar notice shall be given in a leading news publication with substantial circulation in the area concerned and in the official gazette of the province concerned—

There is, therefore, a very detailed procedure set out for the notification of the public of measures of this kind. Presumably this practice has been followed with respect to the bill before us, but again this can be ascertained when the bill goes to committee, and company officials could well be cross-examined on this point.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might make a comment. It seems to me that it is not only a question of a committee of the Senate calling witnesses and perhaps hearing witnesses who represent consumers, but that it is a fundamental practice of the Senate that a Senate committee will always hear any party who is interested enough to come to Ottawa and appear before it. Not only would the Senate committee probably be calling witnesses, but I am sure that what I say is correct, and this committee, following the practice of Senate committees generally, will stand as a forum available to any Canadian or any organization in the country that wishes to come before it and make representations. I think our practice assures consumers of a forum if consumers wish to be heard.

Senator Heath: The rule just read by Senator Perrault with respect to this type of advertising has already been complied with. I am sorry, but I did not realize the type of advertising that was being referred to.

Senator Grosart: I asked that question because before the Senate agrees to send a bill to a committee it is usual to have an assurance that the requirements of our rules have been complied with. It is true that anybody can come before a Senate committee if he knows about it, and that is the reason I asked the question about the advertising of this bill.

Senator Langlois: The question of the publicity of this measure has been referred to by honourable senators. The Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate No. 8, of Tuesday, October 15, 1974, says this at page 40:

The Clerk of the Senate laid on the Table the first report of the Examiner of Petitions for Private Bills, as follows:—

Tuesday, October 15, 1974.

Pursuant to Rule 87(2), the Examiner of Petitions for Private Bills has the honour to present the following as his first report:

Your Examiner has duly examined the following petition and finds that the requirements of the Rules of the Senate have been complied with in all material respects:—

Of British Columbia Telephone Company, of the City of Vancouver, in the Province of British Columbia; praying for the passing of an Act amending its Act of incorporation to increase the capital stock of the company, and for other purposes.

Respectfully submitted.

PIERRE GODBOUT

Examiner of Petitions for Private Bills.

Senator Grosart: My point was that it is usual to call attention to that.

Senator Langlois: In response to Senator Grosart's comment, may I say that before this bill was introduced this afternoon for second reading arrangements had been made for an organizational meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to be held next week, probably on Wednesday. A notice of the meeting will be in the mail early in the week.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

THE LATE HON. JOHN GEORGE MacKAY

TRIBUTES TO LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I know that all members of this chamber have learned with regret of the death of the Lieutenant Governor of Prince Edward Island, the Honourable John George MacKay. Mr. MacKay had been active in the public affairs of his province and his community for many years. He was first elected to the Legislative Assembly by acclamation in 1949. He was re-elected four times. He entered the Prince Edward Island cabinet in 1952 as Minister without Portfolio, and he was Minister of Public Works and Highways from 1955 to 1959. Over the years he rendered a distinguished service to the life of his province and of his community.

I am sure that all honourable senators wish to convey to Mrs. MacKay and members of her family our deepest sympathy in their bereavement.

ATLANTIC PROVINCES

STORM DAMAGE IN NOVA SCOTIA

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I beg leave to make a statement in respect of the emergency situation in Nova Scotia, resulting from the storm damage which occurred on Sunday last.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Graham: The storm I refer to was a so-called freak blizzard with winds of hurricane force. Winds reaching as high as 100 miles an hour, and on one occasion as high as 115 miles an hour, caused widespread damage throughout the province.

The storm, if you can call it that in the most modest of terms, was the worst in living memory. Up to 15 inches of snow were reported in some parts of Nova Scotia. The storm resulted in the death of at least one man, and two men are missing. I think it is miraculous that there was not more loss of life.

The city of Sydney, where I live, was in a state of emergency throughout Sunday and Sunday night. Many areas in the eastern part of the province are still at this time without power and light, and last night was the second in a row for thousands of homes to be without heat and light. Telephone communications in many areas of the province were also disrupted.

On Sunday I watched as gigantic trees on old residential streets were toppled by the force of the gale, ripping up streets and sidewalks. Yesterday, I personally inspected many of the hardest-hit areas. Numerous owners of homes, many of them prefabricated homes, watched helplessly as the roofs of their residences were blown off and carried away. Mobile homes in many sections of Cape Breton Island were turned over and wrecked. Plate glass windows of store fronts also succumbed to the impact of the storm. Numerous businesses were hurt by power shortages. Many farmers in the province are concerned over the lack of electricity to milk their cows. Heavy damage was caused to the apple crop in the Annapolis Valley, and the harvest consequently delayed. Poultry losses are reported to be very large.

● (1410)

In the city of Sydney alone, estimates of damage to this point, exclusive of hydro and telephone company installations, range between $3 million and $4 million. In the face of the destruction—and this will give you some idea of just how heavy the overall damage in the province will be when the final tally is made—and what were at times, I assure you, terrifying conditions, I must pay tribute to the heads of municipal governments, emergency measures coordinators, police, firemen, the militia, municipal employees, hydro and telephone workers, and countless others, many of whom have been working with little or no rest since very early on Sunday. The total damage is still being assessed.

Officials of the provincial government in Nova Scotia have been approached already by some municipalities for assistance. I understand also that authorities in the province have kept officials here in Ottawa abreast of the situation.

Honourable senators, while provincial governments have prime responsibility for assistance in matters of this kind, the Government of Canada will undoubtedly be asked to assist under an existing disaster cost-sharing formula. I would hope that the Leader of the Government will impress upon his colleagues in cabinet the necessity of a sympathetic and prompt response to any such representations.

Senator Perrault: I want to thank the Honourable Senator Graham for his complete report about the very unfortunate natural disaster which has been visited upon the province of Nova Scotia and other areas of the Maritimes. I want to assure Senator Graham and all honourable senators that the government is actively concerned with the situation and determined to play a constructive role in the rehabilitation of the area. As Senator Graham has pointed out, a procedure exists whereby application is made by the provincial government for assistance to the Government of Canada, and I want to assure honourable senators that a sympathetic response can be expected if and when such a request is made.

I know that I speak on behalf of all members of the Senate when I convey to the people of Nova Scotia our deep concern about this event, and wish them a speedy recovery from the damage caused.

Senator Macdonald: As one also coming from the Island of Cape Breton, may I thank the Leader of the Government for his assurance that speedy and sympathetic consideration will be given to Nova Scotia to offset in some manner the damage done by this storm. As has been pointed out, we are fortunate that there is not more loss of life. However, the property damage is extensive.

What I have noticed before in perhaps more local disasters is that the provincial government must make the first move, so it seems to me that we should urge the Province of Nova Scotia to act quickly; otherwise, a long time can elapse before the people who have suffered property damage can get any kind of compensation. While thanking the Leader of the Government for his assurance, at the same time I would ask him to urge upon the provincial government that they also act promptly in this matter.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Senator Carter, for Senator Sparrow, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, to which was referred the estimates and supplementary estimates (A), laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1975, presented the following report:

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, to which the Estimates and Supplementary Estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1975 were referred, has in obedience to the orders of reference of Tuesday, October 15, 1974, examined the said Estimates and Supplementary Estimates (A) and reports as follows:

1. Your Committee was authorized by the Senate as recorded in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of the 15th of October, 1974, to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1975, tabled in the Senate Tuesday, October 8, 1974, and to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the Supplementary Estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1975, tabled in the Senate Tuesday, October 8, 1974.

2. In obedience to the foregoing, your Committee examined the Estimates and Supplementary Estimates (A) and heard evidence from the Honourable J. Chretien, President of the Treasury Board, and Mr. B. A. MacDonald, Assistant Secretary, Program Branch.

3. The Main Estimates for 1974/75 amount to $23,296 million. Of this amount $11,544 million are statutory in nature, $10,478 million represent funds for which Parliament is asked to provide new authority and $1,274 million are non-budgetary items representing loans, investments and advances. In the 1973/74 fiscal year, the Main Estimates amounted to $19,186 million and by two Supplementary Estimates they were increased to $20,989 million, of which $9,849 million were statutory in nature, $10,231 million represented funds for which Parliament was asked to provide new authority and $909 million in non-budgetary items.

4. The difference between the Main Estimates of 1974/75 ($23,296 million) and the final authorization for 1973/74 ($20,989 million) is $2,307 million of which $1,942 million were budgetary items. Some of the major increases are as follows:

Canadian International

Development Agency	$ 50 million
National Health and Welfare	1,286 million
Post Office	109 million
National Defence	145 million
Canadian Broadcasting Corporation	60 million
Environment	51 million
Agriculture	55 million

The Committee questioned the witnesses on these and other increases.

5. The Committee was particularly gratified that the President of the Treasury Board said that he hopes the Federal Government's expenditures for 1975/76 would account for a no greater share, or even less of a share, of the gross national product than was accounted for in 1974/75, observing that your Committee has recommended in the past that the annual increase in Federal Government expenditures should not exceed the annual increase in the gross national product. Your Committee reaffirms this recommendation.

6. Mr. MacDonald informed your Committee that the items in the Supplementary Estimates (A), the total of which amounts to $889 million for budgetary items and $15 million for non-budgetary items, relate to special warrants issued during the period of dissolution of Parliament except for the following items:

Vote 52a Department of Energy, Mines and Resources—Energy Supplies Allocation Board—$330 million

Vote 41a Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce—Grains and Oilseeds—$79 million

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Carter: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), I move that the report be taken into consideration now.

Senator Flynn: No, no, I disagree with that. I can understand why it should be moved, but I would point out that while most of the members of the committee know what is in the report, there are other members of the Senate who are interested in this report and who know nothing about what is in it. Therefore I think it should be moved that it be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

Senator Perrault: We have no objection.

Senator Carter: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: Because, even if they have time to read it, I still do not think it is fair to ask members of the Senate who are not members of that committee to take it into consideration immediately. We need a bit of time to study it.

Senator Carter: In that case I move that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

LANGEVIN BLOCK AND JUSTICE BUILDING—QUESTIONS ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on October 10 last questions were asked by Senator Forsey respecting federal government buildings. The questions were as follows:

1. What is being done to the Langevin Block; why, and what is the estimated cost?
2. What is being done to the Justice Building; why, and what is the estimated cost?

The Government's answers are as follows:

1. Langevin Block:

(a) A complete renovation and refurbishing program, including renewal of engineering services, plus air conditioning, a general upgrading and renewal of essential items such as roof replacement, windows, repainting and replacement of elevators.

(b) To provide accommodation for the Privy Council during and after the proposed renovations to the East Block.

(c) Estimated cost $3,742,000.

2. Justice Building:

(a) Total renovation including the entire gutting of the existing building, replacement of existing windows and mechanical and electrical systems. The provision of air-conditioning is also included and the installation of carpeting throughout.

(b) To provide a modernized standard, continued accommodation for the Department of Justice.

(c) Estimated cost $4,612,000.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

PALESTINE LIBERATION ORGANIZATION AT UNITED NATIONS—POSITION TAKEN BY CANADIAN DELEGATION—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, on October 16 Senator Molson asked me this question:

I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether in the United Nations the Canadian Delegation, in speaking against the seating of the Palestinian Liberation Organization and then abstaining from voting, were acting on the orders of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, or whether this was as a result of their assessment of the situation as they saw it?

The following is the text of the Canadian explanation that was delivered after the vote by Ambassador Rae:

The Canadian Delegation cannot support the draft resolution contained in Document A/L.736.

One difficulty concerns the envisaged procedure for participation in plenary meetings of the General Assembly. In our view, there is sound justification for the existing, well-established practice whereby participation in the deliberations of this Assembly—as distinct from the opportunity to address the Committees—has been reserved to the delegations representing the governments of states which are members of the UN. This seems to us an important condition for the efficient pursuit of the Assembly's work, and an acknowledgement of the fact that the UN is essentially an organization of sovereign states. We believe that the views of the Palestinians, which we agree should be presented in appropriate fashion during any discussions affecting their interests, could be fully taken into account without departing from established procedures. Canada has serious reservations about the possible impact of this draft resolution on the progress which has already been made, and on the delicate contacts which are now underway, in efforts to move toward a comprehensive Middle East peace settlement. Obviously the question of the future status of the Palestinians must be a major element in any such settlement. We would not wish at this stage to prejudge whether the Palestine Liberation Organization is the only legitimate representative of the Palestinians. This is a question to be resolved by the parties concerned. In our view, it is preferable not to pronounce here upon a resolution which might in any way either prejudice early movement toward negotiations, or impinge upon possible solutions to the Middle East conflict based on Security Council Resolution 242.

● (1420)

For these reasons, and out of respect for sound General Assembly practices, Canada will abstain on this draft resolution.

As I have said, that is the text of the Canadian explanation delivered after the vote by Ambassador Rae at the United Nations. The Text of Resolution A/L.736 is as follows:

The UNGA, considering that the Palestine people is the principal party to the question of Palestine, invites the Palestine Liberation Organization, the representative of the Palestinian people, to participate in the deliberations of the UNGA on the question of Palestine in plenary meetings.

This action by the Canadian representatives at the United Nations is in accordance with past practice on issues of this kind which have arisen at the United Nations General Assembly.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the Orders of the Day:

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is proposed that items 1 to 8 on the Orders of the Day stand until later this day.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, October 16, consideration of His Excellency the Administrator's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Senator Neiman, seconded by Senator Cottreau, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, before making a few remarks on the Speech from the Throne I should like to comment briefly on some of the changes which have taken place here. After all, in every new Parliament there are changes and it is only fair that I should have the opportunity of commenting on them.

I suspect at this late stage of the debate on the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne that our new Speaker and our new Leader of the Government might feel that any congratulations offered are but a formality or a pleasant Senate custom. Should they feel this way, I should like to assure them that such congratulations are very sincere, and I wish to add my own to those already given. I am sure that our Speaker, in presiding over our deliberations, will bring distinction upon herself and reflect credit on us all. The Leader of the Government has already shown that he possesses to a large degree those qualities of leadership so necessary in the Senate. He is fortunate in that he has the added advantage of having Senator Langlois as his deputy—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macdonald: —a senator of ability, knowledge and experience to assist him.

Honourable senators, I wish also to extend congratulations to our former Speaker, Senator Fergusson, and to the former Leader of the Government, Senator Martin, for the manner in which they discharged their duties and responsibilities while holding those positions. They certainly upheld in every way the high standards set by their predecessors. I should like to assure Senator Martin, in this public way, that his unfailing courtesy and consideration was always greatly appreciated.

As one coming from the Atlantic provinces, I must tell you that we were very proud when Senator Fergusson was selected as the first lady Speaker of the Senate, and we are proud of the manner in which she fulfilled the duties of that high office. We in the Maritimes may be said to be parochial or provincial, or small town, as it were, but regardless of our political beliefs we in the Atlantic region are very happy when one of our own attains distinction in any high walk of life—and many have done so. May I recommend to honourable senators who perhaps have not seen it an article in the Ottawa Journal of Saturday, May 4, 1974, headed "Muriel McQueen Fergusson, a Lifetime of Service to Her Country." It is well worth reading, and I agreed with every word contained in it.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macdonald: There is one more change which I should mention—indeed, perhaps it is the most important of all—that being the appointment of Senator Petten as Government Whip. Since Senator Petten comes from the Province of Newfoundland, and the Chief Opposition Whip from the Island of Cape Breton, I expect that the Senate will function more harmoniously this term than ever before in its history. In all fairness, I must say it was always a pleasure to work with his predecessors, whose courtesies and considerations were deeply appreciated. They were always real gentlemen in their dealings with the Opposition.

Honourable senators, in commenting on the Speech from the Throne I will keep in mind two things: first, that it is not meant to be a blueprint for action but rather a pious statement of general plans and intentions; secondly, that the government meets this Parliament with a new mandate from the electorate, and that covers a good many governmental shortcomings. I trust I am right in viewing it in this fashion. Otherwise, the Speech from the Throne would be a very dismal document. Of course, in any Speech from the Throne we can always find something which merits approval. In the last Speech from the Throne I was particularly pleased with that portion of it which dealt with the anniversary of Newfoundland's entry into Confederation. To quote that paragraph:

This year marks an event of particular interest and importance to all Canadians—the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the entry of Newfoundland into Confederation.

Honourable senators, it certainly was an event of particular interest and importance to all Canadians, as it completed the process of Confederation begun in 1867. It was an event of great and lasting benefit, both culturally and economically, to all concerned. Perhaps I may be forgiven if I add that it was of particular economic benefit to the town where I live. As was pointed out in another debate, one of the terms of that union was that Canada would maintain a freight and passenger service between North Sydney, Cape Breton, and Port aux Basques, Newfoundland. The growth of that service has become the economic mainstay of that town of 8,500 people. The volume of passenger and freight traffic between those two points is tremendous. To give you an example, during July and August of this year, 155,281 passengers used that service. During those peak periods, seven ships were operating. As Senator Bonnell mentioned, a new and larger ship is to come into service later this year. This new ship is an impressive one; it is 400 feet long and is reinforced for use in ice; it will accommodate 1,200 passengers and 300 automobiles, besides carrying freight.

● (1430)

Yes, honourable senators, it was certainly fortunate for my home town that Newfoundland came into Confederation, but it was still more fortunate for Canada as a whole that on July 1, 1949, just over half a million of the finest people in the world became Canadians.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Macdonald: At various times we have had discussions about the duty of the Canadian government to maintain the ferry service without interruption between Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. Senator Bonnell stressed the importance of the ferry service to P.E.I. These discussions were held as a result of the service being stopped last year due to strike action. While I have every sympathy for those who were put to some inconvenience, and often hardship, on account of such strike action, I think we have to be realistic about it. While Term 32 of the Terms of Union states that Canada will maintain in accordance with the traffic offering a freight and passenger steamship service, et cetera, I think we must read into it the qualifications sometimes found in ship charter parties to the effect that the Government of Canada would not be responsible for loss of service due to acts of God, the Queen's enemies, strikes, lockouts, civil insurrections and the like. In other words, I think we must recognize that under our system those responsible for the operation of these ferries are just as much entitled to take strike action as any other workers. They are now in the same position as workers in other essential industries, such as transportation and communications. Unless some new and acceptable method or formula is devised to avoid strikes in essential industries, we must accept it that strike action is just a part of their bargaining rights for higher wages and the like.

The whole question of transportation is mentioned at some length in the Throne Speech, and a number of new initiatives are to be undertaken. Of course, it is well recognized that a modern, efficient and integrated transportation system is vital for Canada. I do not propose to speak of the system as a whole at this time, but I will say this. All the facts mentioned by Senator Cameron in his impressive speech relating to transportation in western Canada apply with equal force to eastern Canada.

One of the new initiatives is that there is to be an immediate implementation of experimental programs designed to upgrade inter-city passenger routes. I believe such an experiment is underway now between Montreal and Ottawa, and this is probably to come into regular service when the timetable changes next Saturday evening. I have not seen how much time is to be cut off this route, which now takes between two hours and two hours and fifteen minutes for 115 miles, but I hope the time cut off will be substantial.

It will be remembered that during the election campaign it was stated that a new crown corporation would be established to operate railway passenger services. Since then the Minister of Transport has receded somewhat from this position. He has stated that the government, while not abandoning this idea, now intends to give the railways a chance to show they can provide an improved passenger service better than a crown corporation could. Apparently some conversations have been going on between the parties. A Canadian Press story from Montreal, dated Monday, September 30 said in part:

Canadian railway companies will need to find at least $500 million for the "massive upgrading" of services outlined in proposals to the federal government, says a spokesman for Canadian National Railways.

"We want to give a brand new look to all passenger train services in Canada and we don't know yet how the cost is going to be met," the spokesman said Saturday.

Plans to change the face of rail travel, involving both CNR and CP Rail, have emerged following Transport Minister Jean Marchand's election challenge to the companies to improve services or have passenger train operations managed by government.

Details of proposals by the railway companies are still secret and discussions with the Ministry of Transport are continuing. The CNR spokesman said possibilities include the elimination of overnight stops on key inter-city runs and the country-wide use of Rapido, Turbo and the LRC trains.

Which means, I understand, light, rapid and comfortable trains.

If current proposals are accepted rapid inter-city hops with overnight stays in railway hotels near stations would replace the long transcontinental haul between Montreal and Vancouver with its 70 scheduled stops.

Honourable senators, it is gratifying to know that improved rail passenger service is at least being studied.

Particular mention is made of an improvement to the service in western Canada, so I would just like to remind the railway companies and the minister that rail passenger service in eastern Canada is deplorable. I have on other occasions mentioned that there are two Canadian National Railway passenger trains leaving daily from Nova Scotia to Montreal. The distance by rail from Sydney, Nova Scotia, to Montreal, is 1,006 miles. A person can leave Sydney at 6:30 in the morning and arrive in Montreal just 26 hours and 20 minutes later. Of course, that person has a choice. He or she can leave Sydney at 11:15 in the morning, a more convenient hour, and arrive in Montreal just 28 hours and 15 minutes later—provided the train is on time. These are not speeds that encourage passenger traffic.

The news item I have just mentioned proposes an improvement in key inter-city lines. I do not know just what they mean by "key inter-city", but I do hope that the line between Sydney and Halifax comes in this category. If ever a rail service needed improvement, it is this one. The rail distance is 295 miles. One train manages to make the run from Sydney in 7 hours and 20 minutes. If one takes the other train, leaving Sydney at 11:15 in the morning, it gets into Halifax by 10:35 that evening. I have a grave suspicion that the CNR would like to eliminate this train service and substitute a bus service. As I have said, I was gratified to learn that an improved passenger service is at least a possibility. It is certainly a pressing need.

Honourable senators, before saying a few words about the two urgent problems facing Canada, which are inflation and unemployment, I want to bring to your attention a matter that came to my notice a short time ago. It will be recalled that in all the financing done by the Government of Canada, many years ago there was an issue of what they called "perpetual bonds," bonds that had no set time for redemption, although I believe there was a provision that they could be redeemed after a number of years. I do not know the size of the issue, but the interest rate was, and is, three per cent. The value of these bonds on the market today is about $33 or $34 for a $100 bond. Incredible as it may seem, this $100 bond sold by Canada is now worth only one-third of its face value. To my mind, to have this happen in Canada, a country which has always been proud of its financial reputation, is nothing less than a national scandal. You may ask why this is so; why these bonds have not been redeemed at their face value. The only explanation I have ever heard is that many of them were acquired at low prices by speculators, who would profit if the bonds were redeemed. I suppose any excuse is better than none, honourable senators, but that is a strange theory regarding repayment of loans to governments, and one which, carried to its logical conclusion, would create not a few difficulties.

Deplorable as it may be that speculators would make a profit, I think our national honour requires that these bonds be redeemed. I know there is no legal obligation to do so, but surely there is a moral obligation at least to repay the money borrowed to those still living, who bought these bonds in good faith and at their face value and who still own them.

Honourable senators, many matters are mentioned in the Speech from the Throne—perhaps too many. If the government attempted to deal with all of them, then what energy they have might be dissipated and there would be none left to deal with those twin evils of inflation and unemployment.

The Speech from the Throne deals at some length with inflation, and it is well that it does because it is an indication of the government's awareness of the existence of inflation and its evil effects. I am afraid, however, that there is a tendency on the part of the government to find excuses for its inaction; to play down the problem; to blame it on world conditions; to tell our people that they should be thankful that the problem is not as bad here as it is in other countries; to tell them that others are worse off than they are. Certain statements made by some of the ministers of the Crown show this tendency. One minister is reported to have said that he would like to see a news media moratorium on the word "inflation." He went on to say that a less pessimistic view of the economy might slow the prevailing inflationary trend. He capped it off by saying that psychology plays a big role. Well, I suppose psychology can be blamed for many things, but I doubt if it is responsible for the price of milk increasing by six cents a quart when the government removes the subsidy.

But absurd statements are not confined to that minister alone. Another minister, when the price of milk increased, pontificated to the effect that people should do what he does: use powdered milk! Another stated that if people could not afford to buy milk at the increased price they should go on welfare.

Honourable senators, it scares me when I hear statements like that being made by men who are surely not stupid, men who have much to their credit. I do think it shows a terrible lack of understanding on their part of what the ordinary people are up against. I hope I am not being too critical or too harsh when I say that when I see statements like that being made by ministers, people in responsible positions, I feel like telling them to grow up, because it both annoys and saddens me to see grown men making childish statements and treating lightly a most difficult situation.

Honourable senators, the Speech from the Throne also mentions the "battle against inflation"—if it can be dignified by such a term. The speech mentions that the government will exercise restraint in its own expenditures, and will urge provincial and municipal governments to do the same. The speech does not state, however, just what is meant by "restraint." It does not say whether it means spending less money, or the same amount but for different purposes. I suspect it is the latter, as, certainly, money could be spent to a better purpose than, for example, some of the local initiative programs, which benefit only a few people for a short period. Indeed, one wonders whether the government has any definite proposals regarding restraint in its spending. We are told we have to wait for the budget, and I suppose that is not unreasonable; at any rate, it will give the government more time to try to make up its collective mind.

I was somewhat surprised to hear the government leader here talk in terms of the reduction of government expenditures, since that is not definitely stated in the Throne Speech—and it could well be that restraint could be exercised without any reduction in present expenditures. I was also surprised to hear the government leader declare in no uncertain way that the government must be told in clear terms by the official Opposition where the reductions in expenditures are to be made.

Well, honourable senators, this is stating a new and novel responsibility for the Opposition. I suspect that it means the government wants to reduce expenditures but has no plans on how to do so. While not admitting for one moment that is a responsibility of the Opposition, I suppose it would be only an act of common courtesy to respond to this plaintive appeal for help—provided, of course, that there is a definite commitment by the government to accept and put into effect any suggestions brought forward by the Opposition. Without such a commitment I am afraid we must tell the government leader not to confuse the responsibilities of the Opposition with those of the government.

Honourable senators, I was greatly surprised that the Speech from the Throne contained nothing to indicate that the government has any real concern over the persistently high rate of unemployment. Apparently it has resigned itself to accepting as a permanent feature of our economic life an average rate of unemployment somewhere between 5 and 6 per cent. It is this spirit of resignation, this spirit of submission to economic forces, which I so deplore.

I deplore also the fact that no mention is made in the Throne Speech of the war on poverty. Certainly, that war has not yet been won. Indeed, I wonder just what the situation is now. You will recall that it was in November of 1971 that the Special Senate Committee on Poverty tabled its monumental report, the only authoritative study and report on poverty in Canada that I know of. I am not going to discuss that report at this time, but I should like to make reference to it. One section of the report dealt with the "working poor." In part it said this:

Among the poor, the working poor have the unhappy distinction of being less readily recognizable than others in their income group. Sharing most of the "middle-class" aspirations of the rest of the nation, they are, in effect, the most invisible of all.

Further on, the report said this:

Thus, more than 60 per cent of low-income family heads worked during 1967; the majority of them worked all year, and yet were still poor. What keeps them at work? All evidence demonstrates that they are poor not because they do not want to work but in spite of working. The Work Ethic seems to have played them false. Here is a good place to ask ourselves the question, "can we afford to maintain a system where going on welfare is more profitable than going to work?"

Honourable senators, in my opinion now is also a good time to ask ourselves that question. The 1967 figures quoted were the latest available when the report was prepared, but can anyone suppose that the situation for the working poor, those who must work for low wages, is any better today than it was then? The working poor are the people who suffer most from inflation—and suffer they must. They do not belong to strong unions who can give them at least partial protection. They are not in the public eye. As the report says, they are the most invisible of all. Yet ministers of the Crown insult these people by telling them, in effect, to go on welfare or buy cheaper food. Personally I think it must be of but cold comfort to them to know that the Speech from the Throne proposed that we confirm O Canada! as our national anthem, and that we make an attempt to effect constitutional reform.

Yes, honourable senators, I think now is a good time to ask again: Can we afford to maintain a system where going on welfare is more profitable than going to work? It may well be that that would be beyond the remedies suggested in the report. I think we are going to have to decide whether our economic system is to be our servant or our master. It seems to me that the government takes the attitude that we are the victims of economic forces beyond our control, and that all that can be done is to try to diminish the evil effects of inflation on at least some groups in our society.

I do not believe this is good enough. Surely in this day and age we should be the masters of our own destiny, and if to be so would require a fundamental change in our economic system, then I say let us get at it. There is nothing sacred in the present free enterprise and government assisted free enterprise system under which we now operate.

Not too long ago I had occasion to look over the Ten Commandments, and I found that there is nothing sacred about our present economic system. There is nothing in those Ten Commandments which God gave to Moses, to say that we must carry it on.

And here I might digress for a moment. There is one commandment which I think should be remembered—the commandment: Thou shalt not kill. I think that could be usefully remembered by those who claim that a pregnant woman and her abortionist can decide to kill an unborn child.

Honourable senators, the Speech from the Throne as a whole must be a bitter disappointment to all those looking to the government for leadership in the fight against these evils of inflation and unemployment. Perhaps there will be something better in the budget. One can only be optimistic. We shall just have to wait and see.

Senator Robichaud: Honourable senators, may I ask the honourable senator one simple question?

I noticed in his remarks that he referred to LIP grants in an oblique way, and I got the impression that he was violently opposed to all forms of LIP grants. I should like to ask Senator Macdonald if my assumption is correct, or wrong?

Senator Macdonald: Your assumption is wholly wrong, senator. I am completely in favour of many of those grants. It is just that there are some of them that are useless, and should not be made. The money could be better spent elsewhere.

Hon. Guy Williams: Honourable senators, I take this opportunity to extend congratulations to our new Speaker, the Honourable Renaude Lapointe, who is truly the sweetheart of the chamber. I miss her very much, as she used to sit close to me.

I also extend my congratulations to the new Leader of the Government, Senator Perrault.

To our former Speaker, Senator Fergusson, I express my appreciation of her contribution and excellent work. Similarly, I congratulate our former leader, Senator Paul Martin, on his new appointment, and also the new Deputy Leader of the Opposition, Senator Grosart.

Congratulations are also in order for our two new colleagues. I welcome to the chamber Senator Barrow and Senator Cotteau.

Honourable senators, the Speech from the Throne refers to farmers and fishermen. I want to bring to your attention a serious problem that has developed in the Indian fishermen's assistance program. It is in its second five-year term. Up to this date it has been a very good plan. Unfortunately inflation is one of the reasons why there is now a serious situation which may cut the program short, and make it inactive until 1976/1977. If this is the case, then this will be a great tragedy that will swamp and submerge the program for all time to come. In 1976/1977 there will be next to nil licensed fishing boats on the coast of British Columbia available to the Indian fishermen. The white fishermen will have acquired all the available licensed boats.

For your information, honourable senators, the boats are licensed, but the fishermen only have an operator's licence. Inflation is skyrocketing the price of a fishing boat according to its tonnage rating. Today licensed fishing boats, on tonnage alone, cost from $4,500 to $6,000 per ton, and some of them are upwards of 100 tons.

In order that an answer be found for the Indian fishermen, this amount of $1.5 million must be made available. The program has only three more years to go on its second five-year schedule, and I suggest that the last three years of the program be compressed into two years. I assure you that the Indian fishermen will say that all is well if this is done. This is the answer. I have consulted with the Native Brotherhood of British Columbia, the bargaining voice of Indian fishermen, and they are in agreement with this idea.

[Senator Macdonald.]

This program is the lifeline of the Indian fishermen. In a way it is very similar to the subsidies that non-Indian fishermen have been receiving for years. This must be taken care of now, not tomorrow. It is a serious situation for the Indian fishermen of British Columbia. About 15,000 Indians depend on these fisheries—that is, fishermen and their families.

● (1500)

Now, honourable senators, I shall refer to problems and situations that have affected the Indian in the past, and are still affecting him today—and I shall refer to them as tragedies.

The first tragedy is that of the buffalo kill. Canada's millions of buffalo roamed the plains and the fringes of the forest areas. I am told that young braves made it a game to display their ability and bravery by jumping from one buffalo's back to another. The buffalo was useful. The hide served as clothing, and the muscles and sinews served for sewing and for bow strings. The hide also provided the covering of the teepee which the Indian lived in. But the buffalo kill caused the first real housing shortage so far as the Indian people of this great country were concerned. The buffalo also provided meat which was prepared in many ways and preserved for winter. But what has happened to the millions of buffalo, honourable senators? I think you all know what happened.

Tragedy number two for the Indian: God in his wisdom placed in the northwestern hemisphere his largest and most beautiful jewel, the Great Lakes. They abounded with fish and fowl. The Indians of that time when travelling or hunting would go to their shores, fall on their hands and knees, and drink their fill of that beautiful pure water. Can you and I do that today, honourable senators? We cannot. The water there is now polluted, just as it is polluted all over Canada. The pollution has extended to the inland waters of the country from the sea. What happened to the buffalo has also happened to the beautiful jewel. The fish and the fowl are no longer there. All have fallen victim to man's pollution and destruction.

Tragedy number three: the treaties—some unhonoured, and many of them, I believe, phonies; not worth the paper they were written on. The Indian chiefs signed in good faith, or, at least, they placed their marks. They signed with an X—and perhaps that is appropriate because X designates the unknown.

Tragedy number four: the Indians of Canada are slowly but surely becoming aware of federal and provincial laws. They cannot hunt or fish as they used to, even though it may mean that their families go hungry. They are told, "You cannot cut that tree down to make your dug-out canoe; you cannot peel that birch tree to build your canoe, because it is on crown property, provincial land or privately owned land. If you do you will be prosecuted and possibly sent to jail." The end result for the Indian is nearly always the same—he has to live in poverty, and find a short cut to the happy hunting grounds.

Tragedy number five is clearly visible to the public, and results from firewater being first introduced by the fur traders. You know what happened then and what is happening today—over-indulgence. Today the situation is becoming even worse because the use of alcohol is coupled with the use of drugs. They constitute the sad and heavy price of participation in your society and civilization. In consequence we find the Indian untrained, uneducated, unskilled and unaccepted.

And now, honourable senators, I shall speak briefly about the sad incidents of September 30 concerning the demonstration by the Native People's Caravan on Parliament Hill, which many of you witnessed. When, some time in the future, the history of this is written, it will form a black page in the history of Canada, not because it was a demonstration against the Government of Canada—a common democratic practice in western society—but because at the gates to Parliament Hill the caravan was joined by about 40 non-Indians. This is the information presently available. Many Indians belonging to the caravan were happy to have voluntary support from the white man's society to help them in their cause. They did not realize that these people were communists and Maoists whose sole purpose was to egg the Indians on, and to turn a peaceful demonstration into a violent demonstration. According to the press, a busload of these people came from Montreal, well supplied with rocks, sticks and clubs. I saw for myself that the first three people to be taken into custody were not Indians.

But despite all these problems and burdens, honourable senators, the Indian is surviving, but he is surviving in want and in need.

I shall leave these matters for you to ponder over in the knowledge that they do not constitute even a drop in the bucket, or a pinprick on the Indian's body, in proportion to the number of problems imposed upon the Indian by this society. I have simply pointed out a few of the shortcomings of the white man's society, and of the Government of Canada. It is these shortcomings that have led the Indian into a state of frustration, hopelessness and poverty because there is an attitude of indifference and non-acceptance where the Indian is concerned.

Can the Indian get himself out of this rotten state, or condition? All that I have said up to now results from my own observation and my personal experience, participation and leadership, in Indian organizations for over 40 years in British Columbia. You may ask, as I have asked many times in my lifetime, "What are the alternatives?"

Honourable senators, this question can be answered very simply. Where do we start? I have suggested in other places and at Indian gatherings that Canada could get the young Indians involved in hockey and football in the lesser leagues and allow it to be left in the hands of a retired Indian former professional player. It could take the form, maybe, of a five-year plan. There is sufficient talent among the Indians in Canada and there should be no government interference. The government should simply make the funds available. In a short number of years there will be Indian players on every major team in the NHA and WHA, likewise in football. This will be the icebreaker into your society.

Honourable senators, regarding the matter of social culture, or multiculturalism, we must open our eyes to the potentials and recognize Indian culture and art. Gel and meld the two cultures, and Canada will be richer. Why has this not been done in the past and why is it not being done today? I will tell you: because of certain senior civil servants, who may be more interested in their own future pensions and do not wish to upset their status quo. I have heard at least once in this chamber the challenge, "Fire them!" and I think it should be carried out. Indians would love to see this, and from here on in they should plan their own destiny and participate in this great society.

The Indian people have survived. The day of decision for them and for the Government of Canada is here today, not tomorrow. I am very much concerned that delay could mean bigger and more serious demonstrations and violence. Let me say at this point that the caravan did not intend to be violent. That is why there were mothers and children in the demonstration. According to my information, received before September 30, it was to be noisy, but peaceful.

I have touched only on a small point or two and, may I say, my points are sound. I have experienced and lived that life. Honourable senators, may I suggest that we keep these points in mind at this time.

Now, please fasten your seatbelts. The Indians, I repeat, are surviving and in the next two decades will have a full say in the economy of Canada. The native Indian in Canada is money-poor, lo and behold the poor Indian, but he is land-rich. He is of no account in this society, but do not question his loyalty to Canada. He is loyal. Just look back and see his record in the two World Wars.

Money-poor? What is there on Indian reserves? The average Canadian can only visualize the houses that are in shambles, which is true in many cases. There is absolutely no reason, none whatever, why the Indian should be impoverished in this great country, his country, the greatest country in the world. Moses led the Israelites for 40 years. They viewed the land of milk and honey and for some time were denied entry. Canada is richer by far than that, truly a land of plenty and a land of opportunity. That is why we have over 200,000 immigrants per year. Your society, your government is responsible for the impoverished state of the Indian people in Canada. I repeat, Indians in two decades will be involved deeply in the economy of Canada. Why? I will tell you why: his resources are far beyond the realization and belief of the non-Indian. I have reason to believe that I will see the day when Indians in Canada will participate in the development of the resources of our great Canada. How? The estimated value of his resources on reserves, including lands, is upwards of $17 billion. I am not even speaking of his claims. Is that not a lot of money? In my opinion it is. These figures are not mine, but come from a responsible department of the government. And that is not all. Add another estimated amount of over $10 billion for petroleum and mineral resources, for a total of approximately $28 billion. In view of these assets I would like to see an Indian corporation, funded in the amount of $100 million, established with all Indian directors, hiring the best accountants and financial experts from any part of the world for management. With these assets and a program of this type the Indian people of Canada would no longer be dependent on welfare. With this kind of money I believe they could buy out the Bank of Canada and the CPR, lock, stock and barrel.

Indians can and may set up their own stock exchange. Honourable senators, this is not idle talk. Indians are now on the rebound, and I say, "Let's get with it!"

Honourable senators, I am thankful for my participation in this debate and for being a member of this chamber. I am a proud senator, I am a proud Indian, and I believe in Canada, our country. I have spoken.

[Translation]

Hon. Keith Laird: Honourable senators, at the outset, I wish to pay tribute to Madam Speaker. Since her appointment to the Senate, she has been very active both in this chamber and in the committees and I am sure that she will know how to bring obstinate senators to heel.

I also wish to congratulate Senators Neiman and Côté who have so ably opened this debate, and also the leaders and all those who spoke before me. I noted with interest that the speakers have dealt with the senator's duties. As far as I am concerned, I think that I should provide some constructive ideas even if they do not coincide entirely with those of the government. With this in mind, I should like to deal with fiscal expenses in relation with the very serious problem of inflation.

[English]

I suppose the number one problem is inflation. If we entertained any doubts about that, the speeches here in the Senate have convinced us, let alone the multitude of speeches that have been made all over the world. Therefore, we are all agreed. The Throne Speech said it, in effect; and the President of the United States has said it. Probably the one weakness in all of these pronouncements is that it is difficult to get down to business and say, "What shall we do about it?"

We may very well ask ourselves that question here. Let me say at the outset—and this will be the theme of my remarks—that, quite frankly, there is something that can be done by Parliament about the problem. That is the simple proposition of the curtailment of government expenditures.

I admit that this is an international problem. In fact, we are caught in a rough international sea and, consequently, we cannot solve it by ourselves. We know that all over the world there is evidence of affluence and, consequently, a rise in inflation. It is a snowball which simply gathers momentum as time goes on.

My contention this afternoon will be that if we can put one block in the way of that snowball it will at least slow it down so that other blocks can be put in its way and eventually stop the snowball.

Before getting into the theme of the curtailment of government expenditures, let us take a quick look at some of the remedies which have been proposed.

I suppose the most interesting one, and the one most frequently propounded, is mandatory wage and price controls. I must admit that it sounds very enticing; yet I remember distinctly that a little more than three years ago the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance spent an intensive three months examining this problem. I, along with several others, went into that committee thinking that perhaps we had found the ultimate solution.

[Senator Williams.]

When the hearings were completed, my opinion was quite different, and, as honourable senators will recall, the committee wholeheartedly recommended against mandatory wage and price controls. The committee's recommendation was based on the evidence which came before it, which encompassed evidence from a number of world-renowned economists, prominent business leaders, and others. It was apparent, as the evidence was produced, that mandatory wage and price controls could work only in the event of a severe emergency, such as war, and even then there would be problems.

Such controls will work for only a certain length of time. They cannot be enforced forever. What happens after they are lifted? Wage earners, or the producers of goods for a price, simply attempt in a hurry to pick up the slack which they feel they have lost through the imposition of a prices and incomes system. Mandatory wage and price controls do not work.

Other methods are being suggested all the time—such as, for example, increasing interest rates, to cut down on borrowing and therefore cut down on production. Here again, it is a method of controlling the situation, but in itself is not enough to achieve anything really worthwhile.

There is also the suggestion of increasing taxation. People say, "Increase taxation and take the money out of circulation. Then we shall not have the money available to seek out the goods and services, and therefore we shall bring down inflation." This is fine up to a point. But really all these factors are simply parts of the general scheme of things.

Let me return to my main theme, that of the curtailment of government expenditures. This is something that we can do. There is nothing to stop Parliament doing this. How can we do it?

I believe—and, if I understood Senator John Macdonald correctly, he was urging a similar approach, and certainly some honourable senators have suggested this—that we have to stop the proliferation of government services. We know what the tendency is. It is to offer more and more services regardless of need, and once a service is established it expands in order to fulfil the wishes and meet the demands in a particular field. As a result, we end up with a huge amount of government services being available.

The following is the actual breakdown: 1,406,000 Canadians—one out of every seven in the labour force—work in some kind of government job. I know this has been discussed by other honourable senators. I recall the Leader of the Government discussing this. I, too, will be making the point he made, namely, that the worst offender is not the federal government but, rather, the provincial and municipal governments. I took the following breakdown from an article which appeared in the Windsor Star, and it is as follows: provincial government employees, 433,000; federal public servants, 296,000; municipal administration workers, 248,000; teachers, 200,000; employees of Crown corporations, 148,000; members of the armed forces, 81,000—making a total of 1,406,000. As I say, one out of every seven persons in the labour force works in some type of government job! That is simply an untenable proposition. While we are the least offender of the three branches of government, nevertheless we can start right at home.

One thing that strikes me is that we can cut down on the multiplicity and complexity of legislation. If I recall correctly, other honourable senators have raised this point. I do not know how other honourable senators feel, but it seems to me that almost every idea by anyone in the Public Service eventually gets translated into legislation, and the legislation turns out to be so complex that it can only be understood by a certain group. As a result, when you are stuck for an interpretation, instead of being able to make it yourself, you must turn to these so-called experts. They were never intended to have that power. I, for one, feel that the multiplicity and complexity of legislation certainly is a substantial contributing factor to the tremendous amount of government expenditures, and I do not like it.

Then there is the indiscriminate hiring of government employees. That subject, of course, has been tackled as a problem, but it has never been entirely solved. The whole difficulty is that there has been no study made or attempt to work out a reasonable standard of production. We all know that in many instances there are so many people on a job which could be performed by many fewer people. This is an alarming problem.

If, by any means, honourable senators think that by saying these things, as I have, in French and English, I am giving aid and comfort to the Opposition, they are right. I am deeply concerned about these things and, whether or not it pleases the government to hear about them, I intend to say these things throughout this session and let the chips fall where they may.

Another thing that bothers me is the vast amount of government literature that goes out and which is never read. It is a small point, I admit. All you need do is look in the wastepaper baskets in the Senate and the House of Commons. That would be a good start. But beyond that, outside these sacred precincts, all sorts of literature goes out which is never read, being immediately consigned to the wastepaper basket. I am sure that all honourable senators have had many complaints of this sort. As I say, it is a comparatively small matter, but it is still an example of the way expenditures could be cut down.

The next item I wish to deal with is unemployment insurance. I suppose this is a blockbuster, but, following up on what Senator Macdonald has said, we have simply got to do something about it. Unemployment insurance is necessary where the need is a valid one, but if the need is not there it should not be paid. The whole trouble is that not only is it being paid in individual cases where it should not be paid, but also where there is already an adequate income being received. As Senator Macdonald has already said—and, believe me, we have all had this experience—when it comes to a choice between working for an income and collecting unemployment insurance, the temptation is very natural to go on unemployment insurance, assuming that unemployment insurance amounts to almost as much as, if not more than, would be paid if the individual worked for his income.

I should add at this point that in the past few months some substantial progress has been made under the present Minister of Manpower and Immigration, the Honourable Robert Andras, a very able individual. He has formed a partnership, in effect, between Manpower and the Unemployment Insurance Commission, the result of which has been an exchange of information which, apparently, previously had not been adequate. That exchange of information has resulted in 70,000 Canadians being disqualified from receiving unemployment insurance or welfare, and those individuals, presumably, are now working. All of this in the past few months. The full details in that respect are set out in an article by Jack Kent in the Windsor Star of September 24 last.

Believe me, in no way do I want to give the impression that the minister responsible, the Honourable Robert Andras, is not doing an excellent job. There is no question that he is. The trouble is that the problem is so deep-rooted and the state of the legislation is such that the whole matter must be examined in more depth if we are to get results.

On that point, I think what gets me down most is the fact that unemployment insurance is sometimes paid—in fact, often paid—to people who retire on adequate pensions. I do not know whether honourable senators are aware of this or not, but, believe me, it does happen. Many persons retiring on an adequate pension, by simply making themselves available for work, are entitled to unemployment insurance payments for a total of 51 weeks.

I have an actual example to relate in that regard. This information comes from the Toronto Star of September 20, and I am using the figures quoted in that article, being the present average wage of an employee in the standard automobile company contract, which is $5.85 an hour. Assuming 50 weeks' work at 40 hours per week, and adding the cost of living allowance which is embodied in these contracts, that working individual would earn $12,068 per year, exclusive of any fringe benefits. On retirement, that individual would collect $7,500 by way of pension—again, I am speaking of the standard automobile company contract—and for 51 weeks would be entitled to an additional payment of unemployment insurance at the rate of $113 a week, for a total of $5,763. Therefore, the total intake would be $13,263. The difference, of course, is $1,195, being the additional income available on retirement for a period of 51 weeks. It is true that he must list himself with Manpower as being available for work, but at the age of retirement the possibility of getting employment is, of course, extremely limited. Let us be honest about it. If you know the ropes you can, somehow or other, manage to wiggle out of any job offer that comes along through the good offices of Manpower.

I do not want to labour this point any longer. I hope that by speaking for a relatively short time it may make some impression, and that we will be more careful in the future about the items that come before this house and what we can do about cutting down and curtailing government expenditures, because if we do not start at home how can we expect the people of the country to make any real sacrifice to fight inflation? Believe me, we cannot. If we do not start at home, psychologically it simply has the effect that people will say to themselves, "Look at the government. They are not trying to curtail expenditures, so why should we?" Therefore, honourable senators, I feel that if it is possible for us all to keep the goal in mind we will make a real contribution towards licking inflation.

On motion of Senator Graham, debate adjourned.

AGING

THE ANATOMY OF A SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE REPORT— DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. David A. Croll rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the anatomy of a special Senate committee report, and in particular to

- (a) its evaluation,
- (b) its beneficial results, and
- (c) as a follow-up, to a suggested future course of action for the Senate.

He said: Honourable senators, I have already informally congratulated the Speaker, as I have the Leader of the Government. I do so formally, but not as a matter of formality. I have confidence that we are in for a new day here. I think there is appreciation of the fact that there is talent in abundance in this chamber. It will depend upon the leadership to make use of it.

I did want to say a word about the mover, Senator Neiman, and the seconder, Senator Cotreau, of the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. They proved a point. Good preparation makes a good speech. That is what they had. On the other hand it is a good beginning, and it sets the mood for the house and for others to strive after. Today there is not much of a mood around here.

My inquiry rather speaks for itself. It says that I will call the attention of the Senate to the anatomy of a special Senate committee report, its evaluation, its beneficial results and a follow-up. That is exactly what I am going to do, with emphasis on the future course of action of the Senate. The anatomy that I refer to is the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Aging. The evaluation I will bring to your attention, as well as the beneficial results and the future course of action.

I am glad to be on my feet today speaking, because what I am attempting to do is unprecedented in this house or in the House of Commons. I think it is fresh, I think it is new and I think it is interesting. As a matter of fact, I am also using the term "exciting", because no matter how well we thought we did with the Report on Aging, we did better than that. I will now tell you about it.

The Senate Report on Aging, a copy of which I have here, was authorized in 1963. We spent 1964, 1965 and 1966, about three and a half years, on it. I looked up the report today, and I find that out of the 20 members of the committee 11 are still members of the Senate. You have no idea what comfort it gives me to look behind me and see two most ardent ones, Senator Fergusson and Senator Inman. I am sorry that Senator Josie Quart is not here today. Much of the credit is due to the members of the committee, who worked very hard.

Senator Choquette: Tell us about that anatomy.

Senator Croll: I am telling you.

Senator Langlois: Of the committee.

[Senator Laird.]

Senator Croll: Those were three wonderful years. We met the people, we worked very hard and we enjoyed every minute of the time. But time and time again we were asked, "What happened to the recommendations?" In this study, for the first time we reached out to the community and touched them at a time when there was concern for the old. There was interest. Families were moving around, making up their minds about getting out into the suburbs, with no further room for the old folk in the home. There was some actual neglect of the old and the parents. There was a void that had to be filled.

In the course of our recommendations, of which there were 92, we came up with a blockbuster, for the first recommendation we made in our report was to reduce the age for Old Age Security from 70 to 65 and to provide a basic income. The government accepted it within a very short time. It may be that we caught the needs of the times. It may be that we were good, and it may be that we were just lucky. Nevertheless, it is remembered. However, we were asked time and again, "What happened to the other recommendations?" Well, each one of us knew a little about what happened. No one knew what had happened in every part of the country.

I tried to get the government to establish a committee on aging. I was not successful. I tried to get someone who would do the research. I was asked how much it would cost. I did not know; we had never done this before. But we had to start somewhere. In any event, nothing was available.

I finally went over and spoke to our chief librarian, Mr. Spicer, and to Mr. Laundy. I asked them for advice and for assistance. I wanted someone to go out in the country to visit the various capitals and cities in order to find out what had been done. Well, they did not have the money to send anyone out. So we finally settled on a senior researcher. They said they were prepared to let Miss M. A. Carroll do the research on these recommendations. She started, and then, in the late stages, she was joined by Mrs. B. Reynolds.

It was a trying, painstaking and tiresome job, but very well done. It deserves commendation. If any of you ever try to get information from any government department, federal, provincial or otherwise, information about almost anything, you will then know how difficult a task it was. Miss Carroll began her task in June 1973. It was finished a year later.

The report that was presented on the research, in other words, the recommendations contained in the Senate Report on Aging, is now six months old. I had this inquiry on the Order Paper last year, but then the election intervened and it went by the board. At the first opportunity, of course, I put it on the Order Paper again. I would now ask for the right to table as an appendix to Hansard of today the report which was prepared by the researchers. It is in both English and French.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Senator Flynn: How big is the report?

Senator Croll: It is about the same size as the one on divorce.

Senator Flynn: The report seems to be rather heavy, I don't know.

Senator Hayden: How many pages is it?

Senator Croll: A couple of hundred.

Senator Flynn: Well, if there is no objection, I do not object.

Senator Croll: It is the only way I can get it on record. It is about 200 pages of typescript. I was told that it is about the same size as the report of the divorce committee.

Senator Langlois: It is 230 pages of double spacing, Senator Flynn.

Senator Flynn: Agreed.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix.)

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, I do not intend to make a speech on the report itself, but I should like to give you the box score on the recommendations. The reason I do not intend to make a speech on the report is that the Canadian people have been asking, time and again, just what happens to these various reports. If I make a speech, they will read it in Hansard and say, "Well, that is it." I would rather they found out for themselves what is contained in the research and formulate their own judgments on what we are doing in the Senate. I would prefer that than trying to make up a judgment for them. Moreover, in the past we have been working on the theory that the Senate operates on the principle of "sober second thought." It would be a good idea for us now to operate on the principle of the "sober second look." At any rate, there is the report, and it will now be available for people to read and consider.

I would now like to make a suggestion to honourable senators. That report contains information which is important to every municipal officer, to all social agencies, labour organizations, business groups and others who are interested in good, efficient and responsive government. I suggest that the Senate should be interested in the reaction, by way of reply, of the Canadian public when they have read this report. The best way to effect this reaction, and I suggest this seriously, would be for every member of the Senate to send out 50 or 100 copies of today's Hansard—not an expensive undertaking—to those people they wish to inform in order to say, "This is the kind of work we are doing in the Senate, and you ought to know about it." In that way our countrymen will know what is going on not only, for example, in Newfoundland but also in British Columbia. They will have the whole panorama in front of them.

The report that is presented today, honourable senators, is pure, unadulterated research. I have no input in that report, although I take full responsibility for it because I present it. If it requires elaboration and explanation, you can look to me for that. I know what is in the research, and I know what was in the original report.

So far as I know, this is the first opportunity for parliamentarians—legislators at all levels: Senate, House of Commons, provincial, municipal and county—and for the Canadian people to make their appraisals. They have been asking for this for a long time. Here it is. Here is the example of the kind of things we do in the Senate, and have been doing for some time. Now we await the reaction.

Honourable senators, reaction to the Senate today is somewhat different from what it had been in the past under different circumstances. Those of you who read Hansard of the House of Commons will know that the subject of Senate reform was debated in the House of Commons last Thursday. At that time, one of the great parliamentarians of today, one of our democratically-principled men, Mr. Stanley Knowles, a great friend, who annually brings the matter of Senate reform before the House of Commons, seemed in his remarks to indicate a softening of his former position. If you read his speech you will notice that he is softer, more understanding, and much weaker in his attack than formerly. In speaking of the kind of work that the Senate does in its investigative capacity, he complained that there were not enough of us occupied in doing that sort of work and that only a few of us were doing it.

Senator Asselin: Have we convinced him yet?

Senator Laird: I guess he is just getting old.

Senator Croll: Moreover, honourable senators, three members of the Liberal Party also gave their views. J.-J. Blais of North Bay did a tremendous job—a much better job than I did here—in talking about Senate reform. I do not know where it came from, but we owe him a vote of thanks.

● (1600)

The recommendations in the report were of four kinds. There were the major recommendations, there were the minor recommendations, there were the marginal recommendations, and there were the hopeful recommendations that you always have in these reports. You hope somebody reads them and does something about them, but the world will not come to an end if nothing is done.

That brings me to evaluations. I have given you the evaluation in the report that is there. It may be a little long, but it is there to read, and it is the only way you are going to get it read.

Let me give you the box score—and I shall put it in the parlance of baseball rather than hockey, which is kind of dangerous around this place. In any event, it will be understood. It is as follows: Ninety-two recommendations—92 times at bat; 25 home runs; 54 singles, doubles or triples. Thirteen times struck out, but swinging.

Senator Langlois: How many stolen bases?

Senator Croll: The batting average was 859, and that was six months ago. The batting average today on the 92 recommendations in that report is better than 900.

Senator Flynn: The pitching must have been very bad.

Senator Langlois: But a good catcher.

Senator Croll: It is a fantastic batting average for a batter; but for the Senate it is normal to have that kind of a record.

You ask, "How do these things happen?" Well, they do not just happen. You see, you have to understand reports. Reports that are reasonable, understandable and in simple language have a multiplication factor about them. Therein lies their strength. If you have a good report you have resource and seed material. It is the old story of do not give the man a fish; teach him how to fish.

What happens with these reports? The minute we issued our report Ontario started with studies. Other provinces started with studies. The labour people began studies, and senior citizens and municipal committees. The ladies' Tuesday Club discussed the matter. It was of interest to them because they had mothers in the ladies' auxiliaries. The religious bodies and the veterans' groups discussed it. We built up a group in the country that was concerned, and they brought pressure to bear, and so we got that kind of result.

They said, "Well, you were lucky. You cannot do it again." Well, do not be too sure. Do not be too sure that we have not done it again. When I give my report in connection with poverty to my good friend the senator who requested it, you will hear a few interesting things, but I shall leave that for another day.

In Ottawa reports proliferate. We have reports by royal commissions, special committees, consulting firms and individual consultants. As a matter of fact I noticed that an old Ottawa hand, by the name of Charles Lynch, said in the Ottawa Citizen of Saturday, October 9:

—Senate committee hearings on a variety of subjects generated a good deal of publicity, and virtually put royal commissions out of business.

I think this was what we were really trying to do. Did we succeed? I am not so sure. But that is his view, in any event.

All too often these reports make one-day headlines, then disappear from the public eye. Others get small notice, even on publication day. There are noticeable exceptions—those reports concerning causes with enough organized support and publicity to keep them alive in the weeks and months after first publication. But most of these documents come only briefly into public view. They move into the shadows and join the rest of the dust-catchers in government files, or they go on to some subterranean Valhalla reserved for government reports, which I have never been able to locate. These reports represent formidable expenditures of public money and an impressive investment in time and energy, and in some of Canada's best minds, including those in the Senate. To discard them without examination and follow-up just makes no sense. There is no public evaluation of most of these reports, and that is why we, for the first time, have had public evaluation. That is why I did not give you my opinion as to what that evaluation was. Let the public decide. I gave you the box score, but let them decide. We will hear from them.

So here is a challenge for the Senate of Canada, which can give a sober second look at such reports, and sift from them the best and the worst of their recommendations. Let us not forget that these recommendations and solutions are proposed by experts on countless public problems, and I ask myself—and you should ask yourselves—why the Senate, with the personnel it has, cannot undertake to examine the results of all major reports and inquiries made on behalf of the federal government in the past year or two, and disclose publicly which of the findings were implemented, with an appraisal and analysis of their merits.

[Senator Croll.]

Sometimes a more crucial question will be: Why were sections of a report not implemented? The reason for inaction is just as relevant as the reason for action. With the Senate as a platform of publicity the appraisal of reports would attract wide attention. It would be of great benefit to the whole apparatus of accountability and evaluation. In this age of awareness of the need for more and better information about government, this extra function of the Senate would generate immediate public support.

Senator Greene: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Croll: Yes.

Senator Greene: I wonder if the honourable senator could tell me if he has considered whether or not, with regard to the objective to which he is addressing himself, the investigatory part of the Senate's work, at least, as opposed to its legislative function, could be televised?

● (1610)

Senator Croll: I shall leave that to my honourable friend. What I am talking about is the legislative part of the Senate's work. This has to take priority, and is what I would call a normal part of our work. But the work that we have undertaken during the last 10 years has changed our image in the country, has given the Canadian people a different impression of the Senate, and has done a world of good as I have indicated.

Honourable senators, the Senate is qualified for the task. Its members represent a spectrum of talent in the art of examination; they are uniquely equipped to review measures and analyze the findings of experts, while their own expertise in many fields is considerable. I believe that the outcome of such a system would improve the quality of imminent and future reports prepared by the government. The consultant who knows that his work will undergo scrutiny and re-examination will be careful to make feasible, well-researched recommendations because the publicity resulting could either damage or add lustre to his reputation. There is a thirst for information about the public process. This auditive addition would, I suggest, go a long way towards satisfying it.

As I said, we began with the sober second thought, and now we must add to that the sober second look. The Senate's new role could have a further good effect in that it would tend to improve the communicative quality of reports.

There is no clear communication without a common language, and only too often the experts present reports that are almost totally unhelpful to public understanding because their language is not easily understood. We must remember, because we all know it to be true, that language can conceal as well reveal. Words are symbols and not self-evident truths; they communicate properly only when they are understood in the same way by the reader as by the author. Having read many reports, I say that good writing is a skill that comes from a passionate regard for the importance of words and their arrangement. The experts in many fields are often members of a professional priesthood, and their reports reflect the jargon of their calling, and this, in turn, makes for difficult reading except, perhaps, for their peers.

In assuring publicity for otherwise neglected reports, the Senate can clarify and interpret the documents in the light of changing public needs, and improve public interest and understanding. People are not passive audiences for communication; they are highly selective, as they must be in an age of information overload. They can be helped to understand better the experts' advice.

What exactly could we call honourable senators who would undertake this new task? Ombudsmen of ideas? Inspectors of accountability? Auditors of ideas? Whatever the name, the work—and it would be work—could be among the most satisfying of the Senate's contributions to the public good.

Personnel experts are today much concerned with motivations and they are disturbed by those who, they say, go into on-the-job retirement. Senators who undertake this interesting new assignment need face no such problem.

Recently governments have turned more and more to consulting firms, and to individual consultants. But we have urged government to use Senate committees which have proven their value and capacity beyond question, and have proved it once more today. We have the time; it is a cheaper way of doing it; and we are always available. But, honourable senators, in addition we have one virtue that the others do not have, and that is that we follow up the work we do. Royal commissions and consultant's studies are one-shot affairs. They do their work, and then they go home. But we are here; we are constantly working, and in consequence we get results. Furthermore, not only do we give our reports after-care; we also give them a non-partisan political flavour which is always important. In addition to that, the reports we make are daily before us.

One of the reports that most impressed me in recent years is the Carter report. Yet, honourable senators, it got very little attention, and very little was done in following up its recommendations. Admittedly bits and pieces were picked up here and there, but the Carter philosophy, which could have done much for this country, never really came across because there was nobody propounding it as a Senate committee might have done.

Let me take you back to another report published five years ago. I am referring to the report of Paul Hellyer's Task Force on Housing. I read it carefully because I am interested in housing. It was one of the best reports I had read in a long time, and it was a report published by a practical man. What has happened to it? If we had taken a greater interest in it, we could have brought pressure to bear.

Now we have a report on parole. Are we going to let that die? A great deal of work and effort were put into that report. If, in a year from now, we examine what has been done in the meantime and ask questions about it, then something will come of it.

I made note of a question by Senator O'Leary respecting the report of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty, asking what had happened to it. I do not intend to take the time today to deal with that, but I promise Senator O'Leary that I will report, perhaps in speaking in the debate on the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, or under some other auspices.

Senator O'Leary: But don't put it in the Liberal platform. That would be the end of it.

Senator Croll: They obtained a majority without my putting anything into their platform, but that is another matter.

Honourable senators, I think I have made quite clear what we have been doing. I do not think we should be hiding our light under a bushel, nor do I think we should apologize for anything we do. In looking back over the work that we started doing 10 years ago, I can say that it has been beneficial to the country and it has given us some spirit. We must not forget, and this always troubles me somewhat, that 10 years ago we were completely in the doghouse in this country. When you spoke to anybody about the Senate in those days, the only response you got was a question as to when it was going to be abolished. Nowadays we don't hear that, except perhaps once a year from Lonesome Luke in the House of Commons. In that time the Senate has gained a new image throughout this country, and is looked at in a different light. Briefly, we have made a great deal of progress.

I suggest to you, honourable senators, that there is much to be said for the study of these various reports from time to time so that we may get the greatest possible benefit from them.

On motion of Senator Carter, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

MOTOR VEHICLE TIRE SAFETY BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, October 17, the adjourned debate on the motion of Senator Neiman for the second reading of Bill S-8, respecting the use of national safety marks in relation to motor vehicle tires and to provide for safety standards for certain motor vehicle tires imported into or exported from Canada or sent or conveyed from one province to another.

Hon. J. Campbell Haig: Honourable senators, Bill S-3 was passed in the Senate on April 8, 1974, having been given second reading on March 26, 1974.

Bill S-8 is the same as Bill S-3, passed during the last session, respecting the use of national safety marks in relation to motor vehicle tires and to provide for safety standards for certain motor vehicle tires imported into or exported from Canada or sent or conveyed from one province to another. This bill went to committee last March. Officials from the Ministry of Transport and representatives from the Rubber Association of Canada appeared before the committee, and the bill was reported to the house without amendment. It received third reading in this house but died on the Order Paper in the other place because of the federal election. As I have already said, this is the same bill. I spoke on it on March 26, 1974, as reported at page 166 of the Debates of the Senate, before the bill was referred to committee.

The bill establishes, in essence, a safety standard, a national trade mark which will belong to Her Majesty in right of Canada. We all agree that safety is necessary because of the increasing number of accidents on our highways. Many accidents are due to faulty tires, and it must be remembered that the bill deals only with tires; it does not deal with the manufacture of cars, trucks or motorcycles. The bill is an addition and complementary to the Motor Vehicle Safety Act which applies only to tires on road vehicles and deals with the safety of those tires. The main thrust of the bill, as I indicated, is the tire safety trade mark which belongs to Her Majesty in right of Canada. But the use of this mark is to be implemented by regulations.

Officials of the leading tire manufacturers appeared before the committee on April 4, 1974. It must be remembered that the tires are made by manufacturers other than those who manufacture the automobiles, trucks and motorcycles.

I come now to my principal objection to the bill, which is the use of the word "regulations." I spoke on this matter on March 26, 1974. When one analyzes the main principle of the bill, one finds that the tire safety standards are to be implemented by regulations. We are told that the regulations will be promulgated in the Canada Gazette and that one can find the regulations in that publication.

I would like to ask the Leader of the Government why, when a government bill is presented either in this house or in the other place, the departmental officials cannot prepare the regulations at the same time that they prepare the bill. This was discussed with the tire manufacturers ad nauseam, and they told us they are doing what is required under this bill. The fundamental principle is embodied in the regulations. It is my view that when a department prepares a bill, in consultation with the manufacturers, the regulations should be available. I have opposed this type of practice before, and I do so again.

This bill simply provides for a logo or trade mark on the side of the tire stating what the standard is, the grade of rubber, and so forth. I repeat, my objection is that when a department prepares a complicated bill such as this it should have the regulations available when dealing with the tire manufacturers. That is the procedure which should be followed. True, the regulations are to be promulgated in the Canada Gazette, but that is read by perhaps only a thousand people in Canada, lawyers and their students. That is not a satisfactory answer. The departmental officials, along with the people with whom they are dealing, should prepare the regulations and then give them to us along with the bill. I realize we have a committee on Statutory Regulations, and all the rest of it, but the regulations might come to the committee only six to eight months later. For that reason, I am suggesting to the Leader of the Government that he request of the departmental officials that when they prepare a bill such as this the regulations should accompany it.

This same bill was dealt with in committee in the last session. At that time we had departmental officials and representatives of the tire manufacturers present, all leading men in their respective fields. They told us they were doing what they thought was in the minds of the departmental officials, but they did not know what the regulations were. Many members of the committee asked what the regulations were, but the witnesses appearing before the committee could not tell them. That committee meeting was held on April 4, 1974, and the regulations are not available yet.

What is the value of a bill, which sets certain standards for tires, without regulations? I approve of this bill; I approved of it in April. I do not think it need go to committee again. We have heard from the tire manufacturers and the departmental officials. To require their presence again would only be an unwarranted expense. I do, however, suggest to the Leader of the Government that he do what he can to see that when we have a bill before us such as this we also have the regulations. Otherwise, it may be six to eight months before the regulations are available.

Senator Desruisseaux: I should like to ask Senator Haig a question. I understand that he was on the committee last spring. My question is in relation to the re-making of old tires, not the making of new tires. When old tires are recapped, the new treads sometimes hide the poor condition underneath. I wonder if he covered that point.

Senator Haig: I was not only on the committee, I was chairman of it. I asked that question. It was perhaps the only intelligent question I asked. We were given something about the size of a half dollar, a tread-depth gauge which indicated the amount of tread in the tire. I did not know what it was. The only person who did was Senator McElman. I asked this question of the representative from the Rubber Association of Canada who gave us the gauge, and he told us what it was. It is placed on the tread and indicates how much tread there is and whether it is good, poor or bad. After the meeting I asked Senator McElman how he knew about it and he said he once worked in a filling station. The question asked by Senator Desruisseaux was one of those that was asked then, whether it applied to second-hand tires, retreads or what. It is in the regulations, but the regulations were not there. That is why we want to find out ahead of time. When we are discussing a bill as important as this, why do we not have the regulations?

Senator Perrault: I think the point being made by Honourable Senator Haig is that tentative regulations should be developed and presented when a bill is being considered. I am sure the honourable senator is aware that in the course of dealing with legislation the norm is first to pass the measure. In the case of the measure before us, the empowering clause, clause 15, dealing with regulations, which is to be found on page 9 of the proposed bill, specifically empowers the Governor in Council to make regulations:

—respecting the detention of motor vehicle tires seized under section 13 and for preserving or safeguarding any tires so detained.

And so on. In other words, it is mandatory under our parliamentary system to pass the legislation, to obtain the assent of Parliament to a proposed bill, before regulations can be developed and enunciated.

Senator Haig: I agree, but what I am suggesting is that with an important bill like this we should have the regulations. I admit they can be amended, changed and altered in any way you like, as long as people know about it. The tire manufacturers, ask "What do you want? Do you want ten inches of rubber, twenty inches or what?" I know all about the passage of a bill with proclamation and so on, but with an important bill like this, under which the Government in Council can make regulations, why could we not have, ancillary to it, the regulations?

Senator Perrault: However, I assure the honourable senator that his suggestion will be communicated to the minister responsible for the preparation of this legislation in the first instance; his suggestion will be passed along. If an accommodation can be made to make this proposal more understandable to honourable senators we will certainly move in that direction.

Senator Haig: Thank you very much.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I do not think there is a better example of the point made by Senator Haig than the initial answer of the Leader of the Government, who referred to the regulations under clause 15. It so happens that some of the regulations under clause 15 are quite minor. The very fact that the Leader of the Government was not aware that other major regulatory powers are given under clauses 4 and 7 is a clear indication of the point Senator Haig was making.

● (2010)

I might point out that in this case the power is given to the Governor in Council to make regulations. It does not say that these regulations must be necessary to implement the act. It is just that the minister may make regulations. There are some reservations in section 4, respecting the "mark," in section 7, respecting importation of motor vehicle tires; and in section 15, respecting the detention of motor vehicle tires, et cetera. But the point which Senator Haig is making is one that I would like to support, namely, that for every bill we should have a draft of the regulations, because quite often the regulations are, if I may use the term, the "guts" of the act. It is the regulations which impose the conditions on those who are affected by the act.

As I have said before, I hope we will not again have this kind of language in a bill, by which the minister in effect may make regulations, without the qualification, "regulations necessary to implement the act." Certainly, I hope we will never again have the phrase that used to be used—and which may be used again, although I hope not—to the effect that the minister may make regulations which, in his opinion, are necessary to implement the act. With that kind of wording the whole matter is taken completely out of the courts. Anybody who is disadvantaged by the regulations is in the position of going to court and having the minister appear as a witness and say, "You have no case. In my opinion, these were necessary." And that is the end of it.

I think the point made by Senator Haig is an excellent one. The very fact that the Leader of the Government picked up the last regulation section in his reply is a clear indication that we need something much better than the type of legislation we have in this bill.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I find it difficult to accept the line of argument advanced by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition. The method of processing this bill has been a feature of the parliamentary process since Confederation.

Senator Grosart: We have changed a lot of features.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator can find numerous examples of legislation, advanced not only by the present government but by previous governments of a different political affiliation, in which exactly the same regulating sections exist.

I find it difficult to accept the argument that it is possible to establish and delineate a set of regulations before the measure has even been passed. The minister does not develop these regulations. The Governor in Council develops these regulations.

Senator Grosart: It does not say so here.

Senator Perrault: It is not an unusual section. It is the norm. It is not a departure from established parliamentary procedure.

However, as I said at the outset, the honourable senator's concerns will be communicated, and if he is arguing for the establishment of a system in which a set of tentative regulations are appended to a proposed measure to assist in its consideration, then that idea will certainly be placed before the government.

Senator Haig: Honourable senators, that is all I want. All I am suggesting is that when we are considering a bill which has to do with manufactured goods we should have before us not only the bill but the regulations made under it. Certainly, the department must have discussed this bill with tire manufacturers, and all I am suggesting is that when the department prepares the bill, which it does, surely it could, as the honourable leader has suggested, draw up a set of tentative regulations which could be amended at any time.

That is all I was asking for. Of course, that does not apply merely to this bill but, as Senator Grosart mentioned, to all bills of this nature in which power is given to the minister to make regulations, which may or may not follow the terms or the intent of the particular bill.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that should the honourable Senator Neiman speak now her speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, before the debate on this bill is concluded—

Senator Asselin: Senator Neiman has the floor.

Senator Hicks: Senator Asselin has misunderstood Her Honour the Speaker, who was pointing out that if Senator Neiman speaks now her speech will have the effect of concluding the debate. I wish to avail myself of the opportunity of speaking before the debate is closed.

Honourable senators, I should like to draw attention to one other aspect. A number of the bills this year, I am glad to say, have contained very helpful explanatory notes. This is generally the custom in the other place when bills are introduced there, and I noted with approval that Bills S-2, S-4, S-6, S-7, S-9, S-10 and S-11 all have helpful explanatory notes attached to the printed copies of the documents that were introduced in this chamber. This was not the case with S-3, to provide for a continuing revision and consolidation of the statutes and regulations of Canada. Perhaps one could argue that this bill was so self-evident in its intent that honourable senators would not require, nor would other members of Parliament require, explanatory notes. Even so it is a fairly long and complex bill, and I think we might have been favoured by explanatory notes from the draughtsmen of the legislation.

Bill S-5, to enable Canada to comply with a convention on the international recognition of rights in aircraft, does not have any explanatory notes. Again, I think that this is a bill which could be dealt with more easily in this chamber if it had explanatory notes.

The bill presently before us does not contain any explanatory notes, and I think they would have been of assistance.

Bill C-12, which was passed in the other place and sent here, did not contain explanatory notes. That was an emergency type of legislation, to provide for the resumption of grain handling operations on the west coast of Canada, and it did not have explanatory notes. This I accept. Legislation of that kind does not require them. I would, however, ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to urge the various departmental people who are responsible for these matters to favour this chamber with the same kind of explanatory notes that are normally provided when legislation is introduced in the other place.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I regret that I was a few minutes late in arriving here tonight, but I was at a meeting in the other place of a committee that was of some concern to me. However, I believe I have gathered the import of the remarks that were made prior to my arrival, and I understand the concern of the chairman of the Transport and Communications Committee, as well as that of the other honourable senators, with respect to the lack of information that obviously has failed to accompany this bill. At the same time I would remind honourable senators that when I moved the second reading of an identical bill last spring, and when I moved the second reading of this bill, I said that it was modelled on another statute, namely, the Motor Vehicle Safety Act, and that that contained in it regulations respecting the manufacture and distribution, the make and the type, of tires for new vehicles.

I believe I did explain at that time, and this was confirmed during the meeting of the committee when it was considering the previous bill, that the regulations which the department intends to draft, and in fact has drafted, with respect to the after-market tires will be identical in nature to the regulations under the present statute. The same standards will apply to these new tires that you buy in the after-market, or as secondary tires, as would apply to the new tires which you buy with the original vehicle.

There is some question that still has not been resolved with respect to what we call recaps or retreads which are not, I believe, sufficiently covered under this bill, nor can they be because of problems in drafting regulations that would be enforceable across the international border. I believe the department does intend to try to include that kind of recap or retread eventually, and certainly it seems to me to be necessary that they should endeavour to do so. But, as I have said, there are problems of jurisdiction that have yet to be resolved.

However, honourable senators, I can confirm that the regulations concerning the new tires covered under this bill will be identical in nature to those regulations now in existence for new tires on new vehicles.

I shall, as the government leader has suggested, bring this to the attention of the director of motor vehicle safety in the Department of Transport. He has been away from Ottawa for the last week, and I have not been able to get in touch with him. I shall also mention Senator Hicks' observation that in this type of bill it would be most helpful to have some explanatory notes.

Honourable senators, I do not believe there is anything further I can add, unless there are further questions.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Neiman, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Senator Haig: Honourable senators, before the next order is called I should like to take this opportunity to announce that the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications will meet on Thursday morning next at 9.30 for the purposes of organization and consideration of the British Columbia Telephone Company bill. Anyone who feels disappointed at not being able to discuss tires, but who wants to hear about telephones, will find that a good meeting to attend.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bonnell, seconded by the Honourable Senator McGrand, for the second reading of the Bill S-9, intituled: "An Act to repeal the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act and to amend the Trade Marks Act".—(Honourable Senator Macdonald).

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I propose that Item No. 6 on the Orders of the Day be moved up for consideration now.

Senator Grosart: No, no, I disagree. It is a question of leave.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I just explain that it is a matter of accommodating a time problem involving one honourable senator scheduled to speak to this particular measure. It is simply an accommodation for which I had assumed arrangements had been duly made with the Leader of the Opposition. May I appeal to my colleagues on both sides of the house to endeavour to accommodate this request.

Senator Grosart: There are other people to be accommodated. It is not just one and if we are not to have more consultation with respect to these matters, you will not get these things through.

Senator Langlois: We did consult you.

Senator Grosart: Yes, but bills have been again introduced with no consultation.

Senator Choquette: Mr. Leader, could we find out who you are endeavouring to accommodate, because I see Senator Flynn's name on the Order Paper. Is he the honourable senator who is to be accommodated, or do you have someone else in mind?

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I think I had better clarify the situation. I adjourned the debate on Bill S-2 and was asked before we entered the chamber tonight whether I was prepared to speak immediately in order to accommodate Senator Connolly (Ottawa West). I said yes and that is the only consultation there was. I did not know that there had been any arrangements on this side that might conflict with my trying to accommodate Senator Connolly. So there has been a case of lack of internal communication which, I suppose, leaves me now entirely in the hands of the Senate. I am personally in no rush to proceed with this bill. I am willing to speak now on Bill S-2 if it is the desire of the house. Otherwise we can proceed as is provided in the Orders of the Day.

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, October 15, the debate on the motion of Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) for the second reading of Bill S-2, to amend the Supreme Court Act and to make related amendments to the Federal Court Act.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I shall attempt to be brief in what I have to say, in order to accommodate others than the sponsor of the bill, Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), who has presented a full explanation of this really very important piece of legislation. So much discussion has taken place in recent months with respect to conflict of interest that I wonder whether in speaking of an Act to amend the Supreme Court Act a lawyer should not declare his interest. You may smile and think I am exaggerating, but I am not so sure that I am, because I, at times, appear before the Supreme Court and I would not wish anyone to think that I am dealing with a problem in which I have a personal interest. That situation, however, may demonstrate that very often conflict of interest and personal interest are confused with common interest. I believe this bill is of interest to everyone, but perhaps lawyers are more familiar with the problems involved. I do not believe that anyone who is familiar with a problem should be restricted in dealing with it in this house. That is what has happened so often in the past—parliamentarians who are fully conversant with a subject or have special knowledge of a certain matter have felt that maybe they shouldn't express their views. I don't agree with that.

● (2030)

I come now to the bill. Again I say we have been favoured with a very full explanation by the sponsor. The bill makes these amendments—one is trivial, one is important, and the other constitutes the essence of the bill.

The first, which is trivial, concerns the residence of the Registrar, his deputy, and the members of the Supreme Court. Under the present act these people have to reside in the city of Ottawa or within five miles thereof. The amendment will give them the opportunity of residing in the territory of the National Capital Region or within 25 miles thereof.

For members of the Superior Court of Quebec, their residence is established by their appointment for a given city and the vicinity, which is rather vague and accords a great deal of leeway. I am quite satisfied that this amendment improves the situation. There is no doubt about that. But I would not want any problem to arise from the strict definition of "twenty-five miles thereof." Since this sort of thing can be rather difficult to measure at times, I do not think it is a problem that will occur in practice.

The second amendment—which is an important one, but which was not really the main purpose of the bill—provides for interest to be paid on judgments of the Supreme Court of Canada, when the Supreme Court allows appeals from lower courts where no awards of money were made.

Where the judgment of the first court was rendered, let us say, two or three years ago, with no award being made, and the Supreme Court reverses the judgment and gives an award, it is only fair that the award should bear interest from the date of the first judgment, if not from the date of the introduction of the original action.

In my opinion, interest should be paid from the date of the introduction of the original action in many cases. With regard to Quebec legislation, the award bears judgment from the date of the introduction of the action and not from the date of the judgment itself.

I would like to question in committee whether this is really the purpose of the legislation—whether it is from the date of the judgment of the first court or from the date of the introduction of the action in the first court. In a case for damages, for instance, three years could elapse between the date of the introduction of the action and the judgment of the first court. That judgment of the first court might reject the action, and three years later the Supreme Court might reverse the judgment and award an amount. That amount should bear interest from the date of the introduction of the action and not from the date of the first judgment. However, I would like to deal with this matter in committee. If an amendment is indicated, perhaps it could be made there. It is much easier to make an amendment in our committee when a bill has originated in the Senate, rather than wait for an amendment to be made in the other place.

I come now to the main purpose of the bill, which is to provide for the abolition of all appeals as of right in civil cases to the Supreme Court of Canada, and see to it that only those cases in which leave is granted by the Supreme Court will be dealt with by the Supreme Court of Canada.

As has been explained—and is well known by lawyers generally and others who are interested in the problem—there has been for several years a tremendous carryover of cases from one session of the court to another. As a result there is a considerable delay which cannot be recouped or which will not be recaptured, unless we provide for the amendment proposed here.

Under the present system, there are too many cases going to the Supreme Court and many of them arise out of an appeal as of right which exists in all cases where the amount involved is $10,000 or more. By today's standard that is a very small amount, but the idea of giving a right only in cases providing for an amount of $10,000 or more is, I suggest, a very bad principle, because there are cases which involve less than $10,000 but which raise principles that are more important to the general public than some cases which involve several hundreds of thousands of dollars.

In the good old days, the Supreme Court probably had all the time it needed to deal with the cases that came before it, but today that court is not able to deal with all the cases that come before it.

We have to find a solution. As has been explained by Senator Connolly, the Canadian Bar Association appointed a committee which made some recommendations. The main recommendation of that committee was that an appeal to the Supreme Court should be given only in cases where leave is granted by that court or where leave is granted by the last court of appeal of any province as it exists today. The report of the Canadian Bar Association, I think, makes sense. It has generally been agreed that this was a solution—at least, the first solution to be tried. It was considered better to try to diminish the load of the Supreme Court rather than add to the number of members of the court.

If the solution proposed in this legislation does not bring the result hoped for, the question of adding to the number of members of the court can later be considered. But I doubt whether this will be necessary.

I am, however, concerned that the solution proposed might just shift the load of the Supreme Court from one area to another rather than effectively diminish that load.

As was explained by the sponsor of the bill, the only criterion under which leave will be granted is the question of the "public importance" of the case, which is a rather vague term.

The sponsor said:

The discretion is very broad, and I think it must be read in conjunction with the considerable body of jurisprudence that has been built up in the area.

I know that several years ago the Supreme Court, when granting leave to appeal, used to give reasons. At that time a body of jurisprudence was built up to show that in matters of constitutional dispute, references by the federal or provincial governments, and in all matters of conflict of jurisprudence between the court of last resort of each province, leave would generally be granted. However, for several years now the Supreme Court has taken the attitude that it did not have to give any reason for accepting or rejecting an application for leave.

I well remember in one case, where I was opposing an application, that the Chief Justice asked, "Don't you think that this case is an important one?" What could I say? I only plead important cases.

● (2040)

Senator Walker: Did you tell him that?

Senator Flynn: By gesture, anyway; by attitude.

Senator Langlois: That applies to your opponents also.

Senator Flynn: If my opponent pleaded his case was important, how could I say it was not? The point I want to make is that on applications for leave to appeal will be decided the right of any party wishing to go before the Supreme Court of Canada. It is at that point that the case will be decided for the most part.

There are a good many costs involved in making an application for leave to appeal. The case has to be prepared, written argument has to be presented, and so forth. Even if a case takes only a matter of an hour before the court, counsel coming from a distant part of this country would have to charge for the time and expense involved. For those reasons, the parties should be aware of the general criteria on which applications will either be granted or rejected. I do not suggest that this should be provided in detail in the legislation itself. However, I should like to get some assurance in committee that it is the intention to build up a body of jurisprudence in this connection. I do not think the present body of jurisprudence would be applicable under the new formula found in this legislation. In my estimation it is of the utmost importance that the public be aware of the criteria. This would be to the advantage of the court as well as the parties involved.

On October 15 last, I asked the sponsor of the bill, Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), about the number of applications being made presently and the time spent by the court on them, to which his reply was that in 1972 there were 156 applications; in 1973, 169; and in 1974, to October 15, 103. I also asked the sponsor of the bill what the proportion is of leaves granted to the number applied for, the reply to which was that in 1972 there were 39 granted out of 156; in 1973, 58 granted out of 169; and in 1974, up to October 15, 40 leaves granted out of 103 applications. So, about one-third of the applications are being granted.

If the only means of appealing to the Supreme Court of Canada is by leave, what will the number of applications be since there is no rule other than the public importance of the case? The number will certainly jump during the first years. If the court has to deal with all these applications, what is gained on the one hand will be lost on the other. For that reason, I feel it is of utmost importance to define, as soon as possible, the ground rules for accepting or rejecting applications for leave to appeal.

Senator Goldenberg: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Flynn: Certainly.

Senator Goldenberg: Are you suggesting that the ground rules be set out in the legislation?

Senator Flynn: No. I said just the contrary a few moments ago. In my opinion, it will be up to the Supreme Court, either by way of building up a body of jurisprudence or by establishing policies, to set out the ground rules. The important thing is that the parties know where they stand and that the court not spend too much time on applications which will result in no benefit at all arising out of this legislation.

As far as the actual hearings of applications are concerned, the Canadian Bar Association favours the continuation of these applications being heard by a panel of three members of the court, which would mean there could be three panels hearing applications at the same time. The important thing in these applications is that the court consider the applications in the same way. It would be very easy, for instance, to have a panel made up of three judges from the province of Quebec to establish a body of jurisprudence applicable to Quebec and to have another body of jurisprudence applicable to other parts of the country.

If my information is correct, applications are heard by the whole court in the United States. The United States Supreme Court, of course, receives help from the clerical staff, but generally the decision to grant or reject an application is one arrived at by the whole court. This could be done here. It would not involve too much time, provided the public, generally, the parties involved, and the legal profession are aware of the criteria the court will use in either accepting or rejecting an application. I would not want a wrong decision handed down on an application for leave in any given case simply because only three members of the court heard the application. That, in my view, is a danger. To adopt the system whereby the whole court hears applications would not require any amendment to the legislation.

Since the Supreme Court of Canada is the court of last resort, its role being a very important one in our society, it has to have an overall jurisdiction in order to decide problems concerning the public at large, not simply the parties involved, and because of that the decision rendered by the Supreme Court of Canada on applications for leave, as well as in respect of final judgments, should be a decision arrived at by the whole court.

It is my hope that this practice will be established over the coming years. The first step in that direction, of course, would be for the court to let the public know, as soon as possible, the terms on which applications will be granted or rejected.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, if I understood my honourable friend correctly, his concern is with the interpretation of the expression "public importance." I, too, am troubled with the interpretation of that expression, especially in opposition with the often used expression "public interest." I am wondering whether a case affecting the future rights of a party, for example, would be considered as a "matter of public importance." It is very important that this should be clarified to my mind.

PROPRIETARY OR PATENT MEDICINE ACT TRADE MARKS ACT

BILL TO REPEAL AND TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bonnell, seconded by the Honourable Senator McGrand, for the second reading of the Bill S-9, intituled: "An Act to repeal the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act and to amend the Trade Marks Act".—(Honourable Senator Macdonald).

Senator Macdonald: Honourable senators, if it is agreeable, I should like to yield to Senator Sullivan.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Joseph A. Sullivan: Honourable senators, we shall now go from legal jargon to medical technicalities for a change.

Senator Flynn: Which is worse?

Senator Sullivan: Legal jargon.

In rising to participate in this debate on the motion for the second reading of Bill S-9, I wish to congratulate the sponsor, Senator Bonnell. Having had a fair amount of dealings with the Department of National Health and Welfare, and the food and drugs directorates, over the years, I am fully cognizant of the machinations of their minds and how they work. Some honourable senators will recall that a few years ago we had the privilege of having the leading experts of the country on drugs, particularly pertaining to antibiotics, appearing before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. They made a great contribution at that time, and some of the proposals in this legislation today are as a result of what happened in that committee a few years ago.

I am in the main in complete agreement with this legislation, but it does not go quite far enough. I am being constructively critical and not destructive for a change. Essentially Bill S-9 replaces the present Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act, the contents of which, following considerable amendment, will become a section of the Food and Drugs Act. True, the section to be included in the Food and Drugs Act is not yet written, but essentially it will be based on two concepts. It is to retain the best features of the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act while discarding those features which are out of date. This is to be accomplished by an as yet unwritten amendment to the Food and Drugs Act which will, first, require the listing on every label of each and every ingredient which is contained in the medication, and, secondly, establish a continuous scientific review of data pertaining to the manufacture—I shall have more to say on that momentarily—quality, safety and effectiveness of proprietary medicines.

In general, this will do away with the so-called secret formulas, which from an academic point of view is long overdue. Why legislation such as this was not placed on the statute books long ago I do not know. Modern therapeutics have no place for such remedies, particularly when adverse drug interactions might well occur with prescribed medications. It is, however, difficult to assess the total impact of this legislation without knowing the details of the proposed amendments to the Food and Drugs Act which will replace the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act.

I have had a full discussion with Dr. W. E. Alexander, the Dean of the Faculty of Pharmacy of the University of Toronto, on this legislation, and some of these remarks are his valued judgments and contributions that he has made in other areas in relation to a drug and its effect on various parts of the body.

The following are the potential results of the proposed legislation. First, the continuous scientific review will likely become the responsibility of the Health Protection Branch. I should like to know—and probably the only place we will get this information will be in committee—who will carry out the continuous scientific review. The regulations which pertain to licensing for the manufacture of prescription drugs will likely prevail. Secondly, the proof of quality, safety and effectiveness of proprietary medicines will become the responsibility of the manufacturer. Thirdly—and this was not mentioned in the legislation—herbal medicinals of unknown composition will likely require detailed analysis prior to being allowed for sale to the public.

In general, the results of the above three points can only be commended. However, from the point of view of the industry I would think many products would not come up to the standards of the proposed amendments, and therefore could not be marketed. Thus, while the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act reduced the number of marketed patent medicines from approximately 5,600 to 2,000, as the sponsor says in the first paragraph on page 127 of Hansard, the proposed amendments will likely reduce this number of 2,000 quite markedly. From an academic point of view, if a drug offered for sale to the public cannot survive on a scientific review of manufacture, quality, safety and effectiveness, it should be withdrawn from the market.

Here I interject a point that I think is well taken. It is in regard to what I called previously bi-equivalency studies of drugs, about which we had a discussion a few years ago, in which the “me-tooers” or copiers, as Senator Macnaughton knows, would manufacture a drug in Italy or Poland, change the chemical formula a little and try to put it on the market as a cheaper drug. I would not give it to a sick cat, but they would get away with it. After all, modern drugs are so potent and specific that their administration to the patient does not leave any room for error.

We are aware that this is a time-consuming and expensive process. We have the facilities and teaching schools in the medical schools of this country to carry this out. We do not have to increase the personnel of the Health Protection Branch to do that if they will avail themselves of all the facilities that are present in the teaching schools. However, the patient's health should be of supreme importance to us. The lowest cost drug reimbursement policy should be instituted only—and I repeat only—if the bi-equivalency between two chemically equivalent drugs has been proved, and that requires a really first class laboratory in this field.

Now we get to television and those things we see advertised every day. They are worthless. If we insist on this prerequisite in antibiotics we must have the most stringent control over malicious TV advertising of those questionable products and their spurious claims. The greatest advantage some of those nose drops advertised on the television screen have is in the Kleenex you buy with them. It seems to me that the only advertisement you can believe, because you know the quality of the product, is that for Molson's Export Ale. You know how much to take and how much not to take.

● (2100)

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: No commercials!

Senator Sullivan: Honourable senators, I have referred to the presentation of Senator Bonnell and I have to agree with Senator Buckwold when he made the following statement, as reported at page 128 of Senate Hansard:

The point of my question, which was not answered, is whether it would not be better under these regulations to control that type of advertising, which may not be based exactly on the facts.

All I can say to that, honourable senators, is that my answer is a decided yes. Somehow or other this should be incorporated in this legislation.

There is another aspect which perhaps we have had enough of tonight in Senator Haig's presentation, but about which Senator Grosart most reasonably asked certain questions. I refer again to page 128 of the Hansard where Senator Grosart states the following:

It is most important that we know the phrasing and the authority for these regulations under the Food and Drugs Act, which are now taking over a very important aspect of the former act.

As I understand it, Bill S-9 effectively gives notice that the current Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act will cease to exist as of January 1976. Presumably, the amendments to the Food and Drugs Act, which will replace the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act, will be debated adequately prior to becoming law. Nevertheless, they will have the effect of eliminating those drug products of questionable effectiveness from sale to the public. In other words, the manufacturer has to put on the label what is in the preparation, and it cannot be sold indefinitely over the counter. Surely this must be accepted as an appropriate position to take. I commend this legislation.

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, Senator Bonnell, the sponsor of this bill, is away from Ottawa on official business, having had to proceed to the capital of his province to attend the funeral of the late Lieutenant-Governor of Prince Edward Island. On his behalf, therefore, I should like to refer to some imprecisions reported in Hansard of October 17 in connection with this bill.

Senator Choquette: Do we understand that you are closing the debate?

Senator Langlois: No. I am merely clarifying answers in the debate on this bill. I also wish to answer a few questions which were raised during the debate.

On page 126 of Hansard the statement appears that “patented” formulae were placed in the British Pharmacopoeia. This is not so. The royal “patent” was granted so that a formula was protected but the ingredients were, in fact, never disclosed when a patent was granted.

At the top of page 127, in the lefthand column, it is stated that there were some 5,600 different patent drugs on the market in 1908. This should read "1935" instead of "1908".

On page 128, in response to a question by Senator Buckwold, it is indicated that the advertising of drugs comes under the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The Food and Drugs Act and regulations provide ample authority to control drug advertising. Since medical experts are required to evaluate advertising, this control is found in the regulations under the Food and Drugs Act, and is the responsibility of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

On page 128, Senator Grosart asked a number of questions. I believe the following observations should be made with respect to them.

The Governor in Council has authority to make regulations under the Food and Drugs Act. The authority is specified in section 25 of the act, and is very wide. It extends to making regulations under the Food and Drugs Act respecting proprietary medicines, while the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act is still in force. In other words, the making of food and drug regulations and the repeal of the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act are two distinct matters.

The Governor in Council has authority to make regulations under the Food and Drugs Act. The proprietary regulations are made under the authority of the Food and Drugs Act. They are reviewed by the Department of Justice under the authority of the Statutory Instruments Act and are passed by order in council. They are then printed in the Canada Gazette, and copies of the orders in council are forwarded to the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, where they are reviewed.

Senator Sullivan raised some important points tonight and expressed the hope that they would be met or commented on in committee. It is my intention, when this debate on second reading is concluded, to move, on behalf of the sponsor, that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Health and Welfare.

Senator Macdonald: Honourable senators, of course I agree with what has been said, and with the importance of having the ingredients of these drugs listed on the label. If I recall correctly, the sponsor of the bill suggested that this would be valuable in a case where a person, such as a child, had taken an overdose of a particular patented medicine, because a doctor would know what he had to contend with, what had been taken and how to treat it.

There is, however, one question that bothers me—and I do not know if there is any solution to it—and that is: Even if these ingredients are listed, how valuable will such a listing be to the ordinary layman buying patented medicines over the counter? The reason I ask that question is that the schedule to the present Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act lists 45 drugs which are contained in some of these patent medicines, and which are listed with the department before a licence can be obtained. When I look at the names of those 45 drugs, I doubt whether there are six which anybody could pronounce, let alone know what is contained in them. Some way should be found, apart from medical terminology, to let people know in plain English just what is in the drug, and what they are buying.

Senator Sullivan: Well, Senator Macdonald, you say, "plain English." That is fine. Frankly, I would like to have some of these legal phrases in plain English too. However, I quite agree with what you say regarding the listing of the pharmaceutical contents of a particular preparation.

Let us say, for example, that you have a little package of pills such as Roloids which, supposedly, will suddenly remove your indigestion. If the manufacturer is going to have to list the names of the ingredients, then I feel there is no use in giving the Latin names of the drugs concerned or anything of that sort; but I do feel—and this is the important point—that the very listing of the ingredients, and not just calling the preparation by a trade name, will put the manufacturers up against the wall to show that the particular product they are selling will produce the advertised results. At that point the product will have to be tested in proper laboratories throughout the country. In that way, therefore, the number of products that are not good will be cut down.

In my opinion, if we can accomplish that much, we will be doing some good. But I quite agree with you. If a person gets a bottle of some kind of sleeping medicine and keeps on taking it, there is no way for a doctor to know whether the patient has a brain tumor or not.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, October 17, the debate on the motion of Senator Argue for the second reading of the Bill S-10, to amend the Feeds Act.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I note that the sponsor of the bill is not here, but somebody will reply on his behalf, I imagine.

As has been explained by Senator Argue, the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, this is a bill similar to one passed by this chamber previously. In the last session of the Twenty-ninth Parliament, a bill was introduced to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, which was referred to committee and studied thoroughly in three meetings with witnesses from the department and several interested organizations. The amendments reported by the committee were subsequently adopted by the Senate, but the bill was not fully considered in the other place because of the early dissolution of Parliament. That bill I note, was re-introduced in the other house only yesterday.

Bill S-10, to amend the Feeds Act, is in the same general field. Its passage through this house should not require much time, as the membership of the committee, which includes myself, is preponderantly the same.

This bill deals with rather complicated matters which require some explanation. Fortunately, my task has been made easier by Senator Argue's speech during the last sitting, in which he outlined the contents and made some useful comments.

In recent years great changes have taken place in the manufacture and distribution of animal nutrition. New products, such as enzymes and amino acids, have been introduced for feeding animals, and by-products of other industries have been added to feeds. These advances were not foreseen when the act was last revised in 1960. Some of these new ingredients and additives have had harmful effects on the livestock, on the consumer, and also on the environment. The Feeds Act is therefore being amended to cover the many new products used in feeds today.

The bill also amends the definition of livestock to include fish, rabbits and mink, since fish and rabbits are farmed for food, and mink for clothing. Regulations will have to be provided.

At the present time those who sell or import feed have to register their product before selling it, and the product has to meet certain standards as to composition, packaging and labelling. This bill extends this responsibility beyond sellers and importers, and covers Canadian manufacturers of feed. This is entirely logical, and one wonders why it was not provided for much earlier.

Bill S-10 spares the livestock raiser who feeds his animals whole seeds or grains of cultivated farm crops when they are free of deleterious substances. The bill also spares the livestock producer who mixes his own feed, provided he does not use in it any kind of drug that might be harmful to human health or the environment.

This strikes me as a strange and even contradictory provision. If the feed is produced by a feed-producing company, which employs experts in the field, then the government wants to be sure of every particle that goes into the feed. If the feed is made by a livestock producer, who has only a limited knowledge of enzymes, amino acids, proteins, vitamins, et cetera, all that the government is then concerned about is that he does not poison us with some sort of chemical or drug. Naturally, we do not want to eat meat from unhealthy animals. I doubt, however, that livestock producers are unscrupulous, and are prepared to poison consumers in order to make a bigger profit. This matter is somewhat confusing, and I hope that it can be straightened out in committee.

To enforce all these regulations, the government will have to increase bureaucratic control and the bureaucracy. To me and to many other Canadian citizens this is repulsive. The continuous extension of bureaucracy means that soon most aspects of Canadian life will come under government control, and this appears to be the intent of the present Liberal administration. It seems that the only way this government knows of fighting increasing unemployment is by creating jobs for bureaucrats. I understand that fully one-seventh of the labour force in Canada is now employed by various government agencies, but unemployment is still growing.

I am sure that farmers and livestock producers have had enough of meddling bureaucracy, and do not want any more inspectors and officials. We shall have to be very careful that the smooth, soft-handed bureaucrats, whose main exposure to feed and animals has been chiefly through textbooks and seminars, do not make life impossible for the livestock producer.

Today feed is frightfully expensive because the basic ingredients—grains of various sorts—are more expensive than ever before. Consequently, the livestock producers must look for feed supplements that will be more effective in helping the animal grow quickly and remain in good health. Experiments are being constantly carried out to find suitable additives that will lower the cost of feeding the animal while maintaining it in healthy condition, and at the same time provide top grade food of excellent nutritional quality.

We, the legislators, must make sure that the feed producers are not completely frustrated and discouraged in the use of additives that could be beneficial to the livestock, and the producer. We know that overzealous bureaucrats can hinder the producer, and the result could be still higher meat prices. This bill should be carefully considered in committee.

Hon. A. Hamilton McDonald: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to speak at any length, but I do want to reply to some of the remarks of Senator Yuzyk. Before I do so, however, I must say that I have no idea when the Feeds Act first came into being, or whether it has a history as long as that of the Supreme Court Act and the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act. I know that in the early days in western Canada there were some strange antics as far as patent medicines were concerned. I can remember when they were sold by auction from a democrat. Of course, through government legislation and bureaucrats, if you like, we have moved a long way since that time.

The same thing is true with respect to animal feeds. My first recollection of additives to home-grown livestock feed is that they were generally purchased from a salesman who had a slick car, and who probably came from Toronto or Montreal. He sold you a bag—probably 100 pounds—of cattle supplement, pig supplement, hen supplement, and so forth, that would cure anything and everything. I think it was chiefly sand and dried paint. Through this act, however, and other acts, the livestock industry has moved a long way, and the fact that we are able to produce meat in the present-day quantities is largely due to the activities of feed companies, of scientists, of our universities, and of government bureaucrats who have made it possible to produce 1,150-pound and 1,200-pound steers in a little over 12 months. Not very long ago, it used to take three years to do this. I hate to think of what the price a pound of beef would be in the butchers' shops today if we were still taking three years to get an animal up to 1,100 pounds or more.

The same thing is true with hogs. Only a few short years ago it took anything from eight to 12 months to produce a hog ready for market. Today if it takes over five and a half months you are losing money. It used to take six or eight months to produce a chicken; today it takes six or eight weeks. I repeat that a lot of this is due to the growth stimulants, the vitamins and the balanced diets now available for the production of meat products.

We have a history in this area, honourable senators, as good as, if not better than, that of most of the other nations in the world today. Some of the products we have banned from Canada are very helpful in stimulating growth, but it has been found that there is a possibility, at least, that some of them cause cancer in human beings.

I want to give credit to past governments which produced legislation in this area to stimulate the growth of the livestock industry and keep it viable. This bill merely brings the Feeds Act into 1974. It is my hope that we will continue to go forward, and have, in a year or two, further amendments so that the livestock producer can continue to produce meat products in the quantities needed at home and abroad. If in consequence it becomes necessary for us to have additional bureaucrats, then, honourable senators, surely this is one area where we can afford them. I can think of many other areas where we could do with fewer inspectors.

In view of the effects this legislation will have on the economy it is well worthwhile, and I commend it to all honourable senators.

On motion of Senator Norrie, debate adjourned.

STATUTE REVISION BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, October 17, the debate on the motion of Senator Stanbury for the second reading of Bill S-3, to provide for a continuing revision and consolidation of the statutes and regulations of Canada.

Hon. Lionel Choquette: Honourable senators, I rise to support the motion for the second reading of this bill, though not without certain reservations. In an exchange of pleasantries during the Throne Speech debate, I indicated that in resigning as Deputy Leader of the Opposition I had not thereby taken a vow of silence. I still enjoy the cut and thrust of debate and, on appropriate occasions, I have not hesitated to sally forth on "search and destroy" missions. As my fellow senators know, this is not such an occasion, and I hope my colleagues will not miss the thunder and lightning.

With the avowed purposes of this bill, so ably explained by its sponsor, no one could disagree—certainly not a practitioner of the law. Those purposes are, in the words of the sponsor, "to make the law more readily available to the public, to the legal profession, and to parliamentarians." That is really the object of this bill.

I personally welcome the establishment of a permanent commission, under the aegis of the Minister of Justice, to revise and consolidate from time to time the public statutes. I have in the past objected to "omnibus" statutes which, within a single act, amend a large number of other acts. Also, it is not always easy to obtain a consolidated version of an act which takes account of all the myriad amendments made one way or another in the past. Hopefully, some of these difficulties may be remedied if the current proposals are faithfully carried out.

I also welcome the intended participation of Parliament in future revisions of the statute law. I am sure this work of revision is too great a responsibility to be left exclusively to bureaucrats, however informed and enlightened they may or may not be. I hope, indeed, that there will be established a joint committee of both houses to review the work of the commission in this regard.

I note, however—and the sponsor will correct me if I am wrong—that there appears to be no provision for a corresponding parliamentary review of the revisions, from time to time, of the regulations. We have had quite a discussion tonight about regulations, but I wish to repeat with respect to this bill that there appears to be no provision for corresponding parliamentary review of the revisions, from time to time, of the regulations. I thought there was in being a scrutiny committee of both Houses of Parliament on regulations and statutory instruments—and I see the joint chairman, Senator Forsey, is not present—fully capable and willing to review the work of the proposed commission in this regard. That is the proposition I intend to make if and when this bill is referred to committee.

All in all, in my opinion, this legislation should not be rushed through willy-nilly, but should be thoroughly examined by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs where informed officials, and possibly the minister, can give us a full explanation.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

"With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator Connolly, P.C., moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Vaillancourt:

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee and to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the evidence received and taken on the subject at preceding sessions be referred to the Committee; and

That the Committee be instructed to report to the Senate from time to time its findings, together with such recommendations as it may see fit to make.

After debate, and—

The question being put on the motion, it was—Resolved in the affirmative."

J. F. MacNEILL,
Clerk of the Senate.

The Committee was reconstituted during the three succeeding sessions of Parliament. See Journals of the Senate, February 19th, 1964, April 6th, 1965, and January 19th, 1966.

The Final Report of The Special Committee of the Senate on Aging was tabled on Wednesday, February 2, 1966. The Report contained ninety-two recommendations under the following headings:

- (1) Income Status and Security.
- (2) Employment Status and Opportunities.
- (3) Health Status and Health Care.
- (4) Housing Status and Needs.
- (5) Community Services for Older People.
- (6) Research and Statistics.
- (7) Planning and Co-ordination.

The Final Report of The Special Committee on Aging was debated in the Senate on February 7, 8, 9, 23 and 24, 1966.

(1) RECOMMENDATIONS THAT ARE IMPLEMENTEDRecommendation 1

The Committee endorses in principle the institution of an income guarantee program for all persons aged 65 and over and recommends to the Federal Government that this proposal be given immediate study.

ACTION TAKEN

This recommendation has been implemented as follows:

1. Beginning in 1966 the qualifying age for universal Old Age Security pension was reduced annually by one year so that by 1970 the plan was universal for all individuals 65 years of age and over.

2. In 1967 a Guaranteed Income Supplement was initiated that pays to the aged, on an income tested basis, a supplement that is reduced by one dollar for every two dollars of other income received (excluding Old Age Security benefits). According to the provisions of that Act the basic amount of the monthly pension was seventy-five dollars; the amount of the supplement was thirty dollars in 1967 and in any year after 1967, forty per cent of the amount of the pension paid, minus one dollar for each full two dollars of the pensioner's monthly base income.⁽¹⁾

(1) Revised Statutes of Canada 1970, Old Age Security Act, Volume V, Chapter O-6, pp. 2-5.

3. In 1972 legislation was passed that assured that benefit levels would be fully adjusted once a year to keep pace with the cost-of-living index.⁽²⁾ During 1971 the basic amount of the monthly pension was eighty dollars. This was adjusted according to the Consumer Price Index so that in 1972 the basic monthly pension was eighty-two dollars and eighty-eight cents. As of April 1971, the amount of the supplement varied as to the category of the pensioner. Pensioners who were single or pensioners who were married to a person who was not receiving a pension received a maximum of fifty-five dollars. Pensioners who were married to a person who was receiving a pension received forty-seven dollars and fifty cents each. These amounts were changed because of the Consumer Price Index, and in 1972 a single person or a married person whose spouse is not a pensioner received a supplement of sixty-seven dollars and twelve cents. Those married pensioners whose spouses were also pensioners received fifty-nine dollars and sixty-two cents.

4. In September 1973 the Government announced that adjustments would be made quarterly to commence in October 1973.⁽³⁾ The adjustments would be made as of October first, January first, April first and July first.

The following table illustrates the amount of basic payments and supplement payments from 1967 to the present.

Recommendation 6

That in line with the recommendation of the Economic Council of Canada, the NES, "as the key operational agency for implementing manpower policies" be responsible for analyzing basic supply and demand conditions and for administering the range of programs required to facilitate adjustment to technological change and to assist the movement of workers from areas of declining to those of increasing employment opportunities.

ACTION TAKEN

In 1967 the National Employment Service (NES) offices were renamed Canada Manpower Centres to reflect the emphasis on counselling, training, labour force mobility, skill up-grading etc.

The Canada Manpower Mobility Program was introduced in 1967 to assist workers who cannot afford to relocate to obtain employment or to take advantage of training. The program provides three types of assistance:

1. Trainee level grants to enable adults to take training courses not available in the area;

2. Exploratory grants, to enable workers to search for employment in other areas when work is not available in their community;
3. Relocation grants.

The Manpower Consultative Service is available to help labour and manpower resolve problems resulting from technological or other industrial changes.

During the 1972-73 fiscal year, $11,599,984 was expended on the Mobility Program. This expenditure aided the relocation of 10,653 families, and provided 10,725 workers with exploratory grants. Trainee travel and commuting assistance was given to 50,296 persons, making a total of 71,674 persons who received assistance under the Canada Manpower Mobility Program.⁽¹⁾

Recommendation 7

That, in particular, the NES seek the cooperation of individual employers' associations and unions in developing procedures in relation to staff layoffs and adjustments from whatever cause which, unless planned carefully well in advance, may have serious if not disastrous effects on the employment prospects of displaced older workers.

(1) Canada. Manpower and Immigration Annual Report, 1972-73, p. 13.

ACTION TAKEN

1. Under Part III of the Canada Labour Code effective January 1, 1972, an employer must give an employee with ten years or more service, eight weeks' notice or payment in lieu. Where an employer terminates fifty or more, or 10 per cent or more, of his employees whichever is greater, in any four week period he must

(b) give the employees the following notice:

- (i) eight weeks' notice if the employment of fifty or more persons and fewer than 200 persons is to be terminated at an establishment;
- (ii) twelve weeks' notice if the employment of 200 or more persons and fewer than 500 persons is to be terminated at an establishment; and
- (iii) sixteen weeks' notice if the employment of 500 or more persons is to be terminated at an establishment.⁽¹⁾

2. Most industrial contracts negotiated by management and unions provide for consultation in the event of layoffs or changes affecting workers of all ages.

3. During the fiscal year 1971-72 the Labour Management Consultation Branch of the Department of Labour devoted considerable effort to generating meaningful dialogue between unions and management in all sectors of the economy by actively promoting the formation of joint consultation committees and providing a variety of support services to existing committees. As of March 31, 1972 there were 497 committees representing 180,381 workers in industries under federal jurisdiction and 2,219 committees representing 631,371 employees in enterprises under provincial jurisdiction. Some 60 educational seminars were held to assist both management and workers to come to a better understanding of their roles within the collective bargaining process. Three area labour-management conferences were held in 1971-72. The Branch is also engaged in publishing pamphlets and committee aids dealing with joint consultation. A Branch newspaper, "Teamwork in Industry" is published ten times a year.⁽²⁾ These are designed to meet the needs of all age groups.

Recommendation 10

That an examination be made of those training programs provided for under the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act, which have as their object the up-grading of employed workers and the retraining of the unemployed with a view to determining the reasons for the limited use currently being made of them, and that such measures as are indicated be taken to improve their effectiveness in attracting and holding students especially in the older age range.

ACTION TAKEN

The Adult Occupational Training Act of 1967 replaced the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act of 1960-61 under which the Federal Government had shared with the provinces the cost of many training activities.

The A.O.T. Act provides that the Department may purchase training for adult members of the labour force and pay training allowances. Since it has accepted the responsibility for the selection and referral of trainees, the Federal Government pays the full cost of training allowances.

Training services are purchased from Provincial Governments, private schools and industry. Allowances are paid directly to trainees in public and private institutions. In the case of training in industry the employer is reimbursed up to a specified limit for wages paid to employees while in training.⁽³⁾

In July 1972 amendments to the Adult Occupational Training Act involved:

- (1) the removal of the three year labour force attachment requirement for training allowance eligibility;
- (2) the introduction of $30.00 per week basic allowance for adults in training who live with an employed parent or spouse;
- (3) the redefinition of eligibility criterion with regard to the period adults must have been out of school as being any 12 consecutive months rather than the 12 months immediately preceding referral to training.⁽⁴⁾

During 1972-73 there were 316,188 adults in Canada Manpower Training Program.⁽⁵⁾

The percentage of trainees aged 45 and over enrolled in institutional full-time training has increased from 9.3 in 1967-68 to 11.7 in 1972-73. In 1972-73 only 2.3 per cent of these were in the age group 55-64. The percentage of older persons participating in training-on-the-job is much lower. In 1972-73 only 5.4 were in the age group 45-65. The greatest impact of training-on-the-job is in the age group 20-24 which was 35.4 per cent of the total number.⁽⁶⁾ staff training of counsellors in this field. An effort is being made to develop a psychology oriented towards continuing education rather than seeking employment in the same type of work which may be redundant. In the past workers aged 45 and over considered themselves unemployable if their trades were phased out. It is necessary to encourage such older workers to take training.

There has been a marked improvement in the number of married women over 40 who seek and get training since elimination of the eligibility requirement for three years' experience in the labour force.

The Department forecasts that the policy to provide a "second chance" by way of continuing education will increase the number of older trainees within the next five years.

Recommendation 11

That the NES devote greater attention to the field of part-time employment with a view to discovering the nature of the demand and offering a more effective placement service.

ACTION TAKEN

Manpower Centres have a "Casual Pool" which is concerned with part-time employment of five days or less. Applicants for employment are requested to state whether they desire full or part-time employment. Counsellors are aware of agencies which employ part-time employees and an effort is made to arrange placements according to the demand.

Recommendation 26

- (a) That provincial departments of health and/or hospital commissions determine as quickly as possible the place and function of nursing homes in the total spectrum of required health facilities; and
- (b) That, assuming nursing homes to be accepted as an essential health facility, vigorous steps be taken to increase the present supply of those capable of providing a high quality of nursing and rehabilitation care; and
- (c) That approved nursing homes, operated on a non-profit basis, be made part of the hospital services system, and be included in the federal-provincial hospital insurance arrangements; and
- (d) That approved nursing homes, operated on a non-profit basis, be eligible to receive from federal-provincial sources capital grants under the hospital construction program, operating costs under the hospital insurance program to ensure the maintenance of desirable service standards and training grants to provide training for staff in rehabilitation nursing; and

- (e) That all nursing homes be licensed and supervised by a health agency and that consultation services be made available to all nursing homes by local and provincial health departments covering not only medical and nursing care including rehabilitation, but also nutrition, recreation and other important aspects of administration. The selection and in-service training of nursing home staff should receive particular attention.

ACTION TAKEN

The operation cost of nursing homes which provide hospital care is acceptable for sharing with the Federal Government under the Hospital Insurance Act. Chronic convalescent care cases are also covered where there is a medical necessity for those patients to be admitted to those institutions.*

Provinces have endeavoured to divide their care facilities into two categories: those requiring full-time nursing care, which come under the Department of Health, and those which have mainly a social need, which come under the jurisdiction of the department dealing with social services. For example, in Ottawa St. Vincent Hospital and the Perley Home come under the Health Department, whereas St. Patrick's Home is under the jurisdiction of the Department of Community and Social Services. Similarly, in Saskatchewan levels of Care 1, 2 and 3 are considered as mainly social needs and therefore come under the Department of Social Services; Levels 4, 5 and 6 have a major health component and as a result are an insured service and come under the Department of Health. The problem is in discharging patients from the health level, which is an insured service, to the social level which is the responsibility of the patient. In January 1973 the Province of Saskatchewan proposed a grant system to ease the financial burden of nursing home care on its residents. The proposed amounts were graded downward from Level III. "This new grant system represents a serious attempt by our Government to place the financing of special-care homes on a rational basis and to provide a solid base for the future development of services for the aged in the years to come."⁽¹⁾

In 1971 the responsibility of administering the British Columbia Community Care Facilities Licensing Act was transferred to the Health Branch. More recently, the Health Branch was given the major responsibility in designing, constructing and probably operating several "personal care" homes. According to 1972 planning, these will provide beds for ambulatory persons who do not require services in an extended-care hospital but who need more care than can be provided in a rest home⁽¹⁾ In December 1972 personal care homes which represent the range of care between extended care and boarding home were not licensed.⁽²⁾ As of December 1972 grants of 35 per cent are made to non-profit societies wishing to construct personal care facilities in British Columbia if there is a local contribution of at least 10 per cent. Such societies must indicate they can operate the new facility without a direct provincial subsidy. To understand more fully the relationship offered by the Health Branch and other services, the Government of British Columbia, late in 1972, commissioned a study entitled "Health Security Research Project".

* Specifically excluded are tuberculosis hospitals and sanatoria, hospitals or institutions for the mentally ill, as well as care institutions such as nursing homes and homes for the aged. The definition of "nursing homes" enters into the assessment at this stage.

A joint study (Alberta Council on Aging and Department of Health and Social Development) of the general needs of institutionalized and non-institutionalized senior citizens across Alberta was scheduled for mid-1973.

The consensus is that approved nursing homes, operated on a non-profit basis, should be included in the federal-provincial hospital insurance arrangements. If this barrier were lifted there should be little difficulty in putting the right patient in the right bed at the right time.

The School of Rehabilitation Medicine at the University of Alberta conducted a study to measure, in Auxiliary hospitals and Nursing Homes, the effects upon patients of intensive, multi-disciplinary rehabilitation (Staff) education and related consultative services.⁽³⁾ Results indicated that Staff attitudes tended to shift to a greater degree of acceptance of patients as individuals. This Staff also demonstrated increased knowledge and skills in rehabilitative nursing.

As of July 1, 1973 personal care homes in Manitoba⁽⁴⁾ came under the provincial hospital insurance scheme. Positive steps have been taken to increase the supply of nursing care facilities:

December 31, 1972	Actual nursing home beds	6,589
December 31, 1973	Projected	6,898
December 31, 1974	Projected	7,316

All areas where there is a demonstrated need for more personal care home beds are benefiting from the program of development of additional facilities.

Manitoba's position is that nursing homes, particularly those providing extended care services, should come under the federal-provincial hospital insurance arrangements.

All nursing homes are licensed and supervised by the Department of Health and Social Development.

Since the introduction of the extended health care program in Ontario⁽⁵⁾ in April 1972, the supply of nursing home beds in this province has increased by approximately 2,000 or 10 per cent of the total available at the time. A further 3,500 beds have been approved for construction and are in either the developmental stage or the construction stage at this time. When these beds become available this will provide roughly 25 per cent more beds than there were in April 1972. This increased supply will be capable of providing a high quality of nursing care and, within the definition of the Insured Extended Health Care Benefit, a reactivation program. The precise role of the proprietary fields, in relationship to the non-profit field, with public support, has yet to be determined by the Government. In the Province of Ontario the extended health care program, which provides benefits in licensed nursing homes, deals almost exclusively with profit-oriented facilities. In the past year and a half the nursing homes have been made part of the hospital system in Ontario with referrals to nursing home accommodation coming primarily from active treatment hospitals. However, the program is not included in the Federal-Provincial Hospital Insurance arrangements. Similar care is also available in charitable and municipal homes for the aged.

Regarding capital financing of nursing homes, it is the view of the Province of Ontario that sufficient mortgage funds are available in the private sector. "Caution is exercised in approving capital grants to non-profit nursing homes so that the taxpayer is not burdened with capital grants which can be found through the private sector."

Under the Extended Health Care program in Ontario operating costs of nursing homes are provided under the hospital insurance program by means of a daily per diem rate which is paid for residents of nursing homes eligible for the extended health care benefits. Some 100 per cent provincial capital grants are made to co-sponsor facilities with municipal and non-profit charitable corporations and these may include Extended Care Services. In such cases there is also eligibility for loans under the National Housing Act. The province does approve capital grants, mainly on the basis of residential services rather than Extended Care Services and this is subject to the general review within the province.

Community colleges are training "health care aides", the majority of whom come from the staff of nursing homes, as well as from municipal and charitable homes for the aged.

Prior to the introduction of the Extended Health Care Program on April 1, 1972 all nursing homes in Ontario were licensed by a health agency and supervised by local health units. This did not allow for standardization. Now the inspection of homes is under direct provincial jurisdiction with inspection staffs located in London, Ottawa and Toronto. In addition to the inspection component, which is comprised of registered nurses, public health inspectors, fire safety inspectors and sanitation personnel, consultation services are offered to the nursing homes in the field of nutrition, administration, finance, as well as consulting services in the fields noted under inspection services.

(5) Ontario, Minister of Community and Social Services. Letter dated November 28, 1973.

Seminars and discussion groups are also held for nursing home staff. In the case of charitable and municipal homes for the aged, consulting is available from Toronto in all areas of care standards; in addition, in-service training and other programs are available from the province in conjunction with the Ontario Association of Homes for the Aged.

New Brunswick⁽¹⁾ engaged consultants to study its hospital facilities in 1969 and has stated its policy: the main objectives in the nursing home program is to ensure that each resident of the province who is in need of care does in fact receive the care required. Regulation 71-73 of the Health Act has greatly improved the number and quality of nursing care facilities in the province. As in other provinces, approved nursing homes, operated on a non-profit basis in the province, are not part of the hospital services system but come under the Social Welfare Act. The Department of Social Services is authorized to provide financial assistance for persons unable to pay for nursing home care. Although construction grants for nursing homes do not come under hospital construction, under Chapter 39, An Act to Amend the Health Act, the Minister may grant to charitable organizations an amount of two thousand dollars per bed toward the cost of new construction of nursing homes. Operating costs are reviewed by the Department of Social Services to determine the rate per day to provide financial assistance. Nursing homes are licensed and supervised by the Provincial Department of Health and consultation services are provided in the field of rehabilitation staffing, dietary and administrative services.

In February 1973 the first report of the Nova Scotia⁽²⁾ Council of Health was released. The Council had been directed to undertake a complete review of the health system in the province.

Among its recommendations was that the province adopt the "progressive care" approach and define levels of care, including active treatment; nursing home care designed for long-term patients; home care designed as a hospital alternative for patients who require regular nursing care and some physician attention; ambulatory care for those who require extended therapy and personal care for those who need support to maintain themselves.

The emphasis is on non-institutional care.⁽³⁾

The implementation of the proposed plan hinges on changes in federal-provincial cost sharing, i.e., sharing to be related to payment for health care to population.

In Prince Edward Island⁽⁴⁾ private nursing homes operate without public financial assistance and are licensed and supervised by the Hospital Services Commission under Regulations passed under the Hospitals Act to ensure suitable standards of accommodation and service. Their services are supplemented by manors operated by the Department of Social Services located in all major urban centres in the province. All private nursing homes and public institutions have Registered Nurse supervision and such ancillary staff as may be needed to meet the requirements for nursing care of the patients therein.

In the Annual Report⁽⁵⁾ for 1973 of the Newfoundland Department of Social Services and Rehabilitation it was reported that sufficient emphasis has not been placed on the urgent need for beds where nursing care can be provided. Approval for the construction of five new Homes for Senior Citizens at Lewisporte, Grand Bank, St. Anthony, Grand Falls, and Stephenville Crossing was granted. Approximately 25 per cent of the bed capacity will be for nursing care.

Recommendation 39

That Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation (CMHC) conduct a sustained educational campaign to make everyone concerned aware of the opportunities, under the NHA as amended, to provide new and converted housing of many varieties for the use of older people and that in such a campaign attention be called to such particulars as:

- (a) The desirability of spreading housing for old people throughout the community and/or incorporating it in housing for other age groups;
- (b) the additional opportunities available under the revised public incomes; and
- (c) the importance, when hostels and other special group living arrangements are being considered for old people able to get about, of selecting a convenient site, ensuring a homelike atmosphere, keeping the size of the project as small as is compatible with economical operation, and of blending it in with the general housing of the area.

ACTION TAKEN

The 1971 CMHC Report Urban Canada: Problems and Prospects⁽⁶⁾ includes a monograph which has particular relevance for policy and program planners concerned with housing the elderly.

Social Development Operations of CMHC, organized in 1970-71 provides the focus for a continuing response to the social needs of the elderly and other occupants of low-income housing. Social Development Officers at the Regional level work closely with community groups, tenant associations and non-profit organizations concerned with low-rental and public housing in an effort to improve the social environment and amenities of federally-financed housing developments.

A broad range of educational material covering every aspect of housing the elderly, from pamphlets and brochures to panel exhibits, film strips and coloured slides, is available on request from CMHC.

Trained professional people are available as speakers at service clubs, etc. about the housing requirements of the elderly.⁽¹⁾

Recommendation 40

That, on the initiative of CMHC, periodic conferences be held on a national and regional basis, made up of people from the variety of public and voluntary bodies concerned with old people's housing but also including architects, developers and builders, for the purpose of sharing experience, of discussing common problems and encouraging new and imaginative developments.

ACTION TAKEN

CMHC regularly provides both funds and personnel for conferences and workshops that have relevance to housing programs for the elderly.

A conference in 1968 organized by the Canadian Welfare Council and financed largely by a grant under the National Housing Act examined the housing situation of all Canadians. Further studies by the Council (now the Canadian Council on Social Development) are also being funded by CMHC.

In 1972 CMHC funded a study undertaken by the Extension Department of the University of British Columbia. This was an action-oriented study which will stimulate discussion between the groups identified in Recommendation No. 40 plus consumers, educators, health and recreation people.

In 1973 a study of CMHC housing for the elderly, built up to the end of 1970, was completed by the Canadian Council on Social Development. It is entitled "Beyond Shelter".⁽²⁾ This study was funded by CMHC, published and distributed by the Canadian Council on Social Development.

The 48 recommendations formulated from the findings covered a variety of topics. The principal objective is that as wide a variety and range of choice of housing as possible should be available to senior citizens. Furthermore, it is recommended that responsibility for housing the elderly be affirmed at the provincial level. Several recommendations also noted particular design suggestions such as a suitable balance of accommodation for both married and single persons.

Sponsors of housing developments have a responsibility for more than simply providing shelter. Recommendations outline the responsibility of sponsors in terms of developing a health program, providing social services, or contacting existing social service agencies, and for developing a recreation program using both their own facilities and those of the community. The need to provide contact with other community groups and organizations was emphasized in several recommendations, as well as the need to obtain resident participation in all aspects of the residential environment.

The remainder of the recommendations dealt with management policies, staff members, finances and the need for further study on the desirability of different types of residential environments for the elderly.

A proposal is being formulated to have CMHC fund a series of regional meetings for the purpose of discussing the findings of the study. The meetings would bring together sponsors, managers, tenants of senior citizen housing as well as those who deliver services beyond the shelter component.⁽³⁾

That CMHC develop plans and specifications for a wide variety of housing arrangements for old people and that the latter include low-cost one-bedroom houses suitable for couples and for two single people living together.

ACTION TAKEN

Professional architects within CMHC have developed plans and specifications for a variety of housing units for the elderly, including bachelor and one-bedroom apartment units, hostel accommodation, back-to-back row housing, motel-type units and relocateable semi-detached units.

In 1972, CMHC published its second edition of Housing the Elderly.⁽⁴⁾ This is an advisory document dealing with desirable standards of housing designed specifically for elderly people who are sufficiently healthy and mobile to live independently in self-contained dwelling units. It is not a mandatory set of rules, but rather suggestions. The Corporation has built one-bedroom houses—mainly in small communities on the Prairies where land is less of a cost factor than in urban areas.

The decision, as to permitting two single people to rent a unit in a low-cost housing project, belongs to provincial and local administrators. In 1973 the Ontario Housing Corporation experimented with this idea in a building going up in Etobicoke—a Toronto suburb.⁽¹⁾ The Dundas Maybelle Housing Development will contain 510 units, 58 of which are buddy units. These buddy units are specifically designed for aged single people. The two single people have individual bed-sitting rooms but they share the kitchen and bathroom facilities. The building is scheduled for completion in December, 1974.⁽²⁾

Recommendation 42

That CMHC develop manuals for use by housing authorities and private sponsoring groups, giving precise information and advice regarding varieties of accommodation needed, housing designs including safety features, site selection, financing, and the procedures to be followed under the limited dividend, non-profit and public housing sections of the NHA.

ACTION TAKEN

CMHC acts in an advisory capacity. Adherence to CMHC specifications, while recommended, is not a requirement. Pamphlets and brochures covering every aspect of accommodation for the elderly are available from CMHC offices across Canada.

Housing the Elderly—1972⁽³⁾ examines the provision of housing in relation to the needs and preferences of the elderly, the aging process, the housing market, type of accommodation available and sponsors for housing for the aged. This brochure also deals with various safety features which contribute to the enjoyment of their homes by the elderly.

Housing the Handicapped will be published by CMHC in 1974. Although an advisory document dealing with desirable standards of housing for physically handicapped persons of all ages, it is also especially useful to those involved in the design and provision of housing for the elderly.⁽⁴⁾

That CMHC appoint to its staff one or more persons with specialized knowledge relating to housing for old people and that their advice and technical assistance be available to housing authorities and other sponsoring groups.

ACTION TAKEN

The advice and assistance of professional CMHC personnel is readily available to organizations and individuals interested in sponsoring housing for the elderly. Social Development officers, appointed 1968-69, focus on the implementation of guidelines and policies to improve the social environment of low-income housing, and have a thorough understanding of the needs of our senior citizens.

At CMHC Head Office an advisory group was formed from people in the Corporation who have considerable involvement with the provision of housing for the elderly. The group includes, architects, planners, economists, appraisers, administrators, policy formulators and those advising on research issues. These people are available both to Head Office and Branch staff as well as to the public.⁽⁵⁾

That a review be made of experience to date in rehousing within the area old people dispossessed by urban renewal schemes and that consideration be given to further measures, such as assistance with the purchase of small homes or rent subsidies for a limited period, which might be taken to ease the impact of the changeover and to assist generally in the process of resettlement.

ACTION TAKEN

In any urban assistance plan, every effort is made to relocate families and individuals in their own neighbourhoods. High density apartment complexes that make the best use of expensive land, are built in core urban areas for the elderly who might otherwise have to be rehoused in an unfamiliar setting. In addition it is a pre-requisite of both the newly introduced (1973) Neighbourhood Improvement Program and the Site Clearance Assistance Program that dwelling units, equal in number to those removed, be provided as part of the rehabilitation program.⁽⁶⁾

Recommendation 45

That insured NHA loans be provided to finance the construction of hostel, dormitory and similar type accommodation for elderly persons who could afford to pay a rent set by the normal operations of the market.

ACTION TAKEN

The National Housing Act was amended in 1969 to include provisions, under Part I of the Act, for insured loans for the construction of hostel and dormitory type accommodation for the elderly who can afford open market rental rates.

By the end of 1970, 7,906 hostel beds had been built under the National Housing Act for senior citizens.⁽¹⁾ Canada as a whole had 4.5 hostel beds (financed under NHA) per thousand population aged 65 at the end of 1970.⁽²⁾ On a provincial basis, Manitoba has built the highest ratio of senior citizen hostel beds under the NHA per thousand aged population, followed by New Brunswick, Saskatchewan, British Columbia, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland, Quebec, Ontario and Alberta.⁽³⁾

The study by the Canadian Council on Social Development also found that there was a wide variation on the emphasis that provinces placed on senior citizens' hostel accommodation as opposed to self-contained dwelling units. New Brunswick concentrated to a greater extent on hostel accommodation than other provinces, followed by Quebec, Saskatchewan, Newfoundland, Alberta, Manitoba, Nova Scotia, British Columbia and Prince Edward Island.⁽⁴⁾

This study also noted that

"Over the years, the National Housing Act provisions have been broadened to allow funding of a large range of hostel accommodation. This accommodation varies widely in and between provinces, ranging from buildings in which the only service provided other than that found in private apartments is a dining-room, to accommodation that is practically identical to that found in a nursing home. This accommodation has been supported at the provincial and local levels by a wide variety of programs, usually administered by social service departments."⁽⁵⁾

That CMHC, in collaboration with DBS, review the present data collected and analyzed on the housing situation of old people with a view to filling the gaps that exist and introducing such changes as seem desirable in the definitions employed and the classifications provided. (Reference has been made earlier to the difficulty at present of correlating incomes and housing).

ACTION TAKEN

CMHC regularly confers and exchanges data and information with a variety of government departments and agencies in an effort to improve the resource material.

A CMHC "Housing Needs Study" was initiated in 1973 and will identify the elderly as a distinct housing consumer group within the total population. Their housing consumption patterns will be examined and analyzed in relation to a variety of characteristics such as, household composition, income, dwelling unit type, cost and condition. This will be a two year study.

Recommendation 47

That CMHC undertake or support, possibly in collaboration with the Department of National Health and Welfare, a major research project to determine the housing needs and preferences of old people, and their evaluation of existing housing opportunities. (The Age and Opportunity Bureau of Winnipeg, among other organizations, stressed the "deplorable" lack of information regarding the housing problems of the elderly.)

ACTION TAKEN

A 1970 study within CMHC made use of data gathered from a number of sources including Statistics Canada and the Department of National Health and Welfare to examine the financial resources and expenditure patterns of the elderly, and their related ability to find accommodation within their means.

In 1971, the CMHC gave a grant of $38,000 to the Canadian Welfare Council (now the Canadian Council on Social Development) for a study of housing arrangements for the aged.⁽⁷⁾ The object was to look at independent and semi-independent accommodation for the aged. This project was completed, and the report entitled Beyond Shelter was published in 1973.⁽⁸⁾

In 1972, CMHC also published a bibliography of Canadian sources in gerontology, and geriatrics from 1964-1972, The Seventh Age.⁽⁹⁾ One of the sections in this bibliography is "Living Arrangements".

State of the Art,⁽¹⁰⁾ a report prepared by Environics Research Group Limited for CMHC, is a brief over-view of services to the elderly in Canada, and the position of each province regarding services for the elderly.

In late spring of 1974 a report of the study "Demographic and Economics Aspects of Housing Canada's Elderly", will be published. The purpose of this study is to systematically analyze on a provincial and municipal basis, the changing concentration of the older population and to examine the changing economic distribution of these groups from 1961 to 1971. All municipalities over 30,000 (81 in total) were examined.

Recommendation 48

- (a) That grants be made to universities and professional schools for special courses, seminars, conferences and other means of training with a view to increasing the supply of workers equipped to deal with both the social and physical aspects of housing for low-income families and for the elderly, and
- (b) That to the same end scholarships be made available to promising students.

ACTION TAKEN

(a) In the past seven years grants under the NHA, totalling several million dollars, have been made to social agencies, planning councils, universities and research institutes for studies, seminars and conferences related to housing and urban affairs in Canada; many of these projects have both direct and indirect application to housing for the aged and have increased the broader knowledge of the subject.

(b) To encourage a professional interest in housing for special groups, CMHC makes available annually a number of travelling scholarships in architecture. Consideration is now being given to broadening the range of scholarships and training schemes.

(c) A grant was given in 1972 to the University of British Columbia Extension Department to undertake an action-oriented study of housing for the elderly.

The study is still in progress, and there are no publications or reports available at this time.⁽¹⁾

Recommendation 50

That housing programs for the elderly be integrated with those for low-income families and made the responsibility of a single department of Government or of a provincial housing agency established by the department for the purpose.

ACTION TAKEN

All Provincial Governments now have branches or agencies responsible for housing. In 1966 only five provinces had agencies to which this responsibility was assigned. In November 1973, the Province of Ontario named its first Minister of Housing. Each province considers housing requirements for the elderly when social housing requirements are being planned. In May 1973 the Province of Alberta amended legislation to provide that 10% of living accommodation space be available for leasing to senior citizens.

Social housing under the National Housing Act is divided into two categories: assistance to the non-profit sector and assistance to public housing agencies.⁽²⁾ Non-profit agencies generally obtain assistance under what is now Section 15 of the National Housing Act. In the period 1946-70 approximately 40% of the funds advanced under this section of the Act were for housing for the elderly. Assistance for the construction of public housing is provided under Sections 40 and 43 of the Act. Included are self-contained units and hostel accommodation for senior citizens although neither is specifically designated for the elderly. In 1970 twenty-one per cent of all developments were in the neighborhoods populated with mostly other elderly people, 75 per cent were in areas that had mostly families with children, 3 per cent were in areas where young adults and childless households were predominant and 1 per cent in areas occupied by transients. Research studies show that 70 per cent of elderly preferred to live in buildings with people of their own age group.⁽³⁾ On the other hand, the Ontario Housing Corporation has found that there is a "clear-cut preference for integrating the elderly with low income families".⁽⁴⁾

Recommendation 52

That it be the responsibility of the provincial department or agency to ascertain and correlate information regarding housing needs and to develop a provincial plan regarding housing needs and to develop a provincial plan calculated to produce within the reasonable time and according to an agreed order of priority the variety of accommodation old people throughout the province require.

ACTION TAKEN

Generally speaking all the provinces coordinate public housing needs and all such requirements are negotiated by the province with CMHC.

The Department of Municipal Affairs in the Province of British Columbia⁽⁵⁾ advised that it was hoped that with reorganization all housing matters, particularly those related to the needs of the elderly, would be concentrated under one operating body or department of government.

The Alberta Housing Corporation⁽⁶⁾ is responsible for all types of housing and has developed a five year plan to provide a variety of accommodation to meet the calculated demand for senior citizens' accommodation. Senior citizens housing is the responsibility of the Department of Municipal Affairs. In 1973 Alberta Housing Authority budgeted $6.6 million for senior citizens' housing which provided for 500 new or renovated units. The guideline provides that 10 per cent of public housing has to be made available to senior citizens.

(2) Public Housing is that built under Sections 40 and 43 of the National Housing Act. In public housing residents' rents are subsidized according to a geared-to-income scale, with Federal, Provincial and sometimes Municipal Government cost-sharing in the subsidies. Non-profit housing is accommodation built with NHA loans under Section 15. Rents in the past were not subsidized but now there are cases where residents' rents are subsidized in non-profit developments.

Saskatchewan Housing Corporation⁽¹⁾ has a task force to investigate the state of housing in the province with a view to building more rent-to-income accommodation in smaller communities.

The Manitoba Housing and Renewal Corporation⁽²⁾ provides housing throughout the province without any municipal financial involvement, i.e., the province puts up the 10 per cent portion of the capital costs usually assumed by the municipality. Continuing surveys are carried out in the rural areas to determine the needs of the elderly.

An advisory task force on housing policy for Ontario⁽³⁾ submitted its report in August 1973. The following is an extract therefrom:

"There is no Minister* with direct responsibility for housing as such, or for policy, planning or implementation with regard to housing, and there is no agency to coordinate, integrate or monitor the many government activities affecting housing. The result is a fragmentation of Provincial and Municipal activities affecting housing.

The Provincial Government exercises its authority to influence and regulate development in the Province; through its control over all local government institutions it exercises responsibility and authority for all matters relating to land use and development, including the assembly and servicing of land, environmental controls, local and regional government, and municipal financial policies. The Province exercises its authority in ways which are often inconsistent with each other, and without explicit concern for making land available for residential use or for influencing the price of residential land.

It is concluded that the organization of the Provincial Government should be directed to the recognition that the Government's housing responsibilities can be discharged satisfactorily only if they are directly acknowledged in the organization of the Government, through the establishment of a Ministry with suitable responsibilities and an adequate level of authority.

Planning

The Province's responsibilities for determining and applying land use policies and programs for planning and development, and for establishing regional governments, do not include the identification and resolution of housing needs in the local or regional municipalities. Although it is Provincial policy that housing be provided only in accordance with approved plans, municipalities are not required or encouraged to formulate housing goals or objectives as part of their Official Plans. Provincial approvals or modifications of municipal Official Plans and zoning by-laws are made without direct reference to their effects on housing in the affected municipality."

In the case of Quebec,⁽⁴⁾ CMHC makes an annual allocation of funds to the Quebec Housing Corporation for building accommodation for families and senior citizens. All senior citizens' housing developments built with Quebec Housing Corporation Assistance have been categorized as "non-profit" as they are administered by non-profit groups.

The New Brunswick Housing Corporation⁽⁵⁾ has responsibility for planning and coordination. In addition, the province has a Committee on Care for the Aged and a Task Force on Housing Needs.

The Nova Scotia Housing Commission⁽⁶⁾ through its planning division has drawn up a long range estimate of housing needs and for the past two years has adhered to this program.

The Prince Edward Island Housing Authority⁽⁷⁾ collects data on housing needs for the elderly for formulation and implementation to fulfil these needs. An Island-wide study is being organized.

The Newfoundland and Labrador Housing Corporation⁽⁸⁾ is beginning to plan for housing needs for the elderly. In the past it was found that the demand was more for institutional care.

Recommendation 53

That it further be the responsibility of the provincial department or agency to negotiate with CMHC on its own behalf and that of municipalities and interested voluntary organizations regarding the size and nature of NHA assistance required.

ACTION TAKEN

A responsibility of the Housing Authority for each province is to negotiate with CMHC to obtain financing for the housing requirements of the province and municipalities. In the case of Quebec, CMHC makes an annual allocation of funds to the Quebec Housing Corporation for building accommodation for families and senior citizens. All senior citizens' housing developments built with Quebec Housing Corporation assistance have been categorized as "non-profit" as they are administered by non-profit groups. The Federal-Provincial Housing Review Committee of Saskatchewan provides for monthly discussion of requirements.

Recommendation 54

That the provincial department or agency appoint the necessary staff members equipped to assist the municipalities and voluntary organizations in the determination of need and the development and implementation of housing programs.

ACTION TAKEN

With the exception of New Brunswick and Newfoundland which have no special staff assigned for this purpose, the other provinces feel that they have implemented this recommendation either through the provincial planning staff or regional offices. For example, Prince Edward Island Housing Officers travel throughout the Island giving assistance to communities in need of housing accommodation for their senior citizens. Nova Scotia, in addition to its planning staff at its provincial head office, has four regional offices staffed by field representatives and construction supervisors who keep in contact with the municipalities and assist in the implementation of housing programs.

Ontario at the present time has some 39 local housing authorities. In areas where there are housing developments under the auspices of the Ontario Housing Corporation there are resident managers, representatives of the Corporation. In the event that a municipality is just initiating a housing program, the local Council communicates with the Ontario Housing Corporation who undertakes the survey and lends the necessary technical assistance and advice.

Recommendation 55

That, in particular, funds and grants be provided in such amounts as to reduce to no more than token payments the capital funds required by voluntary organizations to qualify for loans under the limited dividend section of the act.

ACTION TAKEN

The National Housing Act was amended in 1969 to provide a broader framework for the provision of loans covering up to 95 per cent of lending value to both non-profit organizations and private entrepreneurs interested in the construction of housing for the elderly. In 1973 the Act was further amended to provide loans to private and municipally-owned non-profit organizations to cover up to 100 per cent of lending value plus a CMHC contribution of up to 10 per cent of cost for application against loan repayment and, in the case of private organization, a grant of up to $10,000 for use as "starter funds" to bring the organization to the point where it can apply for a loan.⁽¹⁾

Recommendation 57

That the provincial department or agency establish and enforce strict regulations concerning the design, siting and general operations of private homes or institutions offering individual or group living accommodation, short of medical care, to elderly people.

ACTION TAKEN

Organizations sponsoring low-rental housing for the elderly adhere to provincial standards and to those of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation if financed by that corporation. In the case of private homes, the legislation governing their operations usually comes under the Department of Social Services, Community Services or Health and Welfare, or the Welfare Homes Act as in the case of Alberta. Provincial standards are applicable in all cases.

Recommendation 58

That, as at the provincial level, housing for the aged be entrusted to the municipal department or agency which is also responsible for low rental housing in general and that a committee of representative citizens be established to assist the department in an advisory capacity.

ACTION TAKEN

Many communities are too small in population and economic base to undertake subsidized housing for senior citizens. Because of this provinces such as Newfoundland, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island⁽²⁾ operate with a provincial organization depending on advice from its board of directors and Housing Authority members some of whom are private citizens. In the case of Nova Scotia⁽³⁾ recommendations on future needs are the responsibility of the municipal housing authorities composed of local residents. Quebec⁽⁴⁾ has its regional health and social service councils which encourage areas to define their needs and plan for them. Ontario⁽⁵⁾ has 39 area Housing Authorities who submit their requirements for low rent housing to the Ontario Housing Corporation. The Manitoba⁽⁶⁾

Housing and Renewal Corporation has no committee of knowledgeable citizens to advise the Minister responsible for housing but consider the Winnipeg Age and Opportunity Bureau and Manitoba Public Housing Work Shop as adequate forums for the presentation and discussion of housing requirements for both families and senior citizens. In rural areas of Manitoba there are housing authorities consisting of at least six members of whom two must be tenants which assures complete involvement. The Saskatchewan Housing Corporation Act, 1973,⁽¹⁾ may incorporate public housing authorities which report to the Corporation. Alberta⁽²⁾ has set up some fifty-four foundations to administer senior citizens' housing. The boards of directors of the foundations are elected members of the municipal councils and are responsible to the electorate. The foundations determine the housing needs within their administrative areas. British Columbia housing legislation is under review. According to the study carried out by the Social Planning and Review Council of British Columbia⁽³⁾ (December 1972) the first official contact for the citizen impetus committee on housing for senior citizens in the Community Care Facilities Board through the local Medical Health Officer. The impetus committee forms a non-profit society and incorporates and then gets in touch with CMHC and the Provincial Secretary.

Recommendation 82

- (a) That homemaker service be accepted as a shareable cost under the Canada Assistance Plan.
- (b) That homemaker service be accepted as a shareable cost under the Canada Assistance Plan not only for persons on public assistance but for all others to whom this service is provided free by the provinces and their municipalities.

ACTION TAKEN

Provincial and municipal governments underwrite the costs of providing homemaker service to recipients of social assistance but the maximum daily rate they are prepared to contribute may fall short of the full cost of the service to the homemaker agency. The province is reimbursed 50 per cent of these costs by the Federal Government under the Canada Assistance Plan. The legislation also permits federal sharing of the costs of subsidizing persons other than those on assistance whose incomes are insufficient for them to pay the prescribed fee; provinces and municipalities differ widely in the extent to which they have chosen to make this assistance available to low-income families. The maximum family income below which public welfare departments are prepared to subsidize fees depends on the province in which the applicant happens to reside.⁽⁴⁾

In British Columbia these services receive small provincial grants and local support, but must rely on fees from clients, thus, frequently, making the service beyond the means of older people.⁽⁵⁾

Homemaker services in Alberta⁽⁶⁾ are supported through the Preventive Social Services Act which may also cover payments not eligible for federal cost-sharing under the Canada Assistance Plan. Establishment of the eligibility of projects for provincial-municipal cost-sharing is based on approval of budget figures provided by the municipality, together with an agreement to provide the service on a sliding scale of fees. The net deficit of such projects is shared up to 80 per cent by the province, the remaining 20 per cent is paid by the municipality.

In Saskatchewan,⁽⁷⁾ funds for purchase of homemaker service, based on financial need, are available through the Saskatchewan Assistance Plan.

Extensive homemaker services are provided in Manitoba⁽⁸⁾ under the Social Allowance Act and the Child Welfare Act, as amended 1966. For families or aged persons eligible for a social allowance, payment is made for homemaker service during illness or other emergency as required.

In Ontario⁽⁹⁾ the breakdown of sharing is 20 per cent for the regional government, 30 per cent for the provinces and 50 per cent for the Federal Government. The fee paid by the recipient depends on his income and the state of the budget of the municipality. Lower income persons pay a nominal rate, while the mid-income group pay more although that group receives some assistance through the United Way Fund. Upper income brackets pay the full cost. The service operates under the Ontario Nursing and Homemakers' Services Act and is regarded as permissive legislation as the cost of the service to the recipient varies according to the budget of the municipality.

Under the Quebec⁽¹⁰⁾ Public Charities Act, assistance is given for the provision of visiting homemaker services. The homemaker service program is administered by voluntary agencies recognized by the province. Under the legislation, the full cost of the service to needy persons is paid by the Department of Social Affairs.

Financial aid for homemaker services is available in Nova Scotia⁽¹¹⁾ under the Social Assistance Act. When municipal budgets include estimates for funds to provide homemaker services and the budget is approved by the Department of Public Welfare, these funds are available to municipalities up to an approved amount.

Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick⁽¹⁾ have no provisions specifically for homemaker service under their social legislation but do use the Canada Assistance Plan to share costs with the Federal Government on a 50/50 basis when housekeeper service is provided to families in financial needs.

The Social Assistance Regulations of the Department of Public Welfare for Newfoundland and Labrador⁽²⁾ provide for the payment of a housekeeper allowance to recipients of social assistance who require this service.

Recommendation 83

That counselling services provided by the local public welfare department for the elderly and others in the community be accepted as a shareable cost under the Canada Assistance Plan.

ACTION TAKEN

Counselling services are covered under the Canada Assistance Plan and the funding of these services to municipalities depends on the individual province and the municipality.

Health and Welfare Canada published a pamphlet Your Agency and the Canada Assistance Plan⁽³⁾ which describes the funding available to agencies.

(2) RECOMMENDATIONS THAT ARE PARTIALLY IMPLEMENTED

Recommendation 2

The Committee recommends that the National Employment Service (NES) continue and intensify its efforts to correct prevailing misconceptions and to overcome current resistance to the hiring of older workers through educational programs aimed at employers as a group, but more particularly through direct contacts with individual employers; and that in such efforts it enlist the support of management and labour, possibly through the holding of employer-labour institutes sponsored by universities and community groups, as is done in the United States with leadership from the employment service.

ACTION TAKEN

In 1937 the "National Employment Service" offices were renamed "Canada Manpower Centres" to reflect the emphasis on counselling, training, labour force mobility, skill up-grading etc. In 1972-73 there were 390 Canada Manpower Centres where counsellors assist workers and provide consultative services relative to changed conditions of work. Employment was found for 1,030,148 people during 1972-73. This is an increase of twelve per cent over the previous year⁽⁴⁾.

The Canada Manpower Adjustment Program functions as a catalyst to bring management and labour together to solve employment problems created by economic, technological or organizational changes in a company, an industry or an area.

The current philosophy of the Older Workers' Section is that working should be ageless, that is, the emphasis should be on skill not age. During 1973 staff members of the Older Workers' Section, the Canada Manpower Division of the Department of Manpower and Immigration, interviewed older workers across Canada to identify difficulties and to learn more about the conditions affecting older workers. The results of this internal fact-finding survey will be used by the section to determine a policy statement. The Older Workers' Section encounters some difficulties in meeting with employers because of the variation in labour legislation among the provinces. Pending a study of the facts obtained in this survey, no funds have been allotted to cover the expenses associated with conferences or seminars.

The Labour Gazette, published by Labour Canada contains information for employers about recent studies and conferences on older workers. Projects on older workers conducted by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) of which Canada is a member, as well as American research studies are regularly reviewed.

In June 1970 the Age Discrimination Division of the Ontario Human Rights Commission sponsored a conference entitled, "The Older Worker in Today's Economy and Community".⁽⁵⁾

Recommendation 4

The Committee recommends that the NES maintain a check on applicant qualifications as specified by employers, such as age and education, in an effort to ensure that these are realistically related to the requirements for successful performance in the jobs to be filled.

ACTION TAKEN

In five provinces the prohibition against discrimination has been extended to include age. The Individual's Rights Protection Act of Alberta 1972,⁽⁶⁾ The Human Rights Act of British Columbia 1969,⁽⁷⁾ The Human Rights Code of New Brunswick Amended 1973,⁽¹⁾ The Human Rights Code of Newfoundland 1969,⁽²⁾ and The Human Rights Code of Ontario Amended 1972⁽³⁾ provide that no employer shall refuse to employ or refuse to continue to employ or otherwise discriminate in employment because of age. These provisions are applicable to persons between the ages of 45 and 65 in Alberta, British Columbia and Newfoundland. The New Brunswick Code defines "age" as 19 years of age and over. In Ontario, a reference to age means any age of 40 years or more and less than 65 years. Trade unions shall not exclude from membership, expel or suspend a person in these age groups. An employer may not publish an advertisement in connection with employment which expresses directly or indirectly any limitation, preference or discrimination in employment because of age. These provisions do not apply to the operation of a bona fide retirement or insurance plan.

The Canadian Labour Code does not mention discrimination on the basis of age. Employers must not discriminate on the basis of race, national origin, colour or religion.⁽⁴⁾

The policy of the Department of Manpower which is governed by the Unemployment Insurance Act is to refer to the prospective employer the best qualified people available irrespective of age.

Recommendation 5

- (a) The Committee recommends that studies be made by the Federal Department of Labour of experience with gradual retirement programs now in effect in private business and the public service and that the findings of these studies be used to stimulate wider interest in such programs on the part of management and labour.
- (b) That programs of counselling and planning in preparation for retirement be more widely adopted by private business and the public service, and that Federal and Provincial Departments of Labour provide to interested employers and unions the technical consultation necessary for their successful operation.

ACTION TAKEN

(a) There are very few gradual retirement programs in industry and there is no Federal policy relating to employees in the Public Service. No department has been charged with responsibility for studies.

(b) The Federal Government has issued no policy statement on this subject and no department of government has been given an mandate to assist with programs or provide counselling.

Some departments of the Federal Government sponsor retirement programs both at headquarters and in their districts. The Department of Indian and Northern Affairs collaborates with the universities in Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia to provide employees with programs on retirement. There are at least four Government departments active in this field—Indian and Northern Affairs Department, Public Works Department, Statistics Canada and Supply and Services Canada.⁽⁵⁾

Paramount Retirement Counselling,⁽⁶⁾ Montreal, is unique in Canada. This agency began operations mid 1972 and by the end of 1973 had contracts with eight provinces to provide information on pre-retirement as well as post-retirement planning. The agency has some 20 booklets for distribution, one being produced each quarter of the year. In addition there are newsletters suitable for insertion with pension cheques. Research is conducted on a contract basis on various subjects such as nutrition, dental care, leisure activities, etc.

Maurice Miron,⁽³⁾ program director for aging of the Canadian Council of Social Development said he knows of no company in Canada with its own pre-retirement program. But it is not all the fault of management he added. The Northern Electric Company had such a program but abandoned it when workers made it plain they did not want to hear about retirement, even on company time.

The Alberta⁽⁴⁾ Department of Manpower and Labour has instituted a study which will more specifically identify the preparation needs with regard to retirement. This is a three year study and it is being carried out in co-operation with several departments of the Alberta Government, private industry and several retired citizens. It is intended that the results of this study will provide the department and other provincial agencies with the necessary information to plan programs of employer and union consultation as well as support programs in the area of retirement preparation.

The Extension Department of the University of Saskatchewan, Regina has formulated a course entitled "Preparation for Retirement" which is supported by the Saskatchewan⁽⁵⁾ Department of Labour. In addition to supplying resource material for use in teaching of the course, various officials of the Department of Labour (e.g. Superintendent of Pension Plans) are available to assist with the discussion of various topics covered by the course material.

The Manitoba⁽⁶⁾ Department of Labour has not acted in any formal way upon the recommendations, but some assistance is given to individuals who contact the department directly. The Age and Opportunity Bureau in Winnipeg assists in this area.

The Ontario⁽¹⁾ Ministry of Labour does not provide programmes of counselling and planning in preparation for retirement or offer the technical consultation necessary to interested employers or unions. An in-house Pre-Retirement Counselling Program has been implemented in this Ministry and the initial result indicated that it is an effective method of dealing retirement problems.

The Senior Citizens Bureau, Ministry of Community and Social Services is the agency of the Ontario Government with the chief responsibility for dealing with problems of aging. The Senior Citizens Bureau offers both counselling and technical consultation to an individual, employer, employee or union approaching the Bureau and asking for advice. Printed resources, in the form of pamphlets and other publications, are also available to the public

The Nova Scotia⁽²⁾ Department of Labour does not administer legislation pertaining to retirement plans. Conciliation and Mediation Officers of the Department will assist labour and management during the drafting of a new or renewal of a collective agreement. The Prince Edward Island⁽³⁾ Department of Labour has not taken any action since it is felt that the problem is virtually non-existent in that province.

The New Brunswick⁽⁴⁾ Department of Labour has been assigned the responsibility of responding to the specific problem of pre-retirement training and preparation. Accordingly, a program has been started to carry out the general duties of counselling and planning. The first project is near completion and will result in a two-day seminar May 4 and 5, 1974 in Memramcook, New Brunswick, for members of all CUPE locals in the Province between 62 and 65 years of age. Departmental staff and a committee of CUPE have organized the seminar. Representatives from all agencies federal and provincial, who have identifiable programs affecting retirement have been invited to attend and explain the functions and services of their respective agencies.

In a recent survey of Family Life Education programs⁽⁵⁾ sponsored by community agencies and voluntary associations in Canada, pre-retirement programs were conducted in larger metropolitan areas. The Victoria Citizens Counselling Centre of Victoria, British Columbia reported programs of this type. The Jewish Family Service of Baron de Hirsch Institute of Montreal also conducted pre-retirement programs as well as The Centre de services sociaux of Trois-Rivières, Quebec.

Recommendation 8

That the NES strengthen and improve its services to older workers in respect of counselling and job finding and that in larger centres a special officer be appointed to carry these responsibilities.

ACTION TAKEN

Manpower Counsellors are trained to service all age categories on the basis of individual need. "By this means it is hoped to make a broader range of opportunities available to all and avoid labelling individuals as 'old', 'disadvantaged', etc."⁽¹⁾

Canada Manpower has implemented a new Manpower Delivery System which will apply services and programs in a more effective and comprehensive way. The concept is to provide three levels of service tailored to the individual client's needs. The first level is assistance to make the client job ready and features the use of self-help methods. The key to this process is a Job Information Centre where job vacancies will be displayed enabling clients to decide themselves which jobs they think they can fill. Level I service to clients will also include an Employment Opportunity Library which will contain information on the services and programs of the department as well as appropriate information on the services and programs of other government departments and agencies; and other assistance which can be provided without formal counselling.

Level II is similar to the service now provided, but in the future will be specifically directed to those people who, while basically job ready, require additional counselling and help. This could involve training or retraining through the Canada Manpower Training Program, assistance in finding employment in another area and in moving to that area through their clearance system and the Canada Manpower Mobility Program, or other of our services to gain employment.

Level III consists of concentrated in-depth counselling and the application of programs and services designed to help those clients most in need. Counsellors may also utilize outside agencies for special assistance to help remove whatever barriers exist in order to make the client job ready. Once this is done, these clients may be referred to a job, or may make job selections as in Level I.⁽²⁾

That periodic health appraisals be more widely available to older people from physicians in solo and group practice and also on an experimental basis in outpatient departments and through programs initiated by local health departments: and further that the cost of such appraisals be covered by prepayment plans.

ACTION TAKEN

The Medical Care Act of 1966-67, Chapter M-8 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, authorized payment by Canada toward the cost of insured medical care services incurred by provinces pursuant to provincial medical care insurance plans. All the provinces participate in this scheme, either on a prepayment basis or, in some cases, without charge to residents.

A Background Study prepared for the Science Council of Canada, August 1973, reports that there has been a definite trend in the direction of group practice to service all age groups which should become more prominent as the advantages, such as efficiency and ability to provide continuing and more complete service to the patients and continuing education to the doctor, become more evident. Group clinic practice is well established notably in the West but many problems remain of which two are of the greatest importance:

"those having to do with distribution, for the sitting of these group clinics is dictated by economic factors not necessarily related to the need for service; and those respecting the provision of comprehensive care. So long as the only source of income is payment for specific medical services rendered to patients, a clinic will not be able to offer in sufficient quantity the auxiliary services (social, welfare, preventive) so necessary for the provision of comprehensive care in many, particularly urban, districts."⁽¹⁾

The Manitoba Health Service Commission⁽²⁾ has undertaken a study, supported by a 1972 National Health and Welfare Grant, to test the hypothesis that efficiency in the delivery of health services is increased by the formation of group practices in the light of proposed ambulatory care facilities.

There is no closed form of group practice in Canada similar to those in the U.S. where medical help is available on a contract basis with a group. Medicare in Canada makes it possible to seek care on a private basis. If there is a group practice such as that at the Sault Ste. Marie Health Centre⁽³⁾ the province pays a set fee per member per month to cover all the medical care needs of its members.

The Saskatchewan Regional Health Services Branch promotes the principles of positive health, providing preventive health services and coordinating the work of health agencies, public, private and voluntary.⁽⁴⁾ Alberta⁽⁵⁾ has 25 health units besides those in the cities of Calgary and Edmonton Health Departments providing preventive public health services to almost the entire population of Alberta.

At the present time an annual health examination is a benefit of the Ontario⁽¹⁾ Health Insurance Plan. However, the conclusion of the task force of the Ontario Council of Health was "that periodic health examinations for planning purposes be restricted to the following: (a) during the first five years of life there should be approximately seven routine health examinations to be programmed at the discretion of the physician; (b) between the ages of 5 and 44, routine examinations should be carried out approximately every ten years, e.g., at the ages 14, 24, 34 and 44 and (c) beyond age 44, examinations should be carried out every five years, e.g., at ages 49, 54, 59, 64, 69 and 74."

Recommendation 13

That more experiments be undertaken with multiple screening for chronic diseases, not only by physicians in dealing with their patients, and by health institutions when patients are admitted, but on a broader community basis by local health departments and/or voluntary health organizations.

Multi-phasic screening is still regarded to be in the experimental stage. Multi-phasic screening was pioneered by the Kaiser-Permanente group, Oakland, California in the 1950s and computerized in 1964.

"Critics of the multi-phasic test, in general, claim that much of the testing is in vain, that it detects very few abnormalities that would not be detected in any event, and that getting abnormalities early has little affect upon the outcome of most diseases; but simply consumes more physician time with worried people. The Kaiser-Permanente people readily admit that they have no scientific answer for such a charge and that the effectiveness of the system is open to challenge. However, they continue to process some 2000 per month."⁽²⁾

A number of specific screening programs are being carried on in Canada. These cover various populations for different conditions, for example, for psychological, mental and visual problems, metabolic abnormalities, genetic hearing defects, cardiovascular faults, cancer, etc. Of these only eight are primarily concerned with the Screening clinics for specific diseases such as glaucoma, are open to various age groups in the provinces. Most provinces commented about the need to establish the value of multi-phasic screening for chronic diseases before undertaking such an expensive service.

Recommendation 14

That health counselling of people middle-aged and older, including matters as diet, rest, recreation and living habits be provided through well adult clinics, day care centres, health services in housing projects, pre-retirement courses and health maintenance programs generally; and that initiative in establishing such programs and facilities be taken by the local health department.

ACTION TAKEN

The survey conducted by the Canadian Council on Social Development and reported in Beyond Shelter shows that social work counselling was available on site or as a special development service in 6.1 per cent of all developments; in or for the general community in 44.5 per cent and not available in 49.4 per cent. Medical check-up was available in 11.1 per cent on site or as a special development service; 8.0 per cent in the community and not available in 80.9 per cent of the cases studied.⁽³⁾

The Report goes on to state that "except in hostel and mixed developments (particularly those that contained a high proportion of very old and incapacitated residents) sponsors generally left health services to private physicians and nursing agencies. They did not concern themselves with the prevention of health problems; rather they restricted their role to ensuring that residents received treatment in emergency situations. For example, only 19 per cent of developments reported that their residents had a regular medical checkup service available."⁽⁴⁾

At the University of Ottawa Medical School researchers are using a $38,000 grant to see how well a public health nurse promotes and maintains the health of senior citizens in seven publicly-run apartment complexes.⁽⁵⁾ This is a three-year project that will be completed in 1975. Through the use of control and experimental groups, the study will measure the effects of public health nursing on the health of senior citizens. The health of the senior citizens is measured in terms of their functional ability using a morale scale which measures psychological well-being and an index of independence which measures ability to do self care activities such as bathing and dressing and instrumental activities such as shopping, cleaning.

Dr. Gustave Gingras, world-renowned specialist in rehabilitation medicine and President of the Canadian Medical Association, in a talk on the medical plight of Canada's elderly, expressed his disappointment by the lack of any day hospital or day-care programs for the elderly. "There is much talk of keeping people out of institutions, yet while the talk goes on the emphasis remains on placement in institutions."⁽⁶⁾ Some Day Care Centres are available in the larger cities, e.g. Greater Vancouver which takes in almost 50 per cent of the total British Columbia population, has a Day Care Centre Project and the North Shore Day Care Centre, developed under a LIP grant, has established a need for such a service in that area.⁽⁷⁾

The Community Care Services (Metropolitan Toronto) Incorporated⁽⁸⁾ was issued a Charter by Letter Patent on December 13, 1971 with the following objectives.

- A. To enable aged, handicapped, chronically ill and convalescent persons to remain in familiar settings and retain involvement with their neighbourhood by:
 - (i) the daily provision of a well-balanced meal;
 - (ii) relieving some of their isolation and loneliness through friendly visits, group participation in social and recreational events and formal programs, and such social care services as day camps, shopping, escort services, telephone chains, transportation, learning opportunities for employment and volunteer services and other such similar activities;

- (iii) offering counselling and advisory services and other types of assistance peculiar to our individual agencies.

B. To encourage the development of similar dietary, social and community health services where they do not exist.

C. To operate such enabling services for the aged as are provided for under the Elderly Persons Centres Act, 1966 and Regulations, as amended from time to time, and to cooperate with others who provide services provided under such acts of the Provincial and Federal Governments as are compatible with the objectives of the organization.

In 1971 a Health Research grant was given to Deer Lodge Hospital, Winnipeg,⁽¹⁾ to determine the feasibility of having a voluntary agency, such as the VON, supervise a hospital-based activity and therapeutic program in a Day Hospital for the elderly.

The Annual Report of the Department of Social Services, Government of Saskatchewan,⁽²⁾ 1971-72 lists an expenditure of some $60,000 in grants to community services for the aged; these include two Day Centres and two Senior Care Centres. A Day Care Hospital was recently approved for Edmonton. Ottawa has just opened a day care centre for the elderly. The main deterrent to the operation of such centres is the lack of transportation.

The Victorian Order of Nurses,⁽³⁾ working with municipal health departments, provides health counselling to Senior Citizens Organizations on a group and individual basis. Good nutrition is an important element of a health program and has always been a concern of VON branches. Six branches now coordinate and administer Meals on Wheels programs, providing meals to some 3,000 recipients. An evaluation of this service is being made in the Richmond-Vancouver Branch to determine if the function should be broadened. Meals on Wheels programs are, for the most part, operated by voluntary organizations which leads to fragmentation and lack of continuity, depending on the voluntary help. The Annual Report for 1971-72 mentions counselling service for senior citizens only in connection with the Windsor-Essex County and Peel Branches.

The Ontario Ministry of Community and Social Services⁽⁴⁾ is particularly interested in sponsoring pre-retirement courses and in 1972 issued a brochure "Retirement and Preparation for Retirement"—a Selected Bibliography and Sourcebook. An Ontario Government survey showed that those between 45-65 are not interested in concrete plans for retirement. Slightly more than half of those surveyed had plans for the use of leisure; fewer than half had considered health or exercise programs, although 89 per cent had financial plans. The survey also showed that only 10 per cent of workers from 15 urban areas in Ontario intended to enrol in retirement planning courses and 43 per cent did not know that such courses existed. Pre-retirement courses are offered in most large urban areas as night-school options.

Recommendation 16

That research be undertaken into the effects of regular exercise, various types of organized recreation, and other forms of group and individual activity on the physical and mental health of older people, and that grants under the Fitness and Amateur Sports Act be made available for this purpose.

ACTION TAKEN

In 1971 the Fitness and Amateur Sports Branch convened a conference in Ottawa to state national goals, to define clear objectives and to enumerate priorities for research in recreation. On this basis research grants-in-aid programs are structured. Programs are aimed at the Canadian people as a whole rather than any specific age group. Again in December 1972 the National Conference on Fitness and Health recommended:

Recommendation 21⁽¹⁾

It is recommended that the Federal Government make available funds to support pilot training programs in physical recreation for the aged and handicapped.

The conference recommends more specifically that:

- television exercise programs for the aged be established;

- the Federal Government explore the possibility of establishing scholarships in cooperation with the provinces to provide the opportunity for study of physical recreation programs for the aged and disabled.

The National Advisory Council on Fitness and Amateur Sport will issue a publication in the near future describing to what extent each recommendation has been implemented. As of April 1, 1974 the Research and Planning section of the Fitness and Amateur Sport Branch provides grants for research in the area of physical fitness. Individuals or groups who wish to conduct research in the area of fitness and aging can submit proposals to this section.

The Fitness and Amateur Sport Branch does not work actively in programming, but rather it acts as a consultant to other groups. Future plans include a booklet on physical activities for the aging, a film and a videotape for leaders of fitness classes.

The Department of Community and Social Services of Ontario is tentatively planning a conference on Fitness and Aging for the Fall of 1974. The Fitness and Amateur Sport Branch hopes that this will serve as a model for other provinces.

Recommendation 17

- (a) That Home Care programs for elderly people be greatly extended for those who are discharged early from hospital or who would otherwise require to be admitted; and
- (b) That these programs include medical and nursing care, physiotherapy and other forms of rehabilitation, visiting homemaker service and use of sick room equipment; and
- (c) That the cost of such programs be provided for under the Hospital Insurance Diagnostic Service Act, through Health Grants or under a more comprehensive Health Plan.

ACTION TAKEN

As the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act and the Medical Care Act (effective July 1, 1968) extend services to virtually all Canadians, the voluntary organizations are enabled to concentrate their services in areas complementary to medical rehabilitation e.g. psychological assessment, sheltered workshops, or to continue to provide medical rehabilitation service in the home and the community on a fee-for-service basis, purchased by the provincial or local governments aided by federal-provincial cost-sharing programs. Organized Home Care programs may mobilize the resources of a number of voluntary agencies and provide coordinated rehabilitation services to include medical and nursing care, physiotherapy, patient aides and related services to the patients who can undergo a phase of rehabilitation in their own homes.

The British Columbia⁽¹⁾ Hospital Insurance Service Level 8—Home Care—includes a range of services and programs which enable an individual to maintain and remain in his own home. The basic philosophy is to maintain the individual's maximum capacity to function independently and to prevent or delay hospitalization.

There are three pilot Home Care projects in the province: Simon Fraser Health Unit, Coquitlam; South Central Health Unit in Kamloops; and Greater Victoria. These three projects will provide valuable information regarding costs and staff requirements. However, the focus is on home care as a basis for earlier hospital discharge, not a continuing service nor an alternate to hospital admission. These projects were developed as a result of concern over the high cost of hospital care rather than from a concern for home care as a preferable alternative.

The Department of National Health and Welfare, through its Medical Services, provides a community service to Indian people throughout the province. The Pacific Region is divided into four zones—South Mainland (Vancouver office) Vancouver Island (Victoria), North East Zone (Prince George) and North West Zone (Prince Rupert). Each zone has approximately seven health unit offices with public health nurses who provide a health care program including home nursing and supervision to registered Band Indians. There may be some overlapping of services with the provincial health units.

The Province of Alberta⁽²⁾ as of 1971 had not set up an overall program for home care, probably because it has been able to provide a high level of acute hospital care, nursing home care and care in senior citizens' lodges. However, the Victorian Order of Nurses does provide home care in Calgary as a pilot project and a small number of home visits are made by public health nursing staff throughout the province. The Home Care program for Edmonton was scheduled for 1973 but would not seem to have materialized.

The first formal Home Care program in Saskatchewan⁽³⁾ was developed in 1959 by the department of rehabilitation medicine at University Hospital, Saskatoon. Starting with just 10 patients with neurological disabilities, the program in 1971 had an annual caseload of nearly 400 patients referred from all four hospitals in the city and from the community at large. Since March 1971 each hospital is responsible for services and supplies for its own discharged patients and for patients who would ordinarily be admitted to that hospital, while a full-time coordinator works with all hospitals. The average age of patients treated in the Saskatoon program in 1971 was 61. The province participates with University Hospital in financing the home care plan. Within each region of the province, teams of psychiatrists, social workers and community nurses are responsible for clinic and domiciliary services for out-patients living in their own foster homes. Home Care programs are active in Moose Jaw, Prince Albert, Saskatoon and Regina, in the last mentioned the VON operates the program. In 1972, 52 per cent of those receiving home care were over 65. Home Care is not an insured health service in Saskatchewan. Some programs are financed by health grants and others are an extension of regional health services.

In Manitoba⁽¹⁾ Home Care programs have been in operation in all Winnipeg hospitals for several years but only for selected patients who were being discharged from hospital. Care Services branch of the Department of Health and Social Development have also operated a Home Care program for their clients. The nursing care in both these programs is given by VON staff. Home Care programs were being established for rural Manitoba as of July 1, 1973.

Ontario's⁽²⁾ local Home Care programs are available to 99 per cent of the population of the province with no specific age limitation. It is not regarded as a substitute for chronic hospital care or accommodation in nursing homes or homes for the aged. Therefore at the present time, it does not include patients whose needs are for maintenance or indefinite support services, categories which include a predominance of aged persons.

Quebec⁽³⁾ Home Care programs serve 75 per cent of the population. All Home Care programs in the province are members of l'Association des Services de Soin à Domicile de la Province de Québec which was formed in 1968. Most of these services are hospital-based. The VON operate two Home Care programs in Hull and Montreal funded by the Provincial Government.

A Home Care program was established as pilot projects in three areas in New Brunswick⁽⁴⁾ in 1972. In 1973 the program was under study for expansion to other areas and for the possible coverage of drugs and other supplies.

Nova Scotia⁽⁵⁾ has no Home Care program as yet. The Nova Scotia Council of Health first report (February 1973) emphasized the need for a well-organized and effective Home Care program.

A Home Nursing Care program has been introduced in Prince Edward Island⁽⁶⁾ and will eventually cover the Island. It is under the direction of the Division of Public Health Nursing of the Department of Health, and involves registered nursing care and consulting physio-therapist services. The entire cost is borne by the Department of Health with no charge being made to the patient.

Hospital based Home Care programs has been established in Grand Falls and in St. John's, Newfoundland.⁽⁷⁾ The program was only initiated in the Fall of 1972.

In February 1970 a Federal Government grant was given to Deer Lodge Hospital, Winnipeg, to study the role of day hospitals in Home Care programs for the elderly and to demonstrate the feasibility of having a voluntary agency such as the VON supervise a hospital-based activity and therapeutic program in a day hospital.

The Department of National Health and Welfare funded under the Grants Welfare program a study of Visiting Homemaker Services in Canada under the auspices of the Canadian Council on Social Development (formerly known as the Canadian Welfare Council). Their report was released in 1971,⁽¹⁾ based on data collected in 1968-69.

The Report contains the following:

"The Canada Assistance Plan, enacted in 1966, made federal financial assistance available for homemaker services and has stimulated the further growth of the service as evident in the 29 new services reported to have been established in the period 1965-69. In addition, many of the thirty agencies on which information was not available either through the original sample interviews or the mailed questionnaire are known to have been established during this period."

"Scope of Homemaker Services" includes:

"In the care of the aged, chronically ill or disabled who need continuing part-time assistance on a long-term basis in order to remain in their homes. Although until now homemaker service in Canada and indeed in other countries, has mainly been for a limited period of time, there is growing recognition of and effort to meet longer-term need of this kind."⁽²⁾

Transportation is the main problem to the extension of this service to rural areas.

The only specific legislative act for homemaker service is in Ontario which passed the Homemakers and Nurses Services Act, 1958, as amended by the Homemakers and Nurses Services Amendment Act, 1968-69. The remaining provinces use their social assistance legislation to encourage the development of homemaker services. The 50-50 sharing with the Federal Government by all provinces of the cost of this service under the Canada Assistance Plan covers those "in need" or who "might be in need" if they did not receive the service. The Canada Assistance Plan does not apply to Home Care programs.

Recommendation 18

That facilities be provided more widely in the community to which sick elderly people could go or be brought for on-the-spot assessment, treatment counselling, rehabilitation and related services, such facilities to include outpatient departments of hospitals, geriatric clinics and special clinics as required, concerned with mental health, speech and vision defects, dental care and rehabilitation.

ACTION TAKEN

A National Health Grant was awarded to Dr. J. E. F. Hastings,⁽¹⁾ University of Toronto, to head a research group to examine the economic and social implications in the development of community health centres. The Committee on the Cost of Health Services had recommended that priority be given to establishing community health centres in Canada and this was adopted by the Conference of Health Ministers in June 1971. The Hastings project had as its general purpose to study and make recommendations on the delivery of ambulatory care at the community level through various type of health centres and on how to encourage the development of such centres. Many forms of service were examined (hospital clinics, university clinics, private medical groupings, community clinics, nurse practitioner units, combined health-social service units, public health clinics, mental health clinics, etc.). Another research project on the same subject was undertaken by Dr. A. Peter Ruderman, Ph.D., with the assistance of a grant from National Health and Welfare. His project set out to make an analysis of available data to determine whether community health centres offered economic advantages over other forms of medical practice.

In the Hastings Report, which was submitted in July 1972, the concept of a health centre was defined as one which must promote a better balance between health promotion and prevention, diagnosis and treatment, and rehabilitation. "The emphasis of a community health centre must be on high quality initial and continuing care for meeting the health needs of individuals and families. There must be a balance in services among health promotion and prevention, diagnosis and treatment and rehabilitation. There must also be provision for dealing with urgent problems. Health promotion includes counselling to prepare people for the various phases of life, education to improve living habits, family planning... For providing the basic medical services the minimum service unit should consist of personnel whose continued skills are those usually now found in the general or family physician... The basic dental service unit should consist of personnel whose combined skills are those usually now found in the dentist, dental hygienist and chairside assistant..."⁽²⁾

The Hastings Report concluded that no examples of the full concept of a community health centre presently exist. There are local community service centres in Ontario, Quebec, Saskatchewan and Manitoba which attempt to integrate health and social services for the total family. The Report recommended that:

"Community health centres should be established and linked with hospitals and other health services in a fully integrated health services system... Community health centres should be established as non-profit corporate entities and in sufficient numbers so that new funding methods develop to promote the best use of resources.

Community health centres must offer a setting where care is provided through a multidisciplinary team. Pay systems, alternative to the present form of fee-for-service, which are conducive to the team approach and which are attractive to health professionals must be developed.

They must promote a better balance between health promotion and prevention, diagnosis and treatment and rehabilitation. They must, as necessary, relate to other health care services and community social services on a coordinated and integrated basis."⁽³⁾

The Hastings Report has the general endorsement of the Federal and Provincial Governments.⁽⁴⁾ These comments and recommendations submitted by the Hastings group deal with family care health centres rather than centres directed towards the treatment of one age group, such as the over 65. There are few geriatric clinics in Canada.⁽⁵⁾ Clinics such as those operated by Dr. Goldstein in Ottawa and Dr. Bayne in Hamilton are regarded as innovative and worthy of reporting in the Canadian Medical Association Journal.

In Ottawa Dr. S. Goldstein, M.D. has established a psychogeriatric services at the Royal Ottawa Hospital which is regarded as a community based program. He works with the Social Welfare Department, Homes for the Aged and Nursing Homes in the Area. Surveys show that the proportion of mental patients in nursing homes is as high as 60-80 per cent.⁽⁶⁾

In Ottawa, the Nursing Homes and Special Care Branch of the Carleton Social Welfare Department has, since 1957, operated an Assessment and Placement Service. More than half the nursing home beds in Ottawa are occupied by patients assisted by this Service. In Hamilton, since 1971, Dr. J. R. D. Bayne has developed a similar Assessment and Placement Service for the aged.

According to Statistics Canada, List of Canadian Hospitals and related Institutions and Facilities, 1973,⁽¹⁾ there are only 21 convalescent/rehabilitation centres with a bed capacity of 2,521 for all age groups. In addition, Toronto, Trois Rivières and Quebec City are credited with rehabilitation centres.

The Toronto Rehabilitation Centre is an out-patient facility dating back to the early 1920's. Originally it offered only occupational therapy and physiotherapy but over the years it has been expanded to include speech therapy, social service. From the beginning, therapy has been given in the home as well as in the Centre. Since 1958 the Home Care Program for Metro Toronto has referred cases requiring therapy to the Centre's Mobility Therapy Department. Consequently, in 1971 nearly half of the Centre's total caseload was handled by the Mobile Therapy Department. Reasons for referral to the mobile therapy department were—tolerance too low to tolerate transportation to the Centre, old age, an important factor in the winter months, and unsuitability for transportation such as obesity, steep stairs which could only be negotiated by stretcher, etc. In 1971 the percentage of home patients receiving occupational therapy had fallen, while the percentage of those getting physiotherapy had risen. In the Centre, on the other hand, there was little change in the relative proportions of the two caseloads. Since the Mobile Therapy Department was in a supportive role, the Centre did not assume responsibility for the patient's overall care. The Home Care Program must coordinate all of the services being given to the patient. In 1971 the Government medical insurance covered the cost of transportation of a therapist to the home, but not the cost of the patient to the out-patient clinic. Therapy in the home creates problems from both the patient's and the therapist's point of view and is more costly.⁽²⁾

In British Columbia⁽³⁾ assessment and treatment services are provided by eighteen health units throughout the province and by nine health units in the Greater Vancouver region. The availability and comprehensiveness of these services vary from one region to another based on population numbers and distribution. Many of the large health units have to cope with enormous distances and limited travel budgets, frequently almost inaccessible areas and extreme weather.

In 1973 Alberta⁽⁴⁾ established three geriatric "day" hospitals; one in Edmonton and two in Calgary—on a pilot project basis. Patients spend several hours in therapeutic activity and return home the same day. Patients are transferred by two buses which accommodate wheelchair as well as ambulatory patients.

Saskatchewan⁽⁵⁾ has community health and social centres in rural areas where regular medical clinics provide medical assessment of health problems. Manitoba⁽⁶⁾ also operates 16 health units throughout the province which provide a service to the total population including the elderly.

There is no Canada Assistance Plan sharing in the operating and maintenance grants for Day Centres which would include some assessment, treatment, counselling, rehabilitation and day care. Ontario, under the Elderly Persons Centres Act provides 100 per cent capital funding in conjunction with the municipalities and non-profit organizations for the development of Day Centres.

In Quebec the Maimonides Hospital and Home for the Aged in Montreal added a Day Hospital to its facilities in 1966. In June 1971 the average daily attendance was 25. The objective of the day hospital is "to provide for aged people who were suffering fairly severe psychiatric and medical disorders and were too deteriorated emotionally and physically to utilize the existing services of social clubs and recreation centres which would help them function well enough to continue living in their own homes, thus making their admission into an institution unnecessary."⁽⁷⁾

The Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care in Toronto is operated on a similar basis.

The Prince Edward Island⁽⁸⁾ Department of Health reported that general diagnostic and treatment services are available equally to persons of all ages.

New Brunswick⁽⁹⁾ is divided into 5 regions with a major clinic centre in each region. There are also mobile clinics which travel to smaller communities.

Community health services are under study in Nova Scotia.⁽¹⁰⁾

On-the-spot assessments and required services are provided universally in all out-patient clinics in Newfoundland and Labrador.⁽¹¹⁾ An extensive Community Care Program (i.e. Boarding Care) exists in Mental Health with continual supervision and assessment.

Recommendation 19

That bedside nursing in the home be extended to urban areas now without them, and increasingly to rural areas, and that these services be provided or integrated closely with local or district health departments.

ACTION TAKEN

The Medical Care Directorate of the Health Programs Branch of National Health and Welfare Canada organized a survey in 1971-72 of "outreach" facilities available across Canada for all age groups. "Outreach facilities" denote those offering non-institutional special care programs which contribute to the health and welfare needs of special population groups. The VON, YMCA and social action organizations are included in certain provinces.

The attached table shows the total number of "outreach" facilities across Canada for all age groups. A further breakdown shows that in Ontario slightly less than half of the facilities were located in Toronto; facilities are almost equally divided between Montreal and the rest of Quebec and Vancouver has 204 units available while the rest of the province has 281 centres. However except in a few instances home nursing services are not included in their lists of facilities and services. The majority of the services relate to clinical services, alcoholism, drug addiction, family planning, etc.

The establishment of organized home care programs was initially slow but by 1967 there were 26 programs including a number in rural areas in the provinces of Quebec and Saskatchewan, while several in the Province of Ontario extended their catchment areas beyond the original city limits. The Province of Quebec, Ontario and Saskatchewan have developed province-wide plans for home care. Most of the major cities in Canada now have provisions for home care beyond the traditional home nursing services organized in Canadian municipalities by the Victorian Order of Nurses and Les Infirmières Visi-teuses in Quebec and the catchment areas served by local or regional health units and city health departments.

Voluntary associations such as the VON which provides nursing care, the Canadian Arthritis and the Rheumatism Society which provide physiotherapy, and the Canadian Red Cross Society which provides patient aids and home-maker services have made major inputs to the development of home care in Canada.⁽¹⁾

Home Care programs are financed by the provinces and are not shared with the Federal Government. With one or two exceptions all the provinces have developed or are in the process of developing programs, usually in collaboration with the Victorian Order of Nurses.

Newfoundland⁽²⁾ offers home care in three large centres. Prince Edward Island⁽³⁾ is in the process of introducing the system under the Department of Health. The entire cost will be borne by the province. Nova Scotia⁽¹⁾ has no public supported home care program, but it is under study.

New Brunswick⁽²⁾ in 1972 introduced three pilot projects financed by the Department of Health. The public Health Nursing Service has an adult health supervision and treatment program. The geriatric program provides treatment and service in the home environment, thereby allowing the individual to remain in his home, avoiding the possibility of hospitalization and/or premature placement in a nursing home.

In Quebec VON groups in Hull and Montreal have been part of special study committees to look at Government funded programs such as home care services.⁽³⁾

In Ontario⁽⁴⁾ bedside nursing in the home exists in all urban areas and most areas as an integral part of Home Care. Bedside nursing services are purchased from local providers. Victorian Order of Nurses is the predominant local provider in most locations and makes available its nursing services to other "purchasers" outside the scope of Home Care as well. About six local areas are not served by the VON and nursing service is obtained by Home Care as a special Health Unit project. In the latter situations home nursing frequently is not available to persons who are not admitted to or not eligible for Home Care. In virtually all locations served by voluntary nursing organization, there is excellent coordination between the voluntary nursing organization, the local Home Care Program and the local and district Health Department.

Home Nursing services are being introduced in the Prairie Provinces. In April 1973 the Manitoba⁽⁵⁾ Government proposed to extend financial help to care for people at home. Saskatchewan⁽⁶⁾ has the system working in 6 urban areas and 12 rural areas but it is not an insured service. Some programs are financed by health grants and others are an extension of the regional health service.

In Alberta⁽⁷⁾ the development of Home Care programs is one of major areas of concern of the VON branches. The Calgary program, with VON administration, has completed its two-year pilot stage and is now assured of funding for the next three years. Programs in the other cities are at various stages of planning and it is anticipated home care will start in Edmonton in late 1973.

In British Columbia⁽⁸⁾ a coordinated home care service is being developed on a trial basis in Victoria by the province and Municipal Departments of Health.

The Federal Government has proposed to the provinces a new formula for fiscal arrangements which eventually would be based on the per capita. If accepted, the provinces will be able to use their gross funds to meet their most urgent requirements. With this new flexibility home care programs could be expanded if desired.

Recommendation 21

That arrangements be developed to make all these services available also in rural areas, by training lay personnel to assist the health professionals, and by ensuring prompt communication and transportation services.

ACTION TAKEN

Saskatchewan⁽⁹⁾ has extended its services to rural areas more extensively than other provinces which have confined themselves to major urban areas.

Transportation to rural areas is always a problem but the Annual Report for the VON, 1972, states that "branches are extending their boundaries so that service can be available to a larger number of people particularly those who live beyond the limits of towns and cities." Voluntary agencies are also organized to provide transportation to older people who receive treatments from clinics, etc. The VON Annual Report also goes on to say that "clerical and other auxiliary staff such as homemakers and home aides are being used in an effort to increase the efficiency of professional personnel." "Educators of health personnel, aware of the shift in emphasis from institutional to community care, are seeking more opportunities for observation or experience for professional and paraprofessional students with community agencies. VON branches cannot meet all the requests for student experience..." The VON is aware of the need to improve management of human resources and question whether "nurses have been relieved of all responsibilities that can be done by clerical personnel? What level of preparation is required to provide nursing care at a safe and acceptable level?"⁽¹⁰⁾

Ontario⁽¹¹⁾ sponsors a Senior Volunteers in science program whereby senior citizens are trained to assist professionals and in Prince Edward Island⁽¹²⁾ many senior citizens work as volunteers in the sheltered workshop.

In Manitoba⁽¹⁾ some lay workers are presently being employed on a part-time basis as homemaker/aides. Courses are currently being given or are in the planning stage. It was noted that aides to the health professional should be employed under the same criteria in both urban and rural settings and perform similar functions.

Recommendation 22

- (a) That definite decisions be reached without delay about the range of institutional facilities and services essential for the short and long-term care of the chronically ill; and
- (b) That particular attention be given to the definition of various kinds of sheltered accommodation; and
- (c) That where essential facilities are in short supply the capital costs involved in providing them be eligible for assistance under the hospital construction program or such modification of the latter as may be necessary; and
- (d) That in planning the above facilities due account be taken of the new possibilities of short-term active treatment and rehabilitation with early discharge home as contrasted with long-term largely custodial care, in dealing with chronic disease.

ACTION TAKEN

No national standard terminology has been arrived at for institutions which provide care for the elderly chronically ill. Not all so-called nursing homes provide nursing care. The function of the establishment differs from province to province. Individual provinces are developing a "level of care" system but the type of care provided at various levels differs.

The Federal Government no longer provides grants for the construction of hospitals; these terminated in April 1970.

Hospital requirements are under study in both Newfoundland⁽²⁾ and Prince Edward Island⁽³⁾ in an effort to arrive at a sound basis for planning for necessary care facilities.

Nova Scotia⁽⁴⁾ reports that assistance under provincial construction grants has been expanded. The Health Services and Insurance Commission has established guidelines as to the range of institutional facilities and services that are essential for short and long-term care.

The Department of Health in the Province of New Brunswick⁽¹⁾ has developed definitions and descriptions of the types of facilities required for short and long-term chronic care. The planning of facilities in the province is based upon age and sex-related norms.

The New Brunswick Department of Health has defined the various levels of care within the nursing homes as well as in other sheltered accommodation such as rehabilitative and extended care.

Hospital construction plans take into consideration the type of facilities required for chronic and rehabilitative care. Capital grants are provided by the Provincial Department of Health for the construction of approved new nursing home facilities. Plans take into consideration such new concepts as day care surgery which will enable the patient to be discharged from hospital at an early date. The province also has an active home care program to complement the shortening of the length of stay of active and chronic care patients.

Department of Social Services in Quebec⁽²⁾ has plans to initiate new regional reception centres where persons needing care will be interviewed, assessed and allocated to the appropriate category of care institution. A criteria is being established to standardize admission procedures throughout the province. This plan was announced by the Deputy Minister at a Seminar on Gerontology held in Montreal in November 1973.

In Ontario⁽³⁾ chronic hospitals and nursing homes have been supported to fill the need for the short and long-term care of the chronically ill. Homes for the Aged, Adult Charitable Institutions, Group Homes, Foster Homes, Homes for Retarded Persons, including the aged, handicapped and retarded, have been developed and supported to fill this need. Capital grants are available for many of these from the Province; operating and maintenance grants are shareable, in most instances, under the Canada Assistance Plan Agreement.

Attention is being given to a clearer definition of the various types of sheltered accommodation. At the present time a Committee composed of representatives of the Ministry of Health together with the Ministry of Community and Social Services, is undertaking a study of Institutional Care with a view to developing an inventory of the facilities as they presently exist in both Ministries. As a part of this exercise levels of care are being defined for the various Institutional Service components. At this time (November 1973) five such levels have been determined: domiciliary care, supervisory care, nursing or other professional care, continuing nursing or other professional services and diagnosis and intensive treatment.

These levels represent the spectrum which exists from purely domiciliary or rest home care at level one to highly active treatment oriented centres for both physical and mental disorders at level five.

Simultaneously with this study group is another Government study of "group homes" which includes a categorization of this type of accommodation by intensity of care of community based homes which are provided for and operated by a number of Ministries within the Provincial Government. This group should provide a comprehensive review of the total community based sheltered accommodation provided by all Ministries of the Provincial Government of Ontario.

As part of the current Government policy is to shift from institutional to community care for the handicapped, particularly the mentally retarded, primary responsibility for services to the retarded is being transferred, as of April 1, 1974, to the Ministry of Community and Social Service.

The Province of Ontario also recognizes and funds short-term active treatment and rehabilitation facilities. Priority is given in the provincial capital program for facilities of this type.

Manitoba is in the process of conducting a special study "Aging in Manitoba".⁽¹⁾ No doubt this study will reveal gaps in the service. Manitoba provides cash grants and fund for debt retirement. It is expected that the extension of the home care program will lessen the demand for institutional services.⁽²⁾

Institutional facilities and community support services have increased in Saskatchewan.⁽³⁾ Each health region (ten plus the Northern Health District) has either an extended care facility or approval for additional beds through conversion or renovations.

Many communities have health care programs to assist the patient in his home following discharge from an institution or, as an alternative, prior to admission to in-patient care. The service varies considerably due to the local resources. The more sophisticated type of home care can be found in the cities of Regina, Saskatoon, Prince Albert and Moose Jaw. The regional programs mainly provide the services of nursing, homemaking and limited drugs, medical supplies and equipment. A home care service has been added as an alternate to a small hospital in nine areas. In communities where the small hospital has closed, assistance is available to establish a health and social centre to consist of an out-patient service, on-call nurse, home care program and social activities for the aged.

Particular attention has been given to the definition of various kinds of sheltered accommodation through the development of a levels-of-care system. Each institution is designated as providing certain levels of care which dictate the type and extent of service available.

In addition to hospital construction grants in Saskatchewan there are grants for special care homes and provisions for long-term financing through CMHC.

A joint (Alberta Council on Aging and Department of Health and Social Development) study of the general needs of institutionalized and non-institutionalized senior citizens across Alberta was planned for 1973.

The final report of the Geriatric Reactivation Study carried out by the School of Rehabilitation Medicine of the University of Alberta, September 1972, reported that there were 28 auxiliary and 71 nursing homes caring for some 8,500 people with an average age over 75. The purpose of the study was to test the hypothesis that upgrading of staff in extended care facilities results in improved over-all patient condition.⁽⁴⁾

Auxiliary hospitals in Alberta care for long-term patients. Nursing Homes have a less disabled population. Only a few auxiliary hospitals and no nursing homes provide rehabilitative nursing care.

A study of community care for seniors was conducted by the Social Planning and Review Council of British Columbia⁽⁵⁾ and a report was submitted in December 1972. The preface commented that "day services, home care and nursing in the home, for instance, had not been fully included in the planned health care system for all British Columbia which was developed primarily in hospitals and extended care facilities. . . In general throughout the entire province the lack of comprehensiveness of service was most apparent in (1) home care and (2) intermediate, chronic or special care." The report went on to remark that in many cases the income level made senior citizens ineligible for special care facilities and yet they had insufficient funds to pay the rates in private hospitals and rest homes.

Recommendation 23

That patients with chronic illnesses be cared for in wards or wings of general hospitals, or in other facilities integrated with the hospital system, instead of in completely separate and often isolated institutions as so frequently at present.

ACTION TAKEN

As stated under No. 22, health requirements are under study in all provinces.

Newfoundland⁽⁶⁾ reports that the integration of patients with chronic illnesses into the regular hospital system is being considered in present planning. A comprehensive survey of the whole system of health services and related social services is now being conducted in Prince Edward Island.⁽¹⁾ The matter of integration of chronically ill patients within a general hospital is under consideration.

The recommendation has not been fully accepted by planners in the Province of Nova Scotia⁽²⁾ as tuberculosis care is still being provided on a segregated basis. Centres such as Yarmouth, Windsor and Sydney Mines are providing two levels of care in their hospitals.

In New Brunswick⁽³⁾ it is already the practice that patients with chronic illnesses are cared for in wards or wings of the public hospital.

The Ministry of Health for the Province of Ontario⁽⁴⁾ agrees with the general intent of the recommendation and particularly with the necessity of integrating the chronic illness facilities into the overall system. The province is promoting the concept that chronic patients would be cared for on a programmatic basis which involves assessment of each patient in a particular geographic area and then referral to the facility which will best meet the needs of that particular individual. Quebec⁽⁵⁾ has a similar concept.

This practice of integration has been the policy in Manitoba⁽⁶⁾ for several years. Extended Treatment Units (chronic care) are all located adjacent to general hospitals.

Saskatchewan⁽⁷⁾ reports that most extended care facilities now have an affiliation with a general hospital. One exception is the Souris Valley Extended Care Hospital at Weyburn; it is attached to an acute psychiatric care centre with a general hospital reasonably close. A policy statement issued in June 1973 stated that the government had adopted the policy that acute care general hospital beds would be used for the care of patients requiring extended or chronic care (level 4) in those communities that do not now have organized level 4 services in separate level 4 facilities or in conjunction with general hospitals.

The Social Planning and Review Council of British Columbia⁽⁸⁾ in their December 1972 report commented on the lack of comprehensiveness of services throughout the whole province in personal care (known also as intermediate, chronic or special care). It was the view of the Council that this level of patient "requires initial and continuing medical assessment..." These patients should be treated in the Extended Care Unit of an acute hospital, or in an extended care hospital (or in a private hospital, in which case, the BCHIS is not responsible for coverage).

One of the recommendations of the Interdisciplinary Ad Hoc Committee on Teaching, Research and Service in Geriatrics⁽¹⁾ within the University of Toronto (1973) related to the establishment of acute geriatric units in General Hospitals where the multiplicity of problems of the elderly can be dealt with by those with special interest in, capability for, and awareness of these problems. It was also suggested that there should be more long-stay units associated with acute hospitals and the Committee suggested that instead of closing active beds, they should be converted to long stay beds.

Recommendation 24

That in all institutional facilities a positive attitude be adopted toward the possibility of rehabilitating elderly people and that provision be made for programs designed to return them "from helplessness and dependency to self care and a considerable degree of independence.

ACTION TAKEN

There is a definite trend, though slow, towards rehabilitation of the elderly but some provinces have been able to make more progress than others. Rehabilitation Services are available under the Medical Care Act, the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act and the Canada Assistance Plan.

The Maritime⁽⁹⁾ provinces report that a positive attitude towards the possibility of rehabilitating elderly people is one of their objectives. The Health Services and Insurance Commission of Nova Scotia⁽⁹⁾ reported that recently, through a crash program, they were successful in sponsoring eleven students in Occupational Therapy, with the anticipation that they would work in provincial hospitals providing needed services to the elderly.

In Ontario⁽⁴⁾ activation and rehabilitation programs in Homes for the Aged, both charitable and municipal, have long been a focus of attention. The adjuvant program and related care programs have given great stress to this, as have the activities programs and the full use of volunteer groups, such as the Home Auxiliary.

The 1970 Report of the Ontario Council of Health on Rehabilitation Services (Health Care Delivery System, Supplement No. 6) was critical of the province's system for the delivery of rehabilitation services on the basis that a multiplicity of public and voluntary agencies and organizations have developed limited services to meet specific demands, without concern for the effect each development might have on the overall pattern. This has resulted in unnecessary duplication in many areas, gaps in others.

Acceptance of their expanding role in the field of chronic illness has stimulated a number of general hospitals to organize chronic care units and co-ordinated home care programs have been developed across the province. Services necessary for more comprehensive programs of care are being added by the more progressive hospitals, nursing homes and homes for the aged. Increased attention has been given in some quarters to the development of ambulatory day care programs designed to provide a transition between the hospital and community life and to maintain as many people as possible out of hospitals of all types.

In Manitoba⁽¹⁾ the system for assessment of residents in personal care homes and those applying for placement is designed to require rehabilitation assessment.

In designing the level of care criteria for extended care patients in Saskatchewan,⁽²⁾ one sub-group (4(c)) is specifically tailored to encourage rehabilitation even though it may be required at a slower and modified pace. Two comprehensive rehabilitation centres have been approved for the province, one for the south and one for the north. They are encouraged to provide the support services for the outlying areas and are funded to provide the sophisticated staff and equipment required for the patient in need of comprehensive rehabilitation. School of Rehabilitation Medicine, University of Alberta, 1972, Geriatric Reactivation Study, experimented with a Travelling Rehabilitation Team which was to provide formal and specific instruction to staff at institutions caring for the aged.

In Alberta a Geriatric Reactivation Study⁽³⁾ was undertaken by the School of Rehabilitation Medicine by the University of Alberta to measure the effect of intensive, multi-disciplinary rehabilitation (staff) education and related consultative services. Results indicated that staff attitudes tended to shift to a greater degree of acceptance of patients as individuals. This staff also demonstrated increased knowledge and skills in rehabilitative nursing.

The SPARC study of British Columbia⁽⁴⁾ estimate that there are approximately 500 beds in rehabilitation units in six provincial hospitals and two federal hospitals in Vancouver and Victoria. The standard of .5 beds per 1,000 total population (all ages) would place the provincial overall need at 1,093 beds. Many hospitals throughout the province have a physiotherapy department, frequently shared with or provided by the Canadian Arthritis and Rheumatism Society which offers in-patient and out-patient as well as home treatment to arthritics and non-arthritic patients referred by a physician.

The Science Council of Canada, Special Study No. 29 concluded as follows with respect to rehabilitation services in general.

"A multiplicity of public and voluntary organizations and agencies have developed services to meet specific needs, without sufficient study of the effect each development might have on the overall pattern. This has resulted in unnecessary duplication in some areas, gaps in others, and organizational fragmentation which has led to a lack of continuity in patient care, inefficient use of manpower and physical resources, and rising costs...

The picture is a familiar one, typical, in some respects, of most other elements of the Health Care System. But the importance of Rehabilitation Medicine has not yet been fully realized, the centres are still struggling for recognition. It can only be urged here that in the regional planning that must come about, the place of rehabilitation will receive full attention."⁽⁵⁾

That provision for meeting the needs of mentally ill and confused older people be greatly improved, inter alia, through adequate assessment, which is regarded by the Canadian Mental Health Association as "the first essential in a comprehensive program", a wider use of smaller facilities, including nursing homes and foster homes located close to the places in which the aged live, and a "more hopeful attitude" towards programs of rehabilitation which should be extended, especially in psychiatric hospitals and psychiatric units of general hospitals.

ACTION TAKEN

The services available to those requiring health care, especially mental health service, can only be assessed in terms of the total social and cultural milieu, the nature of the aged population's housing, the existence of resources which will help them remain in their own homes, provision for day care, the availability of hospital care, including acute, extended care and rehabilitation facilities and the role of the provincial psychiatric hospital and its policies.⁽¹⁾

In British Columbia⁽²⁾ the mental health services are provided as community services. There are 24 mental health centres established throughout the province which serve their local community and other communities by travelling clinics. These services are directed to all age groups and a variety of problems, of which psychogeriatrics and family counselling are basic to service to older people. Those in outlying areas must travel to a designated centre to obtain these services. "The community health services have expressed concern about the fact that the centres are not involved to any great extent in offering services to the elderly patient. Other programs under the Mental Health Branch, such as boarding homes, in-patient services and sheltered workshops provide services which enable the long-term hospital patient to return to the community and tend to bring more of this older group to the community health centre."⁽³⁾

The Province of Alberta⁽⁴⁾ is reported to have probably the largest number of auxiliary hospitals and nursing home beds per capita in the country and they are endeavouring to put these into an integrated system to facilitate the transfer and movement of patients from one to the other. The Mental Health Services Division in Alberta is in the process of encouraging what it calls "Approved Homes", with a graduated rate of fees depending on the level of attention required. The number of patients in such homes will be small, probably three as a maximum. Volunteer programs are active in some regions which are designed to brighten the day of patients in nursing homes and auxiliary hospitals.

Saskatchewan⁽⁵⁾ reported a remarkable reduction in the patient population in mental hospitals from 3,111 in January 1963 to 307 in January, 1973. This has resulted from the considerable growth of out-patient services and of services rendered in general hospital psychiatric units and a tremendous growth in follow-up services, domiciliary visits having risen from a very small number in 1903 to around 30,000 in 1973. Approved homes are being widely used as an alternative to long-term hospitalization.

Under the Manitoba⁽⁶⁾ Mental Hospital Foster Home Program 2,000 patients have been placed in the community since 1967.

The lot of the elderly has improved in Ontario⁽⁷⁾ but it is still difficult to help the mildly confused elderly person with limited means to obtain a protective setting unless there is concomitant physical "illness" which justifies coverage of nursing home care by public funds. Of major concern also is the case of the ex-psychiatric patient discharged into residential Homes for Special Care. Not all benefit from the reduction in services.

In the Province of Quebec,⁽¹⁾ Bill 65 has brought services organized on a regional basis in order to make treatment available to all and in addition has helped in the classification of patients in psychiatric hospitals between those requiring medical services and those requiring custodial care. Classification provides directions as to what policy to follow in order to help those people.

Prince Edward Island⁽²⁾ has not the comparative facilities to deal with the acute mentally ill as the physically ill. Two new buildings are on the planning board for the use of chronically ill patients. During the past ten years the chronically ill have been placed in foster homes which has worked quite well if the patient is able to be involved in the community life. Similar improvements and similar problems are evident in the other Atlantic Provinces.⁽³⁾

A problem common to most areas is the lack of professional and trained staff to care for the mentally ill and confused older people.

Recommendation 27

That, as in the case of nursing homes, study be given by the appropriate authority to the place and function of homes for the aged, and that in particular attention be given to prevailing admission policies, the possibility of alternative accommodation in sheltered semi-independent housing for relatively well ambulant patients, the place of rehabilitation or "re-activization" programs, and the careful selection and training of the staff.

ACTION TAKEN

The March 1971 issue of On Growing Old (a quarterly publication of The Canadian Council on Social Development) reports on a shift in emphasis regarding policies for old people: the newly organized Department of Social Affairs in Quebec⁽⁴⁾ announced a change in policy which would enable old people to live out their lives independently rather than in institutions. Thus, approval for 40 out of 107 projected homes for the aged was dropped pending a study of need in the field. On the other hand, the same periodical for June 1971 commented on four new homes for the aged in Nova Scotia⁽⁵⁾ as well as proposed new homes which would provide some 350 beds. Recent trends in the fields of aging indicate that more and more persons formerly cared for in institutions will receive services in their own homes and communities. Hence the pressure to expand community services to carry additional loads formerly handled in other ways will be heavy during the 1970s. This same view was expressed at the Workshops held during the annual meeting of the Canadian Council on Social Development held in Ottawa in September 1973. The great need is to help people maintain their independence by extending assistance to those living in their own homes. The expansion of "Meals on Wheels" and other voluntary services is towards this end, but professional social workers would prefer that such services be organized under a social scheme to avoid the gaps that arise when the whole program relies on voluntary help.

The Social Planning Review Council of British Columbia in "A Study of Community Care for Seniors" commented on the lack of "comprehensiveness of services" in Home Care and Personal Care.⁽¹⁾ One of the big problems is that congregate personal care in the private sector is beyond the means of those needing care, particularly those with some income which makes them ineligible for special care facilities.

Under what are termed "master agreements" Alberta bears the cost of constructing and equipping homes for the aged and housing units on municipal land. Projects are operated by provincially incorporated foundations which include municipal councillors in their membership; net costs of operation are borne by the municipalities. The Welfare Homes and Institutions Branch of the Department of Social Development is responsible for the licensing and maintaining of standards in homes for the aged and infirm. The Senior Citizens Shelter Assistance Act, 1972, provides homeowner assistance grants in an amount equal to the provincial school levy for homeowners aged 65 and over in respect to their private residence or when they reside in an "eligible mobile unit". This Act also provides an annual renter assistance grant for senior citizens.⁽²⁾ Alberta also had a Pilot Project published in July 1973 on the Medical Problems and the Use of Medical Services Among Senior Citizens in Alberta. During 1973 the University of Alberta conducted a "geriatric reactivation study" in nursing homes to determine the effectiveness of intensive, multi-disciplinary rehabilitation (staff) education and related consultative services.⁽³⁾

Saskatchewan⁽⁴⁾ is giving consideration to having a "common admission and discharge committee" for all levels of care in a particular region. The Department of Social Services is promoting reactivation and a rehabilitation philosophy is encouraged. In Saskatchewan, the aged and infirm persons are cared for in a provincial special-care home in three provincial geriatric centres, two under the jurisdiction of the Department of Welfare and one under that of the South Saskatchewan Hospital Centre, and in municipal, voluntary and proprietary homes for the aged. Capital grants, amounting to 20 per cent of actual construction costs are available for special care homes, such as nursing homes, supervisory care homes or sheltered care homes. Further, an annual maintenance grant of $12 per bed is paid to such homes.

The total bed capacity for "personal care homes" and hostels in Manitoba in 1972 was given as 6,230 compared with 2,900 beds in 1960.

The White Paper on Health Policy for Manitoba⁽⁵⁾ no doubt reflects problems common to all provinces in the education of persons associated with health care:

"Programmes for different types of levels of workers are compartmentalized. Training for different levels is not cumulative. For example, a licensed practical nurse who is interested in taking more training to become a registered nurse cannot add to her already completed training and experience. Neither can a student who has completed a community college course as a welfare worker, with experience and training, easily extend her training to become a social worker . . . Only infrequently are courses structured in such a way that students begin working in 'teams' with their classmates in other professional groupings."

"Aging in Manitoba—Needs and Resources" is an ongoing research project.

In Ontario⁽⁶⁾ mechanisms are now being developed to integrate the planning of nursing homes and homes for the aged, so that there is neither a duplication of parallel type facilities in the community nor are there gaps allowed in specific geographic regions by virtue of the fact that neither a home for the aged nor a nursing home is provided.

Since 1972 the Ontario Ministry of Community and Social Services has been working with the Ontario Association of Homes for the Aged and other related agencies, to develop a new admissions policy that will limit the over-utilization of institutional care when alternatives may be found which are more desirable in terms of psychosocial and other reasons. Community outreach programs are being developed such as Foster Homes, Meals-on-Wheels, Day Centres, Vacation Care and sheltered, semi-independent housing.

Community Care Services, (Metropolitan Toronto) in its 1972 Annual Report stated that although some supportive care services do exist, many more are needed to close the gaps in the health and social care systems. "The hope of closing these gaps lies with grass root organizations."

In Quebec⁽¹⁾ the Aged Couples Homes Act authorizes the province to erect and maintain homes for aged couples or to make agreements (including the provision of grants) for their erection, upkeep and administration with persons, societies and corporations, public or private. In November 1973 Quebec promulgated a new socio-health policy that would screen applicants for domiciliary care so that the elderly will be directed to appropriate treatment centres and many others encouraged to remain independent with the assistance of supportive services.

In New Brunswick⁽²⁾ the Department of Health has studied the place and function of homes for the aged: "A Study of Extended Care for the Aged, Chronically Ill and Disabled in the Province of New Brunswick". Several nursing homes are presently building accommodation for relatively well persons along with reactivation programs and training of staff.

In Nova Scotia⁽³⁾ all admissions to Homes for Special Care are arranged through a Provincial Classification Committee. The primary functions of the Committee are to consider and examine all requests for admission to Homes for Special Care and to arrange periodic reviews of patients whose physical and/or mental condition may have changed. Private homes caring for elderly citizens are inspected by the Public Assistance Division and licensed under the provisions of the Boarding Home Act. Consultative Services are provided in respect to staffing, budgeting and maintenance. The Department of Public Health provides a regular consultative service in respect to diets and nutrition for patients in all homes and, in addition, gives technical, medical and nursing information to homes providing accommodation for the aged. Homes for Special Care include: Licensed Nursing Homes, Licensed Boarding Homes, Senior Citizens' Residences and Homes for the Aged. Each municipally-operated home requires the appointment of a Board of Visitors who inspect the home at least four times each year and report to the municipal council operating the home. Copies of the reports are also forwarded to the Minister of Public Welfare.

The first report of the Nova Scotia Council of Health⁽⁴⁾ (February 1973) proposed a "progressive care approach" and defined a number of levels of care ranging from active treatment to personal care for people who are not ill but need support. The emphasis was on non-institutional care.

In their Annual Report for 1973 the Newfoundland Department of Social Services and Rehabilitation reported that sufficient emphasis has not been replaced on the urgent need for beds where nursing care can be provided.⁽⁵⁾ There has been a very significant decrease in recent years in the number of applicants seeking accommodations who are ambulatory. During that fiscal year approval for the construction of five new homes was given. Provision is being made in each of these new homes for nursing care to the extent of approximately 25 per cent of the bed capacity.

The study of NHA-financed housing for the elderly—"Beyond Shelter" concluded there is a need for better liaison between housing developments of the type studied and other forms of accommodation, such as community foster care programs, intermediate or special care homes in order to produce continuity of care for old people.

Recommendation 29

That, on the lines proposed by the Royal Commission on Health Services, a Nation-Wide Universal Health Service program be instituted to provide a comprehensive range of services including Medical Care, Nursing Care, Dental Care, Home Care, Prescription Drugs and Prosthetic Appliances: and that, if staging is required in the introduction of all or any part of this program, older people be given special consideration.

ACTION TAKEN

Under the Medical Care Program established under the Medical Care Act, the coverage provided by the various provinces varies somewhat but the basic coverage is the same throughout Canada. Routine dental care and prescription drugs are not covered by Medicare to out-patients. Welfare recipients are provided with necessary drugs.

There is no nation-wide program for nursing care, drugs, or prosthetic appliances.

The only dental program for the older population exists in Alberta.⁽⁶⁾ The Council on Health Care of the Canadian Dental Association announced at their March 1974 meeting that in Alberta persons over 65 years and their dependents will be eligible for dental services up to a limit of $1,000 for each two consecutive year period. The Provincial Government will pay 90 per cent of the cost of dental work up to June 30, 1974, and they will pay 95 per cent of the cost from July 1, 1974 to December 31, 1975.⁽⁷⁾

Recommendation 30

That the above comprehensive program be financed mainly, if not altogether, by tax payments so that premiums, if any, may be kept to a minimum and the use of the means test, which we unequivocally reject, may be rendered unnecessary.

ACTION TAKEN

Under "Medicare", established under the Medical Care Act, the Federal Government contributes half of the average national cost of insured services to those provinces operating medical care insurance plans which meet certain minimum criteria. Residents aged 65 and over pay no medical premiums in any of the provinces except Quebec and British Columbia. In Quebec the premiums are based on the amount of taxable income. In British Columbia those with limited incomes may receive up to 90 per cent subsidy. Ontario has a one year residency requirement before premiums are eliminated. In both Ontario and Manitoba and premiums for the family unit are eliminated once either spouse reaches 65.⁽¹⁾

A serious bottleneck in the provision of health services for old people is the shortage of professional personnel interested and trained in this field, e.g., physicians, nurses, physiotherapists, occupational therapists, orthotists, prosthetists, social workers, podiatrists.

Recommendation 31

- (a) That professional schools which train professional workers for the above specialties place greater emphasis in their curricula on the medical, social and economic aspects of aging; and
- (b) That grants under the Health and Welfare Training programs of the Federal Government be used to increase the supply of workers equipped for work in the field of Old Age; and
- (c) That programs to stimulate greater interest in geriatrics on the part of the various professions indicated above be provided by the professional societies concerned in post-graduate refresher courses, in conferences and institutes and by means of professional literature.

ACTION TAKEN

With few exceptions Schools of Social Work⁽²⁾ report that elective courses in geriatric care have been offered but there was not sufficient interest on the part of students to implement the course. Similarly elective seminars have been advertised with the same result. There is no direct financial input either by the Federal Government or professional societies to stimulate interest in geriatrics within the Schools of Social Work. On the whole the Directors feel that there is an increasing emphasis on aspects of aging particularly in social policy and planning.

Some work is being done in Schools of Social Work in Ontario in the field of aging. The Faculty of Social Work, University of Toronto⁽³⁾ has three professors interested in the subject on a personal basis. For example, Dr. Nathan Markus, used his sabbatical leave to continue his studies in research in the field of aging. Health and Welfare Canada supported his research. Two other professors have been active in accommodation problems for the elderly and in income security. Field work opportunities for students in the Faculty of Social Work have been expanded and there are more placements in institutions and programs for the aged this year than in previous years.

On a statistical basis little progress has been made: of 398 Master of Social Work theses completed at the Toronto School of Social Work, between 1942 and 1962, only thirteen are related to the field of aging; in the period 1963-1973, of 440 individual Master of Social Work theses only 18 dealt with the aged. In addition, three group research reports, out of a total of 44, dealt with the aged. Between 1966 and 1973, a total of 729 Master of Social Work degrees have been granted by the University of Toronto, an average of 104 graduates per year. It is estimated that between 5 and 8 per cent are engaged in the field of aging. From the above it is evident that there has been little movement on the part of social work students and graduates to do research and to practices in the field of aging.

The School of Social Work, University of Windsor,⁽⁴⁾ offers a half-course option (Services for Aging) in the fourth year and a half-course option is again available to the graduate students on Intervention for the Aged. They have had two Master's theses on aged persons in the last two years. They also arrange field work placements in the fourth and fifth years in settings where work is directly with the aged persons.

Wilfrid Laurier University⁽⁵⁾ is increasing interest on problems of the aged in its clinical and social policy courses. There is a university project on pre-retirement planning carried on by the educational services and this has been quite successful.

The School of Social Welfare, University of Calgary,⁽⁶⁾ reports that they have two graduates of their master's program who are particularly involved in the geriatrics field. A serious drawback is the lack of provision either in the form of finances or professional staff for the supervision of students in field situations.

While specific instruction in geriatric medicine is not now available at the majority of the schools of medicine across Canada, several have plans to introduce some aspects into their curriculum or clinical training.⁽¹⁾ For example, the University of Calgary,⁽²⁾ a new school of medicine, plans for the provision of information to the health needs of elderly people in their residency training in family practice. Consideration is being given to structuring a geriatrics department at University of British Columbia Faculty of Medicine.⁽³⁾ Students at the School of Rehabilitation Medicine receive lectures on rehabilitation problems in old age. The School of Nursing also has a lecture course on geriatric nursing. Shaughnessy Hospital, which has well established geriatric programs, will be a setting for more formal teaching of this subject.

The Faculty of Medicine at Western Ontario⁽⁴⁾ has established an ad hoc committee on Geriatric Medicine which is considering ways and means of giving greater emphasis to Geriatrics in the undergraduate medical curriculum. The Continuing Education Program is also provided a refresher Day in Geriatric Medicine April 10, 1974.

The Faculty of Medicine at the University of Alberta⁽⁵⁾ has provided fragmentary exposure to elective programs in geriatric medicine. In 1970 the Continuing Medical Education Division conducted a workshop in Geriatric Medicine which they hoped would attract some 20 physicians. In fact, only nine attended in addition to 44 nurses. Another effort was made in April 1974. The consensus is that it has not been possible to stimulate sufficient interest in the medical problems of the elderly to influence graduates to do full time work in the field.

There has been considerable progress at the University of Manitoba⁽⁶⁾ where as early as 1968 the Curriculum Revision Committee recommended that 12-15 hours of instruction in geriatrics be provided in the Core Curriculum for medical students. The second year student now has 12 hours. In January 1972 there was established a Geriatric Clinical Teaching Unit at Deer Lodge Hospital available to third year medical students, as well as students from other disciplines such as Nursing, Physiotherapy, Occupational Therapy and Environmental Studies. The Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Canada recognize up to 12 months of experience on the Geriatric Clinical Teaching Unit as accepted training. However, professional training in the medical field is somewhat impeded because the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Canada does not have a subspecialty of Geriatrics. A third year major elective is also available to third year students.

Queen's University⁽⁷⁾ in 1967 established a School of Rehabilitation Therapy which has already graduated three classes of physiotherapists and occupational therapists. While specific instruction is not being given in Geriatric Medicine, Rehabilitation Medicine, which is an important part of the modern concept of health care delivery to older people, has been established as a department in the Faculty of Medicine at Queen's. The establishment of a Division of Geriatric Medicine is presently underway in the University Department of Medicine with a clinical base in the university-affiliated hospital at St. Mary's on the Lake in Kingston.

A Residency Training Programme in Rehabilitation Medicine has been established within the Faculty of Medicine and a number of postgraduate and continuing medical education courses in the area of Rehabilitation Medicine and Geriatric Medicine have been offered in recent years. At least one recent graduate from Queen's is engaged in Rehabilitation in the Geriatric age groups.

A study in the area of Geriatric health care delivery is also being conducted by the Department of Community Medicine at Queens.

Within the Institute of Medical Science, the University of Toronto,⁽⁸⁾ a major study on the epidemiology of psychiatric disease in the elderly is being carried out at the Clarke Institute. Within the Faculty of Medicine various departments are engaged in different approaches to the problems identified by the Senate Committee:

Department of Behavioural Science.

Department of Obstetrics and Gynaecology—two members have special interests in geriatric gynaecology in addition to undergraduate and graduate programs regarding the problems of aging in the female.

Department of Ophthalmology—special studies on "Electroretinogram in senile macular degeneration". In this connection a visual testing service has been set up at the Toronto General Hospital to detect early functional defects in aged people.

Department of Pharmacology—maintains a part-time appointment for clinical pharmacologist with special experience in geriatrics.

Department of Preventive Medicine—Specialist in Gerontology has assembled a study group on teaching of geriatrics within the medical school.

Although there is considerable activity in this field at the University of Toronto, the Dean of Medicine has expressed the view that it is difficult to assess the effect of these programs in relation to recent graduates who have specialized in working with the aged, since geriatrics, per se, is not a separately categorized discipline. Canada boasts at most 25 gerontologists.⁽¹⁾

Although Schools of Social Work and Medicine have not acknowledged any federal grants for geriatric study, Health and Welfare Canada (Welfare) have provided the following information relative to welfare services for the total population.

An increased supply of welfare workers and improvements in their qualifications is encouraged by the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan of 1966 and the National Welfare Grants program. Funds are not allocated to any particular field of welfare, but are allocated in response to demand.

The Canada Assistance Plan provides for federal sharing (50 per cent) with the provinces in extensions and improvements of welfare services since the base year 1964-65. Included as items of shareable costs are those associated with attendance at conferences and seminars if the topics are related in a direct way to the planning, development or provision of welfare services. Shareable expenditures related to training costs include costs of in-service training programs, including fees for instructors hired for the purpose, and costs of employees taking formal training on a full or part-time basis. The primary objective of these provisions is to support improvement of the social work qualifications of personnel engaged in the provision of welfare services. Training in other disciplines can be supported if there is clear evidence that the skills obtained will be used on a continuing basis in the provision of welfare services. In addition to graduate training, social service training at the technical level is covered by these provisions. However, full-time undergraduate university training is excluded since it is more appropriately covered under other arrangements.

The National Welfare Grants program provides funds for manpower utilization and development, including grants to Schools of Social Work for teaching and field instruction, welfare scholarships, and welfare fellowships to individuals seeking advanced training in the social welfare field.⁽²⁾

The basic nursing education course has no special content related to geriatrics as the nurse must be prepared to meet general situations. If a specialty is required in operating room nursing, urology, etc., competence in the chosen field is acquired through special courses which may be a certificate course or by in-service training. If a nurse were interested in specializing in geriatric care, she would be advised to apply for employment in an institution which is noted for its expertise in this field. Other training is acquired through "institutes" which may be of three days or three weeks' duration. From information available there are no "certificate courses" available in geriatrics. Graduates in nursing science may also take a Master's degree in a specialty which could be geriatrics.⁽³⁾

Community colleges in Ontario which are now involved in preparing students for a nursing career include nursing homes for the elderly as centres where practical experience may be gained. For example, Algonquin College in Ottawa channels its students through six nursing homes on the basis of two days a week over a period of approximately four months.

Recommendation 32

That at the local level devices be developed to ensure cooperative planning and action between the Departments of Health and Welfare in Municipal Governments and between them and other local Government Departments and the various voluntary and professional organizations in the community concerned with the health and welfare of the elderly.

ACTION TAKEN

The Social Planning and Review Council of British Columbia⁽⁴⁾ in their report—A Study of Community Care for Seniors—released in December 1972—commented on the lack of instructional resources and programs for the elderly in British Columbia. Particular reference was made to the lack of coordination of community services: overlapping and missing areas; lack of uniformity in funding or costs of services; lack of uniformity in geographic units for planning and delivery of services and lack of communication between government departments, between community agencies (public, private and institutional), between professionals.

The Alberta study (Medical Problems and the Use of Medical Services Among Senior Citizens in Alberta April 1973) recommended that at the local level in Edmonton, the Social Service Advisory Committee assume a strong coordinating role, acting on behalf of all city departments in closer liaison with various private agencies in the city. The report referred to programs for the elderly sponsored by L.I.P. and O.F.C. and commented that basic programs cannot be left to casual efforts only. "In all cases health and related service programs should be strengthened and/or developed in the context of the overall blueprint..."⁽⁵⁾

In their report to the Government of Saskatchewan, the Senior Citizen's Commission recommended that "the provincial government establish an Agency as part of a new deal for the elderly in Saskatchewan."⁽¹⁾ This agency would consist of a provincial council, regional councils and local council to ensure co-operation in planning. The objectives and purposes of each council are set forth in this report.

A similar comment was made in the White Paper on Health Policy for Manitoba July 1972: "If the strength of the public health services in Manitoba lies in its internal structure, its weakness is found in its relationship to other services. In most parts of the province, public health personnel do their work quite independently of the local hospital and the local practising physicians. There is no formal integration."

In February 1971 the Section on Aging, Ontario Welfare Council submitted its report of the Health Aids Committee.⁽²⁾ It considered the provision of an initial assessment and referral service at points where older people tend to gather, such as Elderly Persons Centres, senior citizens housing and senior citizen organizations as an effective way of building a bridge between services for older people. It endorsed the recommendation of the Select Committee on Aging that the province make grants-in-aid for the establishment of information and referral services for the aged in every community, using available community welfare councils, regional welfare offices, health departments or units and other appropriate agencies. A study prepared by the Public Policy Concern for Information Canada in March 1971 recommended that the Government of Canada pursue the objective of supporting the efforts of the Canadian people in the 1970s to create Community Information Centres as person-centred, two-way media of enquiry and expression. In 1970 Ontario launched a community information centre project to investigate through involvement the role of the government in such centres. One of the recommendations that came out of this study was that specialized centres, such as information centres for the aged, be supported by the appropriate government departments.

Quebec's⁽³⁾ proposed policy (November 1973) emphasizes decentralization and the establishment of regional centres which will determine the individual's need.

In February 1973 the Minister of Public Health of Nova Scotia released the first report of the Nova Scotia Council of Health. The council was asked to study the health system of the province and recommend a program designed to improve the delivery of health care in the future. The report recommended a complete restructuring of the administration of personal health services emphasizing administrative boards at the local level. These community boards would be responsible for the administration of all health services in their area and would be able to integrate health services with other social services. Regional boards, made up of representatives of community boards, were also proposed. They would assist with joint planning between communities in specified areas and develop and administer cooperative programs. The new organization is intended to encourage a new and more flexible approach to health care delivery that will emphasize community-oriented treatment programs concentrating on improved home care and ambulatory care and emphasizing prevent.⁽⁴⁾

A comprehensive survey of the whole system of health services and related social services is now being conducted in Prince Edward Island.⁽⁵⁾ The Provinces of New Brunswick⁽⁶⁾ has established an Inter-departmental Committee on the Care of the Aged. This Committee has not yet made a final report, but is expected to do so within the next few months.

Recommendation 33

That Provincial Departments of Health establish special branches to concern themselves with the health problems of older people and that there be a continuing liaison between such branches and corresponding branches in Departments of Welfare in order to endure joint consideration of matters of mutual concern, such as rehabilitation service, care of elderly people in institutions, organized Home Care programs, etc.

ACTION TAKEN

Concern has been voiced about the need to establish special age-structured sections within the Department of Health. There appears to be a growing emphasis on health programs for the total population.

The Province of Alberta does not have a special section within the Department of Health and Social Development, although there are other age-structured sections such as the Department of Culture, Youth and Recreation.⁽⁷⁾

A recent report by the Senior Citizen's Commission in Saskatchewan⁽¹⁾ recommended that the services to the aged provided by the Departments of Public Health and Social Services be integrated formally into an agency.

In 1972 the Department of Health and Social Development for the Province of Manitoba⁽²⁾ established a branch for the elderly with a social worker as the director.

It is not anticipated in Ontario⁽³⁾ that the formal structure of the Ministry of Health will include special branches responsible for age-structured components of the population and more specifically for the health problems of the elderly.

New Brunswick⁽⁴⁾ has recently appointed an Extended Care Consultant to provide consultative and advisory services to all divisions of Health. There is also an inter-departmental Committee on the Care of the Aged.

Although there are many services being provided to the aged, it has not been deemed necessary to establish a separate department to correlate the function of such services in Nova Scotia⁽⁵⁾ or to Newfoundland.⁽⁶⁾ In Prince Edward Island⁽⁷⁾ there is a Division of Aging in the Department of Social Services but not in the Department of Health.

Recommendation 36

That the data related to the aged which is provided by provincial hospitalization and health insurance schemes be more fully analyzed, interpreted and made more readily available.

ACTION TAKEN

Statistics Canada staff coordinates information provided by the provinces. The staff do not analyze information re specific age groups.

A change has been made in the statistical program to show a breakdown in the category age 65 and over into 65-74 and 75 in the annual publication of hospital separations from 1969 onwards.⁽⁸⁾

Recommendation 37

That statistics relating to the health of the aged, as currently assembled by the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, be reviewed with a view to their extension and improvement: and that in this connection particular attention be given to the definition of various kinds of sheltered accommodation.

ACTION TAKEN

Statistics are always under review and a working party on patient classification system has produced a revised draft which is now with the provinces for study. Other changes which have taken place are:

- (1) The publication of new primary sites of malignant neoplasms by age, including 65-69, 70-74, 75-79, 80-84 and 85.
- (2) The initiation of a program to list and survey special care facilities which would include nursing homes and homes for the aged. Funds are currently being sought to accelerate and improve the coverage of this survey.⁽⁹⁾

Recommendation 38

That greater financial assistance be provided for research into the nature of aging, the cause and control of diseases and disabilities with a high incidence among old people, and into the effectiveness of existing programs of prevention, diagnosis, treatment and rehabilitation.

ACTION TAKEN

The Deputy Minister of Health made the following statement to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs on May 20, 1971:

"I do not think we have figures on geriatrics... (It) is pretty hard to identify as being geriatric research because cardiology, for example, or respiratory disease research—a lot of it is for geriatric patients. It is not identified as such..."

"I think a lot of the research which is not called geriatrics is really research in geriatrics."

The following is taken from the introduction to Volume I, "Aging in Manitoba, Needs and Resources, 1971"—

"Historically, within the field of special gerontology and that of health and welfare services to the aged, research has proceeded at an irregular pace with a great diversity of problems being investigated. Both the problems being considered and the pacing have reflected continuously changing emphases with resultant stop-gap measures to cope with pressing problems in a manner appropriate to emergency solutions rather than to long-range planning..."⁽¹⁰⁾

Recommendation 51

That consideration be given to the advisability of establishing a committee of knowledgeable citizens to be advisory to the minister and the department or agency on all aspects of social housing.

ACTION TAKEN

In Newfoundland⁽¹⁾ the Newfoundland Association for the Aging has been organized with the objective of bringing the housing and other needs of the aging to the attention of the government and the public generally. There is close liaison between organization and the Newfoundland and Labrador Housing Corporation (1967).

The Nova Scotia⁽²⁾ Housing Commission and its Executive Committee are composed of knowledgeable citizens to whom staff members are responsible.

There is a Board of Directors of the New Brunswick⁽³⁾ Housing Corporation charged with this task. In addition the province has a committee on Care for the Aged and a Task Force on Housing Needs. The Department of Social Service has a "Desk for the Aged" to provide advisory services.

The Prince Edward Island⁽⁴⁾ Housing Authority (1969) has a Board of Directors representative of citizens from outside the Public Service. In cooperation with the Department of Development and CMHC, an Island study of housing requirements is being undertaken.

Quebec⁽⁵⁾ now has regional health and social service councils charged with the responsibility of encouraging regions to define their housing priorities and submit their plans. The councils will regulate and supervise charitable institutions within their territory, presumably including non-profit housing sponsors.

Ontario⁽⁶⁾ Housing Corporation's Board of Directors has representatives along the lines suggested.

Manitoba⁽⁷⁾ has no citizens advisory committee as such. An effort is made to involve senior citizens through meetings with various groups both urban and rural.

Saskatchewan⁽⁸⁾—The Saskatchewan Housing Corporation Act (1973) provides for the establishment of a Housing Advisory Committee.

Alberta⁽⁹⁾ Housing Act provides for an Alberta Housing Advisory Committee which to date (August 73) has not been constituted. Annual briefs are submitted by Alberta Senior Citizens Homes Association and Alberta Council on Aging. Only in 1970 did the province take advantage of NHA funds to assist its housing foundations program for elderly.

The administration of public housing in British Columbia⁽¹⁰⁾ is undergoing a restructuring at the present time. The British Columbia Housing Management Commission created in 1967 brought together the three levels of public servants involved in housing: two representatives from CMHC, two from the province and one from the municipality.

Recommendation 56

That the provincial department or agency accept as a matter of principle the importance of enabling old people to continue in their own homes as long as possible and that where group living short of medical care, is desired or required, it be provided in relatively small projects scattered throughout the community rather than in large institutions.

ACTION TAKEN

The principle of enabling older people to stay in their own homes as long as possible is generally accepted across Canada but few provinces have taken constructive action to assist those occupying privately owned homes.

The National Housing Act has provision for rehabilitation grants to improve neighbourhoods, but as of September 1973 not all provinces* had signed the federal-provincial arrangements.

Provinces differ as to the best location for senior citizen housing: Manitoba prefers to build close to downtown, within walking distances of shops and amenities; in New Brunswick public housing may only be built in municipalities with hospitals and auxiliary homes. To overcome the difficulties faced by the elderly who have to go to shopping centres for their marketing, a modern senior citizen development at Pierrefonds, Quebec, provides free transportation for its residents to nearby shopping centres.

"Beyond Shelter"⁽¹¹⁾ records that, up to 1970, of the 746 developments built under the provisions of the National Housing Act, 244 developments or 33 per cent had 20 or less dwelling units and/or hostel beds; 153 developments or 20 per cent had 21-40 units and/or hostel beds; 199 developments or 27 per cent had 41-80 units and/or hostel beds; 95 developments or 13 per cent had 81-149 units and/or hostel beds; and 55 developments or 7 per cent had 150 or more units and/or hostel beds. Thirty-two per cent were located in metropolitan areas; 7 per cent were situated in major urban areas and 61 per cent in small towns.

A British Columbia study of community care for seniors, included among "Pressing Needs" supportive services to help maintain the elderly in their own homes, including assistance with shopping, home repairs, library services and transportation. Sixty per cent of the home-makers interviewed indicated a wide gap in this service to senior citizens.⁽¹⁾

The Prairie Provinces lead in this field. In May 1973 Saskatchewan⁽²⁾ passed Bill No. 59 which provides for grants to certain elderly persons to assist them in making repairs to their homes with a view to enabling them to remain independent longer. Manitoba's⁽³⁾ provincial employment program included work activity projects directed towards improving the standard of housing privately owned by senior citizens. The program has now reached out to 10,000 homes and is judged a success. The Alberta⁽⁴⁾ Hospital Services Commission is giving a priority to home care programs to enable the elderly to remain as long as possible in their own homes. Programs are already available in cities and a few towns and plans are underway to extend the services to smaller communities.

In November 1973 the Minister of Social Affairs for the Province of Quebec⁽⁵⁾ released a "White Paper" which set out proposals to establish policy for those in "The Third Age" group. The main emphasis is on future planning oriented toward community assistance to enable the elderly to remain in their own homes as long as possible.

The Advisory Task Force on Housing Policy⁽⁶⁾ submitted its report to the Province of Ontario in June 1973. Forty-six briefs were submitted to the Task Force and fifteen public meetings were held dealing with special housing needs of senior citizens. All aspects of housing problems were covered: the need for "in-home services" to assist more elderly people to remain in their homes, the pros and cons of high-rise buildings, the type of units, integration with young adults with children, etc. The Ontario Welfare Council⁽⁷⁾ has been working with senior citizen groups, with elderly individuals and with relevant social agencies to find out what the priority problems are and what might be done to relieve them with special emphasis on helping the elderly to maintain their independence. Recommendations will be included in the Agency's 1974 annual brief to the Ontario Government.

New Brunswick⁽⁸⁾ endorses the objective of maintaining senior citizens in self-contained accommodation. Group homes are usually small.

The Nova Scotia Housing Corporation,⁽⁹⁾ through the Municipal Housing Authorities, only accommodates those elderly people who wish to move from their existing housing. The type of building used by N.S.H.C. ensures continued independent living with the advantages of being part of a group in cases of emergency and for reasons of social comfort. Only in the Halifax Metropolitan Area is the N.S.H.C. forced, by reasons of economics, to build senior citizen housing projects of greater size than twenty to thirty apartments.

The Prince Edward Island Housing Authority⁽¹⁰⁾ policy is to supply senior citizens' housing in localities in or near where the demand has been established. In most instances units have been built in small groups—generally six to ten units on any one site. The main exception to this has been in Charlottetown.

Newfoundland⁽¹¹⁾ also agrees with the concept and assists wherever a need is demonstrated.

Recommendation 59

That, with the advice and financial assistance of the two senior levels of Government, each municipality survey the nature and extent of local need and develop a comprehensive and balanced plan for meeting it, with the understanding that such plan must fit in with that of the province, and at the same time be integrated with the municipality's own total housing program.

ACTION TAKEN

As a result of amendments to the National Housing Act, the Federal Government provides 90 per cent of financing and the province the other 10 per cent which means that the municipality has no financial responsibility to assume in respect of housing accommodation. Newfoundland⁽¹²⁾ and Prince Edward Island⁽¹³⁾ assume full responsibility for the programs for the municipalities (except in the few large centres in each province) because of the lack of any economic base in the municipalities. Studies are now being carried out in this area by New Brunswick.⁽¹⁴⁾

Nova Scotia⁽¹⁵⁾ requires a resolution from the municipality.

As of the Summer of 1973, Ontario⁽¹⁾ required the municipality to determine its need if family and senior citizen housing is managed by a Housing Authority. The Ontario Task Force report of August 1973 criticized the system prevailing during the period of its review:

"Municipal development regulations are almost always administered in the absence of a municipal housing policy. The housing goals of most municipalities are not explicitly formulated, but are simply implicit in the numerical distribution of population and residential density. These are intended to control the development of land rather than ensure adequate accommodation. Regional development planning is a provincial responsibility, but proceeds with little reference to housing... The Province has indicated that it intends to delegate responsibility and authority for regulating community development to municipalities particularly at the regional municipality level. The formulation and application of provincial regional plans has proceeded with little regard to this intention, at least in the Central Ontario Region."⁽²⁾

Manitoba⁽³⁾ and Saskatchewan⁽⁴⁾ emphasize that they implement housing programs in close cooperation with the municipality which must substantiate any requests made to the province. Saskatchewan has a research team investigating the need for additional housing especially in smaller municipalities which were formerly excluded from the Act. Alberta⁽⁵⁾ develops its planning and programs in collaboration with the municipalities.

Recommendation 60

That through the cooperation of municipal health and welfare departments and with financial aid from the Provincial Government ancillary services be made available and accessible to elderly people.

ACTION TAKEN

Supportive programs which help elderly persons to remain active and involved in their community and to remain in their own home need to be expanded to be accessible and responsive to the distinctive needs of the elderly. They are:

- Meals on wheels
- Friendly visiting
- Telephone checks
- Transportation
- Counselling
- Information
- Home Aid
- Day Care
- Recreational and social clubs

Employment skills unlimited Sheltered workshops etc.

In British Columbia over 50% of the supportive services to the elderly, such as meals on wheels, friendly visiting, recreational camps and summer centres for seniors are being provided by church groups or informal groups of persons rendering supportive person-to-person services. These programs were developed and operated by volunteers. More than fifty per cent of the volunteers in the programs are over 65 years of age. Some 70 senior citizens located in key population areas throughout British Columbia⁽⁶⁾ assist their contemporaries to solve their problems whatever they may be. The Counsellors are volunteers who are assisted financially with individual expenses up to $40 a month. The program was administered by the Division of Aging, Department of Rehabilitation and Social Improvement.

In Ontario, the Community Care Services (Metropolitan Toronto) Incorporated evolved because of the desire of voluntary services to cooperate with groups providing complementary services. It is a type of umbrella organization that deals with all levels of government, with other voluntary groups and with funding sources with and on behalf of the groups involved. It makes use of the provisions of the Elderly Persons Centres Act, 1966 and Regulations.⁽⁷⁾

The Canadian Council on Social Development, Beyond Shelter⁽⁸⁾ reported that public housing residents had a considerably lower rate of physical incapacity than non-profit housing residents: 76 per cent of public housing developments reported that over three-quarters of their residents had no physical incapacity—compared with 55 per cent of non-profit developments. This difference may be accounted for by the large proportion of hostel accommodation in the non-profit sector. There was not a great deal of regional variation in residents' health—except in Quebec. There only nine per cent of developments reported that over three-quarters of their residents had no physical incapacities.

The Study also reported that a homemaker service was available as a special development service in 7% of the developments and as a community service in 33%. A homemaker service was available in four per cent of the self-contained developments, compared with 18 per cent of the hostels and mixed developments. In 39% of the self-contained developments it was available in the community. Such services are more likely to be available in Ontario and least likely in the Atlantic Provinces.

Meal delivery was available in six per cent of the developments; in another 32 per cent it was available as a general community service. This service is more likely to be available in metropolitan and large urban areas than in small towns. Again it is more available in Ontario than in other provinces.

Home nursing was supplied as a special development service by public health nurses or the Victorian Order in only eight per cent of the developments; in another 65% it was available as a general community service. Seventy-five per cent of self-contained developments had the service available from the community. Home nursing was most available in Ontario and least available in Quebec. This is explained by the fact that most Quebec developments have nurses on their own staff although not necessarily providing "home nursing" to particular residents.⁽¹⁾

Only nineteen per cent of the developments provided a regular medical checkup for residents. In 11% it was provided on site and in the other 8% in the community. Again such a service was more available in metropolitan developments than in major urban and small town areas. A full-time physician was on staff in only two developments. In three per cent a physician made regular daily or weekly visits. In another 29% a doctor was available on call. Of course a physician was more likely to be available to developments with a high proportion of incapacitated residents—and much more likely in Quebec.

Telephone contact service was operated in 17% of the developments surveyed, and was most likely to be available in British Columbia, Quebec, Prairies, Ontario and Atlantic Provinces, in that order.

Volunteer transportation was being provided for 24 per cent of all developments; thirty per cent of non-profit developments had service but only 14% of the public housing developments for senior citizens. Public transport systems were non-existent or ineffective in most developments. The Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto considered the lack of adequate public transportation as a special problem in their 1973 report. "It is not only access to transportation that is important. Suggested improvements include consideration of vehicle design, rerouting buses, maintaining buses on subway lines and adjusting traffic signals and safety installations."⁽²⁾

Many municipalities provide cheaper transportation to their senior citizens. The Provincial Government in British Columbia, according to the annual report of the Department of Rehabilitation and Social Improvement (March 1972) subsidize British Columbia Hydro bus transportation for a nominal fee, valid in the Greater Victoria and Greater Vancouver areas.⁽³⁾

The Manitoba Housing and Renewal Corporation⁽⁴⁾ reports that they require any plan submitted to them for the housing of elderly people to include space for centres which are generally organized on behalf of the tenants by the tenants or by private social agencies.

The Department of Social Affairs, Province of Quebec⁽⁵⁾ has announced new policies for the care of the aged. The emphasis is now on providing supportive services to the aged to enable them to maintain their independence.

Recommendation 61

That the municipal department or agency responsible for housing cooperate with other municipal departments and voluntary organizations in the community in the establishment of advisory and referral centres to assist old people with their housing and other problems related to their changing conditions and needs.

ACTION TAKEN

With few exceptions organized information and referral services are operated as a department or services of social planning councils in large centres. Elderly people seem to be unaware of the services offered and do not usually consult them.

British Columbia has its senior citizen counsellor program who are assisted financially with individual expenses up to $40 a month. Referral Services are provided to a limited degree from the Provincial Department of Rehabilitation and Social Improvement, from private family agencies and centres in Vancouver and Victoria. Skilled counselling services are very limited throughout the province. Information centres have been set up in many communities in the Lower mainland. These are community operated to offer assistance to all age groups.⁽⁶⁾

The Prairie Provinces seem to be particularly well organized in this field, e.g., the Alberta⁽⁷⁾ Housing Corporation has a liaison with the Hospital Services Commission and the Department of Social Development as well as a consulting service with the Alberta Senior Citizens' Homes Association and the Alberta Council on Aging. In Manitoba⁽⁸⁾ the Age and Opportunity Bureau in Winnipeg is active in this area and in Saskatchewan⁽⁹⁾ there are advisory and referral centres to assist the elderly with their housing and other problems. These include the Provincial Inquiry Centre, Community Switch Boards, Senior Citizens' Commissions. The province also assists in the organization and support of pensioners organizations in all communities throughout the province.

In Ontario⁽¹⁾ the housing element is the responsibility of the Ontario Housing Corporation while the other elements are channeled through the appropriate Ministries.

New Brunswick⁽²⁾ has an interdepartmental committee which is now in the process of studying such problems as setting up adequate advisory facilities for its senior citizens. In Nova Scotia⁽³⁾ the municipality housing committee is in contact with municipal welfare and health departments but does not have a formal referral system. In Prince Edward Island⁽⁴⁾ and Newfoundland⁽⁵⁾ the Provincial Housing Corporation will be organizing activities because of the small economic base.

Recommendation 62

That changes be made in zoning laws where necessary to make a variety of housing accommodation, such as cooperative residences, small houses and flats, boarding houses, etc., more widely available throughout the community.

ACTION TAKEN

In most provinces the municipality initiates by resolution its requirement for public housing for the elderly and for others requiring low cost housing accommodation. If there is a local Housing Authority it establishes the need and the method to carry out the project. The Provincial Corporation has the overall responsibility as it finances the project and assumes responsibility to completion.

Canada's small rural towns present special problems to those wanting to develop satisfying housing for the elderly chiefly because the population base is too small to afford many public facilities and services. New Brunswick⁽⁶⁾ uses central planning to probably a greater extent than other provinces. Zoning is a municipal responsibility. Prince Edward Island⁽⁷⁾ has special arrangements with CMHC whereby senior citizens units are constructed on sites not served by sewage collection and treatment because of the many areas in Prince Edward Island which have not this service.

The Nova Scotia⁽⁸⁾ Housing Commission is attempting to make full use of the available by-laws in its land assembly areas to make a wide variety of housing available to the public. The Newfoundland and Labrador⁽⁹⁾ Housing Corporation is investigating current and future needs of housing for the aged; they will be working closely with Municipal Governments particularly in the larger urban centres.

The Prairie Provinces state that because of the availability of land, zoning has not become a problem. In Saskatchewan⁽¹⁰⁾ it has not been necessary to change the zoning laws to allow for a variety of housing accommodation for the elderly. Because of the relative availability of land, the types of houses constructed have met with zoning regulations and where there have been minor technicalities involved, the municipal councils have been very co-operative in allowing minor changes to permit the construction of the desired units. Alberta⁽¹¹⁾ has encountered no major problems in zoning and the Housing Corporation reported that the co-operation of the municipalities has been excellent. Zoning procedures in Manitoba⁽¹²⁾ provide for a general mix of housing types. It has been regarded by the Manitoba Housing Corporation as a wise policy to try to disperse housing as much as possible throughout the community to avoid the problems created by adverse community reaction to huge housing projects.

That the municipal department or agency include on its staff one or more specialized persons to assist voluntary sponsoring groups and, in particular, to provide information regarding monies available from all sources, building regulations, local bylaws, siting, procedures, etc.

ACTION TAKEN

Few municipalities have staff qualified to assist voluntary sponsoring groups except to refer them to the proper Housing Authority which is qualified to do this. Town Clerks are qualified to supply information regarding zoning bylaws, etc.

Recommendation 65

That Municipal Governments accept responsibility for providing leadership and initiative in the planning and development of the range of community services required for the well-being of old people, themselves establishing or financing those services that fall under their statutory jurisdiction while working with voluntary agencies or other levels of Government in the establishment of others.

Recommendation 66

- (a) That on the initiative of the Municipal Government, the local welfare council or other appropriate body, a representative committee, including appointees from the Municipal Government, be established for the purpose of surveying the local situation with respect to community services and facilities available to old people, and
- (b) That this committee include in its investigation not only those health and welfare services, such as visiting nurses and homemakers, which would enable the aged to live in their own homes rather than in institutions, but also facilities and programs in the areas of recreation, education and community service which would enable them to continue as participating and contributing members of society, and
- (c) That on the basis of the above survey, a plan be developed (i) to ensure communication and co-operation among all organizations and groups seeking to serve the aged and (ii) to extend and improve existing facilities and programs, and to establish new ones as required, and
- (d) That in the implementation of this plan financial and technical help be sought from provincial and federal authorities along the lines indicated in later sections of these recommendations.

ACTION TAKEN

In Newfoundland⁽¹⁾ and Prince Edward Island⁽²⁾ the province accepts the overall province-wide leadership in arranging community programs because of a lack of a financial base in small communities.

In 1968 Halifax, Nova Scotia⁽³⁾ established a Social Planning Department which recommends programs and services to meet the needs of the elderly and to collaborate with others to provide an umbrella of services. In 1971 a study was carried out by the city of Halifax on the Problems Encountered by Aging.

In Quebec,⁽⁴⁾ health and welfare are provincial matters; the municipalities only show an interest in recreation and leisure programs.

The Ontario⁽⁵⁾ Select Committee on Aging, 1967, reiterated the views expressed by the Senate Committee Recommendations. Sixty per cent of the recommendations of the Select Committee have been fully or partially implemented. The remainder are still under review or are considered "not practical for Ontario alone without cooperative changes at the federal level" or are no longer applicable.

In Manitoba,⁽⁶⁾ the Provincial Government accepts responsibility for overall province-wide leadership, and only in the city of Winnipeg, through its public health program, does a municipality take an active role. The Department of Health and Social Development has undertaken an extensive survey of the needs and resources concerning older persons. Volume one was published in 1973⁽⁷⁾

In Saskatchewan⁽⁸⁾ the Municipal Governments are becoming increasingly involved in encouraging the development of community services for the aged. Provincial grants are made to community based projects such as meals-on-wheels, information and referral services, etc. The Municipal Parks and Recreation Boards in most provinces take an active part in providing facilities for older people and in arranging programs for them.

The 1973 study on the needs of the elderly in Alberta⁽⁹⁾ recommended that at the local level in Edmonton, the Social Service Advisory Committee assume a coordinating role, acting on behalf of all city departments in closer liaison with private agencies.

The Social Planning and Review Council of British Columbia completed a study of the needs of the aged in British Columbia.⁽¹⁰⁾ At the moment British Columbia is in the midst of considerable reorganization of its social services, and further information is not available.

Generally speaking, the services and resources available to elderly people depend to a large extent on municipal funds, the demand on these funds and the local potential for planning and developing programs. All services must be supported by the total citizen group by taxes, voluntary efforts and contributions. The financial assistance provided under the Canada Assistance Plan has been effective in releasing funds of voluntary agencies to accelerate community projects.

Senior citizen groups are very active in all provinces but they are not supported from public funds. A few organizations such as "The Good Companions" in Ottawa receive assistance from the United Appeal and, in this case, the accommodation was provided by a local service organization.

The Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto in their "Trend Series, 1972-73" remark:

"Existing service systems are changing but remain inadequate to meet the demands for services by the elderly. What is needed is a concept for a continuum of services and facilities from which individuals can select in accordance with current and changing needs. To this end it is necessary to examine the range of requirements of those in need of services, modify patterns of delivery and create more and possibly new systems tailored to the requirements of the elderly..."

Administrators of health and social services are becoming extremely sensitive to social, economic and political forces and to their impact on their institutions. Such administrators are well on their way to bringing about changes that are required to make our hospitals comprehensive community health centres.

The Government is becoming the enunciator of social policy on health and social service matters and increasingly a purchaser of services. Services are beginning to change from a production to a marketing orientation and organizations are looking to the people they serve."⁽¹⁾

That the Municipal Government, through its local public welfare department where such has been instituted, accept responsibility for seeing that an information and referral centre is established for the use of old people and others in the community seeking advice on their problems.

ACTION TAKEN

Neighbourhood information centres are to be found in many Canadian cities in a variety of shapes and guises. Information Centres: A Handbook for Canadian Communities,⁽²⁾ published by the Consumers' Association of Canada lists Information Centres in Canada. The following table⁽³⁾ illustrates the number of Information Centres by province:

Some are financed entirely through local United Appeal contributions, some entirely by their Municipal Government and others through a mixture of Government grants and contributions from the community at large and/or from voluntary organizations. A review of community information centres for all age groups was carried out by the Government of Canada in December 1970.

In March of the same year the Canadian Welfare Council (now the Canadian Council on Social Development) issued a report of their Committee of the Division on Aging on Information and Referral Services for the Aged in Canada.⁽⁴⁾ They found that direct services for the aged were in short supply practically everywhere in Canada. With few exceptions, organized information and referral services are operated as departments or services of social planning councils in large centres. Services provided appeared to be oriented to the types of problems which the general public identified with "welfare". The bulk of the information was given by telephone and personal visits were discouraged.⁽⁵⁾

In the Spring of 1971 the Canadian Council on Social Development initiated a National Consultation on Community Information and Referral Services.⁽⁶⁾ The steering committee in its recommendations emphasized the necessity for the neighbourhood information centre to reflect the characteristics, needs and aspirations of the neighbourhood in which it operates and that the centre should be supported but not controlled by funding bodies including Governments. Among the guiding principles to be followed was the recommendation that the centre should provide information to cover all aspects of social development including: income security, social welfare, health, manpower and employment, recreation, legal assistance, consumer protection. The Report set out the responsibilities of the three levels of Government: Federal, Provincial and Municipal.

Partners in Information, a study of community centres in Ontario, was published in December 1971. At that time some 15 provincially supported centres were included in the study.⁽⁷⁾

In 1971 the Consumers' Association of Canada sponsored a study of community information centres in Canada. The study, undertaken in conjunction with the Canadian Computer-Communications Task Force, presented a comprehensive overview of the centres, their functions and activities.⁽⁸⁾ As a follow-up the Association sponsored a further investigation with the assistance of the Federal Department of Communications with the special view of determining the role of data banks in assisting the centres in handling requests for information for their users.

A Handbook for Canadian Communities—Information Centres (1973)—has been compiled and is being prepared for publication. It lists the various centres throughout Canada showing the various groups which the centre serves such as native people, ethnic groups, immigrants, alcoholics, drug addicts, welfare and legal requirements, etc. Senior Citizen Information is provided by some centres.

Basic services are available in British Columbia through the provincial offices of Rehabilitation and Social Improvement, from private agencies in Vancouver and Victoria and from the social services departments of several hospitals. SPARC survey in 1972 reported that skilled counselling services were limited throughout the province.⁽¹⁾

The survey on the medical problems and the use of medical services among Senior Citizens in Alberta⁽²⁾ found that the physician was the "father confessor" for the aged rather than organized services of which the elderly were frequently unaware. It was found that counselling, a necessary health-related service for the aged, was badly needed. The Annual Report of the Alberta Health and Social Department 1971-72 lists three information and Referral Centres in its preventative social services.

Saskatchewan⁽³⁾ reports that some communities have information and referral services established by interested people in the area. They rely heavily on provincial subsidy. In Manitoba⁽⁴⁾ information and referral centres are available in larger urban areas such as Winnipeg and Brandon. The main information and referral services, outside Government offices, used by the elderly in Winnipeg are those offered by the Age and Opportunity Centre, a private agency funded by United Way and provincial and municipal grants.

Recommendation 69

That the Municipal Government, through its public welfare department where such has been established, and the voluntary family welfare agency, if such exists, extend and improve counselling services to old people, and that, under the auspices of one or both, a carefully supervised foster home placement service for old people be developed.

ACTION TAKEN

The problem of terminology is encountered under this item. In some provinces "foster home" refers to homes for children only; in other provinces it relates to persons released from mental institutions who still require some degree of supervision and are placed with private families who provide the necessary care and supervision.

The 1972 study conducted by the Social Planning and Review Council of British Columbia⁽⁵⁾ concluded that skilled counselling was very limited throughout the province although some 70 volunteers are paid a nominal sum by the province to provide advice and referral services to the elderly at various places throughout the province. The study recommended that there be an increase in counselling services at the municipal level to assist those senior citizens who wish to maintain their own homes. British Columbia in 1972 had some 7,400 beds in licensed boarding home care facilities, i.e., for mobile persons whose physical and/or mental disability is such that they need supervision. These homes are licensed under the Community Care Facilities Licensing Act if the capacity is over three boarders.

The 1973 report on the problem and the use of medical services among the senior citizens in Alberta⁽⁶⁾ observed that present programs tend to overlook the vast majority of senior citizens who live on their own and attempt to remain independent. "More health and related programs should be of the 'outreach home-centered' variety. Programs today rely too often on individual initiative and physician care exclusively. . . . Greater efforts should be made towards the establishment of counselling and visitor programs to help reduce feelings of anxiety and loneliness among the elderly." The Annual Report of the Department of Health and Social Development for Alberta, 1971-72 commented that they were working towards the acquisition of private homes for patients discharged from hospitals.

Saskatchewan⁽⁷⁾ reports that there are no counselling centres set up specifically for the aged nor are there supervised foster homes placements available to the elderly in the province.

In Manitoba⁽⁸⁾ counselling services are available in Winnipeg and the large urban centres; otherwise the availability and quality vary. Provincial Care Services in Winnipeg provide a program for those in need of out-of-hospital care, including foster homes.

One of the recommendations of the Ontario⁽⁹⁾ Select Committee on Aging 1967 was that studies be initiated of requirements in each region of Ontario for domiciliary, sheltered and foster care for aged persons. This has been done. Homes for special care and supervised boarding homes come under the Ontario Nursing Homes Act. The term "foster home" is usually reserved for accommodation for children. In 1967 counselling on family and individual problems of aging was available in 20 Ontario cities at family service agencies.

The economic status of municipalities in Newfoundland⁽¹⁾ and Prince Edward Island⁽²⁾ do not permit independent programs. Provincial authorities assume responsibility except in the capital cities where voluntary organizations participate.

Nova Scotia⁽³⁾ has been active in the foster home program for adults discharged from mental hospitals. Municipalities share in the cost and are active in the regional boards. The city of Halifax reported that a shortage of foster homes prevented them from launching a more extensive program to provide for others.

Recommendation 70

That local institutions and agencies serving adults, including the schools and universities, the churches, social agencies, the public library, art galleries and museums, community centres and other recreational groups, experiment with changes in their programs and procedures with a view to encouraging greater participation on the part of older people.

ACTION TAKEN

There has been an increased awareness of the senior citizen all across Canada. They enjoy reduced fares on almost every form of transportation, public buses, airlines, etc. However, some municipalities have not found it possible to reduce fares for senior citizens on local transportation facilities. (Example—Halifax). Admission to theatres is also available at a reduced rate and the National Arts Centre in Ottawa not only provides reduced admission prices for some events but also arranges special programs for senior citizens.

The United Church of Canada prepared an outline of a series of evening programs to assist congregations who are concerned with the problems of the aged.⁽⁴⁾ Within the past year, the United Church of Canada has also engaged a commercial research organization in Toronto to study various aspects of the requirements of the elderly.⁽⁵⁾ The theme for the social action branch of The Canadian Catholic Conferences in 1972 was the rights, dignity and needs of the elderly to promote parochial action in this field.⁽⁶⁾

Senior citizens are organized across the country and have been very effective in making their cultural and recreational requirements known to their municipalities. In Ottawa civic staff of the Department of Parks and Recreation are working at 20 subsidized housing developments, supervising recreation programs such as swimming, crafts classes, etc. The city also provides transportation to various events organized by voluntary agencies. Community colleges and some universities provide courses in continuing education which are of interest to senior citizens. Pre-retirement courses are also offered at the secondary education level in most large centres and in regional secondary schools.

A Canadian Institute of Religion and Gerontology is being organized in Toronto with the aim of helping churches and religious orders to set up programs for the aging for retirement. It is also hoped to provide enriching study for senior citizens in such subjects as cultures, scripture, etc.⁽⁷⁾

That municipalities, in seeking to fill the gaps between existing and needed services and facilities, give particular attention to the possibility of establishing homemakers' services and day-care centres.

ACTION TAKEN

A "homemaker" differs from the domestic in that he or she works under professional supervision. In some areas training is mandatory, some being provided at community college level, whereas in other areas no special training is required. In the period 1958-69 the total number of homemakers in Canada increased more than five-fold, much of this increase having been aided by federal cost-sharing since 1969 under the Canada Assistance Plan. A survey⁽⁸⁾ by the Canadian Council on Social Development released in March 1971 reported that homemaker services tend to be concentrated in the larger cities with 42% of the agencies and two out of every three homemakers located in urban centres of over 100,000 population. Within Canada the supply of homemakers was unevenly distributed as between provinces and population centres of different sizes. At that time Manitoba was the most favourably endowed with the equivalent of 32 full-time homemakers per 100,000 population, followed by British Columbia with 21 and Ontario with

11. The survey covered the total need for homemakers by families including the elderly. Rural areas and communities under 10,000 population were the least well served with the notable exception of British Columbia. Beyond Shelter⁽¹⁾ (1973) reported that homemaker service was available in 7% of the NHA developments and as a community service in another 33%. The service was most likely to be available in Ontario and least likely in the Maritime Provinces.

The cost of the service to the recipient is geared to income; the recipient of an old age pension with the supplement pays nothing whereas those with independent income pay the full cost. The local United Appeal usually contribute to the cost of this program.

The Visiting Homemakers Association of Canada located in Ottawa report a shortage of homemakers to meet the demand for their services.

The term "Day Care Centre" is usually associated with the care of children. Because of this it is impossible to determine from provincial annual reports whether the statistics refer to "Day Care Centres" for children or the elderly. Prince Edward Island⁽²⁾ reported that there were no day care centres for the elderly and Halifax was endeavouring to find a location for one centre.⁽³⁾ Ottawa⁽⁴⁾ in the fall of 1973 opened its first Day Care Centre for the elderly and it is reported that the great deterrent is the lack of transportation to and from the centre.

The Social Planning and Review Council of British Columbia⁽⁵⁾ reported that Vancouver is in the process of developing personal care and supervision along with socialization and activity programs. Vancouver has one Day Care Centre and the North Shore area under a LIP program has established a need for such a service.

A day hospital is a facility which enables patients to arrive in the morning, spend several hours in therapeutic activity and return home the same day. In March 1971 the Health and Social Development Minister of Alberta announced that three geriatric "day" hospitals would be established in Edmonton and Calgary, on a pilot project basis.⁽⁶⁾ Two will be located in Calgary, the other in Edmonton.

Recommendation 72

That careful consideration be given also by Municipal Governments to the need for sheltered workshops open to all persons in the community, including the aged, who are unlikely to enter or re-enter the labour market, but who require work activity in a protected setting.

ACTION TAKEN

The Canadian Council on Social Development in their survey of NHA-financed housing for the elderly found that there were crafts rooms in 25 per cent of the developments; in another 12 per cent there was one nearby in the community.⁽⁷⁾ Such a room was much less likely to be available in self-contained units than in hostel and mixed accommodation; only 13 per cent of self-contained developments had a crafts room, compared with 61 per cent of hostel and mixed. A crafts room was more likely to be in non-metropolitan areas.

Senior Citizen Organizations have taken advantage of grants under New Horizons to establish handicraft centres where articles are produced for sale; such centres are to be found in St. John's, Newfoundland and in Sydney, Nova Scotia.

There are only two sheltered workshops for the elderly in Canada; both of these are operated by Jewish welfare organizations, one in Toronto and one in Montreal.

Recommendation 73

That, in line with their constitutional responsibility for the provision of essential welfare, educational and recreational services, Provincial Governments give particular attention to the serious gaps and deficiencies currently existing in all of these fields, as they relate to the needs of old people.

Recommendation 74

That, with a view to bringing about the changes called for in the above situation, Provincial Governments through their departments of health, welfare and education provide strong leadership to local communities and in particular assist their efforts through initiating and publicizing a program of technical advice and field service and through the preparation of materials for program planning and staff training.

ACTION TAKEN

Although all the provinces are falling short in what should be done to fill the serious gaps and deficiencies existing in all fields related to senior citizens, most provinces are as active as their budgets permit, taking into account the demands made by other problems such as pollution control, etc. Some of the provinces have divisions on aging.

Since 1967 the functions of the Division on Aging in the Department of Rehabilitation and Social Improvement for the Province of British Columbia⁽¹⁾ have been gradually directed toward service-oriented programs for the elderly. Over 70 senior citizens located in key population areas throughout the province assist their contemporaries to solve their problems whatever they may be. These counsellors are volunteers who are assisted financially with individual expenses up to $40 a month.

Persons in receipt of any portion of the Federal guaranteed income supplement of the Provincial Supplementary Social Allowance are entitled to free transportation over the British Columbia Bus system in Greater Vancouver and Greater Victoria on payment of a $5 fee every six months.

Over 25 activity centres for adult handicapped persons during the period under review were assisted in various amounts from $300 to $1,700 per month.

The Division on Aging maintains almost daily contact with many senior citizen and pensioner organizations.

In Alberta a joint (Alberta Council on Aging and Department of Health and Social Development) study of the general needs of institutionalized and noninstitutionalized senior citizens across Alberta was scheduled for 1973. The pilot project on Senior Citizens in Alberta⁽²⁾ (1973) stressed the need for more activities for Senior citizens.

The Senior Citizens Commission of Saskatchewan assumed the responsibility of examining deficiencies and making recommendations regarding new programs, especially for small communities. Their report⁽³⁾ issued in January, 1974, recommended that the provincial government establish an Agency as part of a new deal for the elderly in Saskatchewan. Guidelines for the duties and responsibilities of various levels of this Agency are outlined.

The Manitoba⁽⁴⁾ Department of Health and Social Development reported that the Provincial Government has taken more responsibility over the past decade in the development of courses for staffs in care facilities, for encouraging and assisting administrators of care facilities in developing programs, holding seminars and particularly in assisting care facilities in the development of activity programs and the training of staff for such.

In 1967 Ontario⁽⁵⁾ established a Select Committee on Aging. As of October 1973 42% of the recommendations of the Committee which dealt with all aspects of aging, had been implemented and another 18% had been partially implemented. There was a 9% increase in the implementation of recommendations between May 1971 and October 1973. In March 1970 the Department of Social and Family Services of the Ontario Government held the first Ontario Elderly Persons Centres Conference to discuss the best way to develop a provincial network of high quality day centres for older people. Again in Ontario the province sets aside one week each year devoted to the aging. Kits are prepared and sent to communities and organizations; in 1973 the emphasis was on "Living can be Ageless". For the first time the Provincial Government introduced a province-wide pre-retirement campaign directed toward men and women who are 40 years of age and over.

During the years 1967-70 the Government of Quebec⁽⁶⁾ funded a program to train people in the specialized care of older persons. The program was conducted by the Grey Nuns of Montreal.

Nova Scotia⁽⁷⁾ has a Social Development and Rehabilitation Division within its Welfare Department which emphasizes the importance of community participation to determine the needs of the people. During 1971-72, 30 students were employed to plan activity programs in 15 Homes for the Aged and Disabled. There is also a Social Research and Planning Division which serves as a coordinating and resource body for the planning and organization of research projects, studies and briefs relating to the changing needs of the Department and as an instrument for disseminating information on welfare programs in Nova Scotia. One of the projects has been the preparation of a directory of social services in the Halifax-Dartmouth region. Although the emphasis is on family and youth, many of the programs could be used by the aging.

In New Brunswick⁽⁸⁾ The Community Relations Division coordinates the Department of Welfare Programs with private welfare services. This involves promoting and participating in programs for the full involvement and education of community groups, client groups, voluntary agencies and the general public with regard to services, goals and objectives in social welfare.

In Newfoundland⁽⁹⁾ the Department of Rehabilitation and Recreation is responsible for aging. Prince Edward Island⁽¹⁰⁾ has a Division of Services to Aging within their Department of Social Services.

Recommendation 75

That grants be made available by Provincial Governments, independently or on a shared basis with the Federal Government, for:

- (a) The construction and operation of day-care centres, community recreation centres and sheltered workshops;
- (b) The conduct of training courses and institutes for professional, technical and volunteer workers in the area community services; and
- (c) Demonstration projects for old people in fields like meal service, recreation programs, camping, preparation for retirement and adult education.

ACTION TAKEN

The Federal Government does not contribute by way of capital assistance to workshops but will contribute to the operational cost. Capital grants are made by Ontario and Alberta. All provinces share in the operational cost. Provincial grants are available for day care centres which are few for the elderly. The term "day care centre" in most provinces relates to facilities for children. Day care centres, where organized, are financed by the province, municipality, volunteer agencies and the United Appeal. Senior citizens recreation centres, where separate from the community centre, are usually provided by a local service agency. Operational costs come from fees, United Appeal and Municipal Parks and Recreation.

Ontario⁽¹⁾ is the only province to provide both capital and operating grants to elderly persons' centres and community centres. Ontario also reported that they are sponsoring many training courses and institutes for professional, technical and volunteer workers in the area of community services for the aged. Although Ontario does not have specific demonstration projects, the province supports a number of programs related to recreation, preparation for retirement and adult education, from at least two areas of the Ministry of Community and Social Services.

Manitoba⁽²⁾ reports that some action has been taken in this area especially in the larger centres but much has to be done in the rural areas.

Many of the grants made by the Saskatchewan Government⁽³⁾ for welfare or community services are cost-shared by the Federal Government. The grants are more related to program and staffing than toward capital costs of construction.

Beyond shelter⁽⁴⁾ commented that group leadership or group work to assist residents to organize activities for themselves was available in only 9 per cent of the developments built under the NHA. In another 6 per cent of the developments, it was available elsewhere in the community. Hostel and mixed accommodation were considered more likely to have the services of a group worker on-site than were self-contained developments: the service was available in only 5 per cent of self-contained developments, compared with 17 per cent of hostel and mixed developments. Quebec had a considerably higher proportion of developments with group leadership services than other regions—perhaps because of its predominance of hostel accommodation as well as more widespread appreciation of social animation techniques in the province.

Recommendation 76

That the cost of homemakers be shared with municipalities on a basis which would permit the latter to provide this important service free to all old people who have a taxable income below a specified minimum, say $1,200 for a single person and $2,000 for a couple.

ACTION TAKEN

Financial assistance for homemaker service is available to a greater or lesser extent under provincial social legislation in all Canadian provinces.

Provincial and Municipal Governments underwrite the costs of providing homemaker service to recipients of social assistance. The service is on a "needs test basis" by virtue of the Canada Assistance Plan Agreement requirements.

Recommendation 77

That encouragement be given to local welfare departments to improve their counselling services and to make it available not only to people in financial need, but to all others in the community, including especially the elderly, and that the province share in the cost of this development.

ACTION TAKEN

Counselling and referral services come within the terms of the Canada Assistance Act but these services depend upon the province's and the municipality's ability to pay their share of the cost. Counselling services are usually available through regional offices but the problem seems to be that the majority of elderly people do not know of such services or where they are available. The study by the Canadian Council on Social Development⁽¹⁾ found that in housing development surveyed social work counselling was available as follows:

(4) Canadian Council on Social Development, Beyond Shelter, Ottawa, 1973, p. 127.

	Available on site or as a special development service	Available in or for the general community	Not Available
In all Developments	6.1%	44.5%	49.4%
In Self-contained Developments	4.1%	45.1%	50.8%

British Columbia⁽²⁾ has a senior citizen counsellor program. These counsellors are volunteers who are assisted financially with their individual expenses up to $40 per month. The program which comes under the Department of Rehabilitation and Social Improvement has been in operation for some years and has been well received.

The study on the Health Care and Non-Institutionalized Senior Citizen in Edmonton⁽³⁾ recommended "greater efforts... towards the establishment of counselling and visitor programs to help reduce feelings of anxiety and loneliness among the elderly." The study found that the family doctor had become the "father confessor" and professional services where available were not being used to their maximum capacity.

The Province of Saskatchewan⁽⁴⁾ plans to reorganize its social service department so that social workers will be able to devote more time to social services such as counselling for all age groups. Public Health nurses⁽⁵⁾ made some 6,600 visits (34 per cent of total visits) to people over 65, one of their main aims being to promote rehabilitation activities.

Manitoba⁽⁶⁾ reported that it funds the counselling offered through departmental offices and also makes funds available to the Age and Opportunity Centre and to the Brandon Senior Citizens Incorporated for counselling services.

Ontario⁽⁷⁾ encourages local social service departments to increase counselling services through the media of such legislation as The General Welfare Assistance Act, the District Welfare Assistance Act, the District Welfare Administration Boards Act and a number of other programs of the Ministry of Community and Social Services.

A research team from the Canadian Council on Social Development in a survey of NHA-financed housing developments for the elderly found that social work counselling was more available in Quebec⁽⁸⁾ than in other provinces. In the housing developments surveyed in Quebec, social work counselling was available in relation to 51 per cent of the developments: in 6 per cent of the cases it was available on-site and in 45 per cent of cases it was provided elsewhere in the community. However, social work counselling was available on-site in only 4 per cent of the self-contained developments and in 12 per cent of hostel and mixed developments.

In New Brunswick⁽⁹⁾ the Department of Social Services administers social assistance under a comprehensive program and in Nova Scotia⁽¹⁰⁾ municipalities are reimbursed by the province for at least 75 per cent of the costs of assistance, services and administration. In Nova Scotia⁽¹¹⁾ municipal welfare departments work in close liaison with the Social Development and Rehabilitation Division of the Provincial Department of Public Welfare and many persons are referred to this division for counselling and rehabilitation services.

In Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island⁽¹²⁾ the province assumes full responsibility for the costs of assistance and services to all needy persons.

Recommendation 78

That the Welfare Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare establish a special division for the purpose of providing technical advice and up-to-date information with regard to day care centres, homemakers, meal services, counselling and such other welfare services for the elderly as come within the department's terms of reference.

ACTION TAKEN

The Welfare Research Division of the Welfare Branch of Health and Welfare Canada has a Consultant on Aging who, on request, will provide information on various welfare services.

Recommendation 79

That the Department of Labour, similarly, through such of its branches as is appropriate, assist the provinces in the development of services for older people in occupational training, placement, and rehabilitation.

The Department of Manpower and Immigration has an Older Workers Section, Special Programs Branch, which provides information on this subject.

Recommendation 80

That consideration be given to the possibility of earmarking for use in the field of aging a portion of the funds available for research, training and activity projects under the National Health Grants, the National Welfare Grants and the National Fitness and Amateur Sport Programs.

ACTION TAKEN⁽¹⁾

Funds are not earmarked for specific purposes as each request for a grant is considered on its own merits. Otherwise funds may lie dormant awaiting worthy projects. The following are some projects carried out with the help of welfare grants:

1. Canadian Council on Social Development—Seminars for the development of administrators of Homes for the Aged and Training Institutes for directors of Senior Citizen Centres.
2. Jewish Home for the Aged, Toronto—Activity Programs for Mentally Impaired Aged, 1969 to 1973—Final Report.
3. Windsor, Hants County, N.S.—Research project on existing facilities and those required for the Community Care of the Elderly, 1967/68 grant completed.
4. Department of Health and Social Development, Manitoba—A survey of the aged to determine factors associated with successful placements in foster homes (1967/68 grant).
5. Social Planning and Research Council, Hamilton and District—Effects of Aging Process (1967/68 grant).
6. Saskatoon Senior Citizens Services Association and the Social Planning Council of Saskatoon—Factors which contribute to the Social and Economic Independence of People Over 60, and an evaluation of community services for senior citizens (1967/68 grant).
7. Conseil des Oeuvres et du bien-être de Québec—A study of homes for the aged in the Québec Diocese (1967/68 grant).
8. During 1970-71 a welfare grant was awarded to Laval University to study the relationship between certain events which occur during the second part of an individual's life and his adaptation to change.

(1) Canada. Health and Welfare Canada. Letter from Mr. A. W. Johnson, Deputy Minister of Welfare, dated February 12, 1974.

In 1973-74 the University of Calgary will be studying "Successful Aging and Future Activities".

Among Health grants are the following:

University of Ottawa—A grant to evaluate the effectiveness of public health nursing in helping the elderly to maintain the independence required for living in an apartment building.

New Mount Sinai Hospital, Toronto—A grant to evaluate the role of hearing rehabilitation in the elderly; to study quality control of currently available hearing aids and to investigate the feasibility of organizing a health care delivery program for aural rehabilitation in the elderly.

When Dr. Roxburgh appeared before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs in 1971, he assured them that the total research program relating to the problems of the aging is growing, particularly with respect to heart and stroke and this type of disease entity. An examination of the 1972 listing of research projects and investigations into economic and social aspects of health care in Canada reveals that at least 12 projects have a direct relationship to the health care of the aging. The Canada Assistance Plan also makes funds available on a shared cost basis to provincial and municipal departments of welfare for research in welfare services. Priorities are determined by the provinces.

Activity programs are encouraged under the New Horizons program introduced in September 1972. Under this program funds are provided to groups of retired persons to enable them to participate in community life. To February 4, 1974 a total of 1675 projects had been approved for a value of close to $10 million.

Recommendation 84

That research be undertaken with a view to learning more about the daily life of older people and, in particular, about their leisure time interests and their attitudes to community programs of various types in this area provided for their benefit.

Recommendation 85

That in view of our present lack of knowledge about the leisure time needs and interests of older people, programs in this field be envisaged frankly as experiments with provision for the careful evaluation of the results achieved.

ACTION TAKEN

A special committee was appointed by the National Committee of the Division on Aging of the Canadian Welfare Council in June 1967 to explore learning opportunities for older people.⁽¹⁾ The Committee gave priority to the discussion of learning situations which seemed most meaningful to older people with some emphasis on how older people learn. It began by experimenting with the guided conversation, in an attempt to discover what older people themselves see as their educational needs. It continued by reviewing and discussing a few successful programs for older people which had a large learning component. The Committee also recognized that information services designed to serve elderly people and their relatives on a city-wide basis might have an excellent source about the educational needs of elderly people. This expectation was confirmed in a report made to the Committee about requests received by the Information Service of the Social Planning Council of Metropolitan Toronto.

(1) Canadian Welfare Council, Report of a Special Committee on Learning Opportunities for Older People, Ottawa, 1970.

The report by this special committee also included a description of some training event. The Prairie Christian Training Centre Experimental Event for people who work with older persons was held at Fort Qu'Appelle, Saskatchewan. The main objective of this four-day workshop was to discover more adequate ways for developing leadership for work with older people. A similar training event was held in May 1969 at Naramata Centre for Continuing Education in British Columbia.⁽¹⁾

In 1972 the Communications Committee of the Toronto Area of the Presbytery of the United Church of Canada presented a brief to the Canadian Radio Television Commission on the general neglect of senior citizens' special needs by the broadcast media. A follow-up research project on the media patterns and the needs of senior citizens was designed.⁽²⁾ There are four phases to this project: (1) the assessment of existing programming for senior citizens, (2) a survey of senior citizens' media patterns and preferences, (3) participation of various community organizations in defining the needs of senior citizens and experimentation with new programs, and (4) project evaluation and recommendations.

The Canadian Council on Social Development (formerly Canadian Welfare Council) included two workshops on the elderly at its annual conference in September 1973. The consensus was that planning agencies should find out what senior citizens want rather than provide what the agency thinks they need.

In an address to the Canadian Association on Gerontology, October 18, 1973, on "Under-valuing knowledge and over-valuing Research", Dr. David Schonfield, University of Calgary commented as follows:

"When we consider the study of aging, that young science of gerontology, a conflict between knowledge and research might seem far fetched. Investigations of aging processes have attracted very few scholars and Canadian neglect of this area is truly lamentable. Funding by the Federal Government is less than 2 per cent of the comparable United States figures, probably less than 1 per cent, at a time when American gerontologists complain bitterly of inadequate Government support. It is only too easy to begin listing the research gaps where Canadian practitioners are, or should be, crying out for more knowledge—effects of our cold climate on activities provided for the aged; industrial gerontology in general and problems of retraining older workers in particular; influences of inflation on early retirement; comparisons between services in public and private nursing homes; causes and prevention of accidents in traffic and in the home. It is easy to begin such a list; it is difficult to stop. Nevertheless there can be little doubt that our first priority should be in the training of those who work or intend to work with the aged and the aging. Acquisition of existing knowledge, however limited, must take precedence over creating new knowledge."⁽³⁾

He went on to decry the lack of responsibility for making proposals about aging:

"This vacuum of responsibility is a major cause of the history of failure among many Canadian enterprises established on behalf of the older part of our population. The Division on Aging of the Canadian Welfare Council has disappeared, as has the Institut de Gerontologie at L'université de Montréal. The journal, Vivre Longtemps has published its last issue and the minute Aging Section of the Federal Department of Manpower has a reduced establishment. There are rumours that the Office on Aging of the Ontario Government is on its way out. Under-valuation of knowledge and experience is demonstrated when such enterprises are allowed to disintegrate instead of being cherished."⁽⁴⁾

Recommendation 86

That the foregoing activities be encouraged and that particularly in the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and the Department of National Health and Welfare, staff and budget be provided to strengthen existing programs of research and fact-finding in the aging field.

ACTION TAKEN

Although Health and Welfare Canada only show one office as being specifically assigned to work in the field of aging, studies in various branches encompass the over 60 group as well as other age groups of our population. Similarly in Statistics Canada, studies on the aged are included in the overall picture. Statistics Canada report that the following changes have been made in their statistical program:

1. The breakdown of the category age 65 and over into 65-74 and 75 in the annual publication of hospital separations from 1969 onwards.
2. The publication of new primary sites of malignant neoplasms by age, including 65-69, 70-74, 75-79, 80-84 and 85.
3. The initiation of a program to list and survey special care facilities which would include nursing homes and homes for the aged. Funds are currently being sought to accelerate and improve the coverage of this survey.⁽¹⁾

In the Department of National Health and Welfare, Treasury Board has approved increases in staff and budget for the Research Programs Directorate.⁽²⁾

Since the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Aging was published, the National Welfare Grants administration has strengthened its consultative services in all areas of its responsibility. Expenditures for Research grants have increased also but are subject to budget restrictions.

Funds available on a shared-cost basis under the Canada Assistance Plan to the provincial and municipal departments of welfare for research are not limited, that is, sharing is limited only by the amount of the claims submitted by the provinces.

Recommendation 87

- (a) That on the initiative of DBS consultations be instituted at an early date with appropriate Federal and Provincial Government Departments, and non-governmental organizations interested, for the purpose of improving present statistics related to aging.
- (b) That, further, DBS, take the measures necessary to match its achievements in the field of economic statistics with an integrated system of social statistics, which would contain a section on aging.

ACTION TAKEN

- (a) See Recommendation No. 86.

(b) There is no special section on aging; information on this subject is on the same basis as other age groups.

(1) Canada. Statistics Canada. Letter dated August 24, 1974.

(2) Canada. Health and Welfare Canada, Health Manpower. Letter dated August 8, 1973.

Recommendation 88

That the Federal Government review the experience it has had with research grants in health, welfare, and related fields such as housing and rehabilitation, and give consideration to means that might be employed, possibly through earmarking certain of these grants, to encourage the development of research on aging, especially in those areas of major need and expenditure that are now neglected.

ACTION TAKEN

During the 1971 review of National Health and Welfare Estimates by the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs,⁽³⁾ the question was asked if there had been an increase in the money spent on research in the geriatric field. The Deputy Minister replied that it was "pretty hard to identify as being geriatric research because cardiology, for example, or respiratory disease research—... a lot of it is for geriatric patients. It is not identified as such. I do not think we have figures on geriatrics". Speaking for the Medical Research Council, the witness states:

"... this is not broken down as a separate item in the way in which we look at our grants. So I really cannot answer your question. I can assure that it is growing, at least as fast as the total program, because these areas are of active concern, particularly with respect to heart and stroke and this type of disease entity. ... One of the areas of concern to the Medical Research Council is related closely to this, and this is rehabilitation medicine. There is very little activity in research in rehabilitation medicine in Canada, and it is an area in which the Council has attempted to arouse further interest and activity. This is not all related to geriatrics, of course, but a good deal of it is."

A comprehensive study of housing for the elderly financed by CMHC under the provisions of the National Housing Act was published in July 1973 by the Canadian Council on Social Development. It was supported by a grant from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.⁽⁴⁾

Health and Welfare expects the evaluation of the effects of the New Horizons programs to produce findings which may have implications for other departmental programs in the area, for example, of unmet needs of the elderly.

Health and Welfare Canada through its health grants are sponsoring increasing numbers of research projects dealing exclusively with the problems of the elderly and other projects which are related to the total population but are of great importance to senior citizens, such as home care, day hospitals, community centres, etc.⁽¹⁾

The problem of aging such as

1. Prevention of disease and deterioration in the aged; and
 2. Rehabilitation of senior citizens
- are considered to be priority areas for the National Health Grant Program.⁽²⁾

Recommendation 90

That in all municipalities and/or appropriate local regions, on the initiative of the public authority where necessary, an officially recognized body be established to plan and coordinate programs, facilities and services for older people and that the concern of such bodies embrace not only the areas of health and welfare but also living arrangements, employment, education and leisure time activities.

ACTION TAKEN

A survey of municipalities of various sizes across Canada showed that civic coordinating and planning groups are concerned with the total population rather than one segment. A unique umbrella organization is the Community Care Services (Metropolitan Toronto) Incorporated (1971) which provides a correlated system for the organization and management of resources to assist the aged, handicapped, chronically ill and convalescent persons. The city of Pembroke has used a LIP grant to establish a Pembroke and Area Community Service Corporation which is interested in the requirements of the area's senior citizens. In Quebec the municipalities are only concerned with recreation and cultural facilities; other requirements are dealt with by the province.

Recommendation 91

That Provincial Governments accept responsibility for the establishment of appropriate bodies for the planning and coordination of programs for older people within their jurisdiction and, that in doing so consideration be given to the proposals contained in the Saskatchewan and Ontario reports.

ACTION TAKEN

Six provinces have separate branches or divisions of Government to deal with the problems of the elderly (British Columbia, Manitoba, Newfoundland, Ontario, Quebec and Prince Edward Island). The proposals contained in the Saskatchewan and Ontario reports were not implemented.

(3) RECOMMENDATIONS THAT ARE NOT IMPLEMENTED

Recommendation 3

The Committee recommends that, on the initiative of the Federal Department of Labour, research be continued into the characteristics of older workers and the effect of age on specific abilities; and that efforts be made to get the findings of such studies translated into enlightened personnel policies and into conditions of work related to the changing capacities of the older worker.

ACTION TAKEN

Since 1966 the responsibilities of the Department of Labour have been altered. There is no research program on this subject being conducted within the Federal Government agencies, although studies and reviews are undertaken by the Older Workers Section of Canada Manpower. Dr. Leon Koyle of Sunnybrook Hospital, Toronto has developed a profile for measuring an individual's physical and mental capacities for work.

Investigation of aging process has attracted very few scholars. For example, of 398 Master of Social Work theses completed at the School of Social Work, University of Toronto,⁽³⁾ between the years 1942-1962, only 13 are related to the field of aging. Between 1963-1973 of 440 Master theses, 18 dealt with the aged. It would appear that there is relatively little increase of interest among students in pursuing gerontological research questions.

Recommendation 9

That the Federal-Provincial Vocational Rehabilitation program be enlarged and strengthened to provide in greater measure for the rehabilitation of older workers, whose disability arises mainly from prolonged unemployment.

ACTION TAKEN

Health and Welfare Canada administers rehabilitation programs under the Vocational Rehabilitation of Disabled Persons Act.⁽⁴⁾ Under this Act the Federal Government enters into agreements with the provinces for costs incurred by the province in undertaking a comprehensive program for the vocational rehabilitation of disabled workers. The province defines the eligibility of persons who are to be included; the main emphasis is on those persons who are suffering from a physical or mental disability.

The Rehabilitation Services Division of Health and Welfare Canada also includes a Work Activity Section. This section administers Part III of the Canada Assistance Plan which provides for shared funding by the Federal and Provincial Governments of programs to prepare unemployed persons for future employment. These programs use a comprehensive approach and include lifeskills, academic upgrading, counselling, family participation, and work exposure. Suggestions for programs are initiated by the provinces; projects may be sponsored through an agency or private group. The Federal Government pays fifty per cent of the cost; the remainder may be paid totally by the province, as is the case in Manitoba and New Brunswick, or the remaining fifty per cent may be shared by the province and the local municipality. At the present time the number of older workers involved in rehabilitation programs is minimal.⁽¹⁾

(4) Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, Chapter V-7, Vocational Rehabilitation of Disabled Persons Act.

Recommendation 15

That mass education programs for people of all ages with emphasis on the maintenance of good health throughout life as well as on the early detection of disease symptoms, be promoted extensively by Governmental and voluntary agencies, with the advice and cooperation of medical associations.

ACTION TAKEN

Health Education is under the Community Health section of Health and Welfare Canada. This section focuses on health education for people of all ages, not just the aging population.

Surveys conducted by organizations in British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario found that the majority of older people are unaware of the facilities, benefits and agencies which are already organized to assist them. There is great reliance on their physician to direct them when they are faced with a problem. Generally health literature is not for any one age group but is prepared for the total population. There is very little health education aimed at the elderly.⁽²⁾

"The benefits from effective instruction (in the promotion of health, information about illness, the available services and how to use them, etc.) could be very great, yet neither the effectiveness of such educational programs as do exist, nor the best ways of educating the public in matters of health so that they actually do something about it, have been studied in Canada... Only a considerable research effort, particularly in social and behavioural fields, can hope to provide some of the needed answers."⁽³⁾

Senior citizens in cooperation with Provincial Governments organize Senior Citizen Weeks. In Ontario in 1973 the theme was "Living can be Ageless."

Recommendation 20

That local health and/or welfare departments keep a register of all people aged 65 and over in their communities and that public health nurses and/or social workers make contact with such older people and visit them periodically if such visits are necessary and desired.

ACTION TAKEN

Except in a few isolated cases such as Pembroke and Woodstock, Ontario, local health and/or welfare departments have no registers of people over 65 except in those cases where welfare assistance is being provided.

In some major urban areas public health nurses visit senior citizen housing developments on a regular basis. The Ontario Housing Corporation has stated that it has no special health program policy but according to the Ottawa Housing Authority public health nurses and a community relations officer visit each senior citizen development once a week when they are available on call to residents.⁽⁴⁾

Recommendation 28

That all provisions of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act be extended to cover the use by the individual of all approved institutional facilities for health care, including tuberculosis and mental health hospitals.

ACTION TAKEN

The Hospital and Diagnostic Services Act⁽⁵⁾ of 1957 has not been amended to include tuberculosis and mental health hospitals. These are the responsibility of the provinces.

Recommendation 34

That, similarly, at the Federal level a special branch or division concerned with the Health Care of the aged be established under the Director of Health Services in the Department of National Health and Welfare, and that close liaison be maintained between this branch and the corresponding body on the welfare side, as well as with the staff of other departments which carry responsibility for the health of older people, such as the Department of Veterans Affairs, and the Civilian Rehabilitation Branch of the Department of Labour.

ACTION TAKEN

There is no branch or division on the "health" side of National Health and Welfare concerned specifically with the health care of the aged to correspond with the "Consultant on Aging" who operates within the Welfare Research Division.

Dr. M. Kozakiewicz, Senior Consultant, Rehabilitation, of Health Standards and Consulting of the Health Programs Branch is heading a committee on aging. This nine member committee will analyze the recommendations of the various reports on aging, particularly the Special Senate Committee on Aging, and determine which recommendations affect the socio-health needs of Canadians, which recommendations have been implemented and which can be implemented given the economic situation.⁽¹⁾

That periodic surveys be made of the health status of older people in order to provide comprehensive, reliable and up-to-date information as a basis for health planning.

ACTION TAKEN

Surveys such as the National Nutrition survey covered the aged as well as other groups.⁽²⁾

There is no reliable data on a national basis to cover any group. Health and Welfare Canada in its brief to the Science Policy Committee recommended that national surveys be carried out to indicate the prevalence of various disabilities. There has been no such national survey since 1951.

Recommendation 49

That CMHC give consideration to the establishment of a national committee, analogous to the recently appointed national council on welfare, to advise on matters of policy and program in the field of housing for low-income families and for the elderly.

ACTION TAKEN

There is no national advisory committee as such but the Corporation makes grants under the NHA for the formation of study or advisory groups.⁽³⁾

Recommendation 64

That arrangements be made whereby old people requiring short-term hospital or nursing home care may retain for a reasonable period the right to return to their previous living quarters in assisted housing projects.

ACTION TAKEN

The cost of senior citizen accommodation in housing developments is usually geared to income. The length of time accommodation is kept depends on the individual's ability to pay.

Recommendation 67

That Municipal Governments take advantage of the municipal winter works program, the national health grants program, the national welfare grants program, the national fitness and amateur sport program, and also special provincial programs where they exist, to secure assistance with the cost of constructing facilities and developing services for the benefit of old people.

ACTION TAKEN

The extent to which municipalities participate in the provincial programs to extend and improve "care" facilities for the aged depends to a large extent on the financial priorities established for the municipality and its economic base. Health and Welfare Canada no longer provides direct financial assistance for the construction of hospitals, etc. Cost sharing is available under the Canada Assistance Plan for many services, such as counselling, etc., but again this depends on the municipality's ability to pay its share of the program.

National Health Grants are intended to support applied research and innovative methods of supporting health services. No capital funding is provided. Generally speaking, grants under this item are not designed for municipal participation. Similarly the National Welfare Grants Program relates to innovative programs in the research or demonstration fields. The latter refers to short-term projects which have as an objective the delivery of a service in an innovative way. A review of inventories for the past few years indicates that such programs have had no appeal at the municipal level.⁽⁴⁾

Local governing bodies have demonstrated an interest in participation in Local Initiatives Programs. Records of activities in such programs related to the aged were segregated for the first time in 1973-74. The objective of the L.I.P. is to reduce seasonal employment among the labour force in regional or specific areas. One of the conditions for awarding a contract under this program is that the discontinuance of financial assistance at the end of the contractual period will not create undue hardship in the community. Activities resulting from this program provided a service to senior citizens such as mobile food services, shut-in marketers, leisure time activities, communications and transportation in rural areas.

The National Conference on Fitness and Health met in Ottawa December 4, 5, and 6, 1972. Among its recommendations were the following:

Recommendation No. 20

It is recommended that the federal government take steps to ensure the establishment of minimum standards for physical recreation facilities and programs in institutions for the care of the aged and disabled.⁽²⁾

More specifically, the Conference feels that the federal government should provide a strong leadership role to ensure:

- that an on-going physical recreation program be offered to the aged and disabled in institutions, to maintain an optimal level of function and prevent physical and psychological deterioration;
- that minimum standards of recreational programs and staffing be met in order to qualify for public construction of operational grants;
- that accessibility and use of all recreation facilities for the disabled and aged is adequate, (i.e., construction of ramps, doorways and washrooms).

There is no information on subsequent action.

Recommendation 81

That the Department of Labour and/or the Department of National Health and Welfare give encouragement to the provinces and their municipalities in the provision of sheltered work and the establishment of sheltered workshops, and that this encouragement, in addition to technical advice, promotional aids and help in developing standards include Federal-Provincial sharing in the costs of facilities where indicated and in the provision of work allowances.

ACTION TAKEN

There are approximately 350 sheltered workshops for the handicapped in Canada; the bulk of these are located in Ontario. Although such projects may benefit some older workers, they do not serve those of retirement age. The greatest number given assistance are the retarded. A survey conducted in 1973 showed that about 15,000 handicapped were assisted per day.

The Federal Government provides no capital assistance. Ontario provides 25 per cent capital assistance and Alberta has some provision for capital assistance. The Federal Government shares the operational cost but the initiative and the funding must come from the province in the first instance.

The Federal Government lends assistance to developing standards for the use of manpower counsellors in purchasing services, and determining the fitness of applicants for sheltered employment.

The subject of sheltered workshops will be given attention in the two-year review of the total social security system now underway. The review was begun in 1973 by the Federal Minister of Health and Welfare and the provincial Ministers of Welfare. A working party on social services will include the subject of rehabilitation services among its studies and in so doing may include those aspects of this subject which may have application for the aged.

The term "sheltered workshop" if broadly interpreted, ranges from the industrial type of workshop to activity centres. New Horizon programmes have relevance for leisure time activities.⁽³⁾

Recommendation 89

- (a) That consideration be given to the establishment of a national council on social research, as recommended to the Government in the past by such national organizations as the Social Science Research Council of Canada; the Commonwealth Institute of Social Research and that specific provision be made within the program of the council for research in gerontology;
- (b) That the council conduct or commission research on its own, particularly in the area of social policy, but that it should also make, or approve, grants for social research and training in social research to universities, professional schools, and non-profit organizations;
- (c) That the council be composed of outstanding social scientists and laymen, including a number with specific interest in gerontology, and that it also include up to one-third of its membership, representatives of Federal Government departments and agencies that are concerned with social research;

- (d) That the advice and services of the council be available on request to Provincial Governments, universities and non-profit organizations;
- (e) That in order to avoid duplication in the health field responsibility for the conduct and support of research in geriatrics be carried by the medical research council and that the latter give high priority in its program to the biological and medical aspects of aging, and to those diseases and illnesses which have a high incidence among older people;
- (f) That the proposed council maintain close relations with the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and the various Government departments and agencies having responsibility in the area of social research, including the universities, with a view to reducing overlapping and ensuring that the efforts of all are mutually supportive;
- (g) That, with particular reference to the field of aging, the council seek the cooperation of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and departments of the Federal, Provincial and local Governments, and the major voluntary organizations concerned:
 - (i) in improving the collection and analysis of statistical data,
 - (ii) in stimulating and correlating research programs, and
 - (iii) in undertaking the variety of needed research that is recommended elsewhere in this report.

ACTION TAKEN

The recommendation that a National Council on Social Research be established has not been implemented. There are some private groups such as the Canadian Association on Gerontology whose founding meeting was held in Montreal on October 15, 1971. The objectives of the Association are summarized as follows:

- “(a) To bring together persons interested in gerontology in the fields of biological sciences, medical sciences, psychology, social sciences and social welfare;
- (b) To promote the study of aging in all its aspects;
- (c) To promote improvement in the well-being of older people;
- (d) To strengthen and improve communication between the relevant scientific disciplines and between persons engaged in research, education, professional practice and other interested workers;
- (e) To promote and broaden education about aging at all levels;
- (f) To promote active financial support for gerontological research and the application of its findings in the practical situation;

- (g) To print, publish, distribute and sell journals, periodicals, and publications for the professional advancement of the members of the Association.”⁽¹⁾

Recommendation 92

- (a) That the Federal Government establish a national commission on aging for the purpose of giving leadership in all matters concerned with a fuller life for older people in Canada;
- (b) That the functions to be performed by this commission include the following:
 - (i) to examine intensively and follow up the recommendations contained in this Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Aging,
 - (ii) to keep under review the needs and problems of older people and to develop recommendations on policy and program for dealing with them,
 - (iii) to develop working relationships with Federal Government departments and agencies, national voluntary organizations, and Provincial Government planning bodies concerned with aging, to the end that planning and coordination may be achieved,
 - (iv) to serve as a clearing house for information on projects, studies and developments generally in the field of gerontology, and to publish a bulletin and other literature for the dissemination of this information,
 - (v) to provide technical and financial assistance in the area of program development and staff training on request to provinces, local communities, universities, and other organizations, to the extent this assistance is not provided already through existing programs,
 - (vi) to sponsor and cooperate with other agencies in conducting conferences, seminars, and training courses for workers in the field of aging;
- (c) That, until the national council on social research, recommended in the previous chapter, is established, the commission, in addition to the above functions, carry responsibility for the conduct, collation and support of research in the field of gerontology;
- (d) That the chairman and members of the commission be selected because of their status, experience and competence, in various aspects of the field of aging, and that they include, up to one-third of their number, representatives of federal departments and agencies that carry major responsibility for services and programs for old people;
- (e) That the basic budget of the commission be furnished by the Federal Government but that the commission be enabled and encouraged to receive contributions from other public and private sources;
- (f) That the commission report annually to parliament;

- (g) That the commission have associated with it an advisory committee including in its membership representatives of provincial planning bodies, where such exist, voluntary agencies, and old people's own organizations for the purpose of reviewing the activities of the commission and advising on policy and program;
- (h) And, finally, that the work of the commission be evaluated at the end of a five-year period and that consideration be given at that time to the advisability of linking it with a broader body on social planning for the population generally which, in our judgment, is required if a comprehensive and an integrated system of programs and services is to be developed.

AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE

NOTICE OF MOTION

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next I will move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture be empowered, without special reference by the Senate, to examine, from time to time, any aspect of the agricultural industry in Canada; provided that all senators shall be notified of any scheduled meeting of the committee and the purpose thereof and that the committee report the result of any such examination to the Senate;

That the committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisers as may be necessary for the purposes of such examination; and

That the committee have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate.

Honourable Senators, I might explain that this motion is in the same form as that which the Senate passed on former occasions. It is simply to allow the committee to do its work.

Senator Flynn: You will have another opportunity to do the same thing at the next sitting.

OFFICIAL VISIT OF PRIME MINISTER TO FRANCE

NEWS REPORT—QUESTION

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government. Is there any truth in the news report that I heard on the radio a day or two ago about the official visit of the Prime Minister to Paris, that nine other ministers went there on their own? If the report should be true, I would be interested in knowing the names of the ministers, whether they went there on business and if any part of their expenses are being absorbed by the public.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, to the best of my knowledge there is no truth in that particular report. However, I shall investigate and make appropriate inquiries and if the contrary should happen to be the case, then I shall so report to the chamber.

Senator Argue: I think it said they were members of Parliament.

Senator Croll: The enemy of junkets!

Senator Argue: They can go there on their own.

Senator Molson: I understood the report to say they were cabinet ministers.

THE BUDGET

DATE OF PRESENTATION—QUESTION

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I would ask the Leader of the Government if he knows when the next budget will be introduced in the other place?

Senator Perrault: I am confident that the budget will be introduced before the end of the year.

Senator Flynn: A real Paul Martin reply.

MOTOR VEHICLE TIRE SAFETY BILL

THIRD READING

On the Order:

Third reading of the Bill S-8, intituled: "An Act respecting the use of national safety marks in relation to motor vehicle tires and to provide for safety standards for certain motor vehicle tires imported into or exported from Canada or sent or conveyed from one province to another".—(Honourable Senator Neiman).

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, if there are no further questions with regard to this bill, I move that it be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FEEDS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Argue for the second reading of Bill S-10, to amend the Feeds Act.

Hon. Margaret Norrie: Honourable senators, I have little to add to the discussion on this bill by the Honourable Senators Argue, Yuzyk and McDonald. It is interesting to note, however, that the first legislation dealing with livestock feeds was enacted in 1909. It was then known as the Commercial Feeding Stuffs Act. In 1920 that act was replaced by the Feeding Stuffs Act. The basic provisions of the legislation are to require livestock feeds to be registered, to be labelled to show their ingredients and to meet certain standards of quality and safety for animals and humans.

The last major revision of the Feeding Stuffs Act was in 1937. Another bill, Bill C-24, was given first reading in the other place on April 15, 1974, but died because of the election. Since then there have been numerous advances in animal nutrition which necessitate amending the legislation to have it conform to present practices. The other speakers reviewed the changes that have taken place in recent years. One of the most important developments has been the introduction into feeds of therapeutic agents for treatment of sick animals and the use of minerals in animal nutrition. The public have become worried about these therapeutic additives being included in feed mixtures and they wish to be reassured of their safety. And well they might, for on April 1, 1974, 12 million broilers had to be destroyed in Mississippi because they were contaminated. The pesticide was dieldrin. Vegetable oil and/or animal fat were the ingredients being checked for contamination. Pesticide dieldrin creates a residue problem, not a health problem.

Another problem to which we must be alert concerns moulds in foods and feed. This has been a problem for many years. Aflatoxins are toxic substances produced as a result of mould—it is a fungus—growing on grains, feed stuffs and other foods. They are a part of a larger group called mycotoxins. Diseases caused by this toxin have been known for decades and were brought sharply into focus when 100,000 turkey poults in England died in 1960. Research ultimately established the cause to be a fungus in a peanut meal shipment. The practical solution appears to be one of prevention; fighting the disease itself is unworkable. One has therefore to be careful to prevent mould growth by proper drying and storage of crops. There are other precautions that can be taken, but it is not necessary to list them here. Further research is also needed to determine the conditions under which essentially complete elimination of aflatoxin can be achieved with minimal damage to the protein quality of feed.

The Feeds Act is an important and necessary measure, and I recommend that it be studied with great care.

● (1420)

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I do not propose to detain the house. This is an important bill. There is a good deal of interest in it. After it has passed second reading, I shall move to have it referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Senator Argue, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture.

SUPREME COURT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) for the second reading of Bill S-2, to amend the Supreme Court Act and to make related amendments to the Federal Court Act.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I adjourned the debate yesterday in the hope that I might find some answers relating to the intention or non-intention to follow or not follow what we sometimes call the Orders of the Day. I have not been very successful in finding those answers, but I do not wish to pursue the matter at this time.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, before the sponsor closes the debate, I should like to make one brief interjection. Clause 1 of this amending bill says:

The judges shall reside in the National Capital Region described in the schedule to the National Capital Act or within twenty-five miles thereof.

I cannot understand why it should be part of the legislation to say that judges of the Supreme Court of Canada must reside in Ottawa or within 25 miles thereof. Surely these men are sufficiently praiseworthy, and if their work requires them to reside in the city of Ottawa or within 25 miles thereof they will do so. I personally consider it an insult to the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada to state as part of the legislation that they must reside in the National Capital Region. That whole section should be repealed.

The same applies to clause 2 which says that the Registrar and Deputy Registrar shall reside in the National Capital Region. Surely, if their work requires them to be here, they will be here. If they were the type of persons who would not be here, they would not be appointed to their positions.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macdonald: If Supreme Court judges do not reside in the National Capital Region or within 25 miles thereof, what are we going to do about it? There is no penalty in the Supreme Court Act which says that judges can be fined for non-attendance. It might be that they would come under a provision of the Criminal Code which covers cases where no penalty is provided, but personally I cannot foresee any police officer, or anyone else, laying an information against a judge because he did not reside in the National Capital Region or within 25 miles thereof.

Also, the wording is imprecise. The bill says "within 25 miles thereof." How are those miles to be measured? Is it by air or road? What happens if a judge resides within 26 miles of the National Capital Region?

Senator Langlois: Nautical miles.

Senator Macdonald: It is time we did away with that section. I would ask the sponsor to bring this matter to the attention of the appropriate authorities to see if it can be repealed.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform honourable senators that if Senator Connolly speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, perhaps I might deal with the remarks made by Senator Macdonald just a moment ago. I can understand that when you come from a city like Sydney you would not want to be tied down to living in Ottawa. Perhaps some people from Toronto feel the same way. Speaking seriously on that point, originally, there may have been a good deal of thinking along those lines. This is, of course, a liberalizing clause. The original section that was enacted, I think in 1875, when the court was established, required all of the judges, the Registrar and the Deputy Registrar, if there was one then, to live within the boundaries of the city of Ottawa. Modern living conditions, with roads, cars and all the rest of it, plus the difficulty sometimes of finding a home to buy within the limits of the city—

Senator Flynn: You mean a decent home.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): —has changed the situation a good deal. Now if these judges, the Registrar or the deputy would like to live outside the boundaries of the city there will be no statutory bar.

As I said in my opening remarks, judges can live as far away as Gracefield, Montebello, Carp or Winchester, although I think it is an impracticable proposition to have them living that far away. How are these miles measured? Perhaps by road. Nobody knows, as Senator Macdonald has pointed out. Perhaps it is by air. Perhaps it is in the time-honoured way of distance as the crow flies. What Senator Macdonald said deserves consideration and I will certainly bring it to the attention of the authorities. I take it Senator Macdonald would not want to have this restriction applied to him in respect of his own personal home.

Honourable senators, last night Senator Flynn raised a number of points with which I should deal very briefly. In the first place, I rather welcomed his opening remarks about the possibility of a conflict of interest. The question of conflict of interest is bandied about today by people who are perhaps purists, or people who are perhaps influenced very deeply by developments in the United States. I would certainly say that if Senator Flynn, being the experienced and able counsel that he is and having such an intimate knowledge of the Supreme Court Act, was going to appear before that court every day for the next month, the Senate is very well served by having speeches like the one he made last night.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): He understands this legislation. He made the Senate understand it better certainly than I did, and better than anyone else who might have spoken could have done. This comes out of a great body of experience. If the conflict of interest rules would bar him from making these speeches, then I think Parliament would be a poorer place.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Senator Flynn mentioned that in clause 7 there is a provision to the effect that if ultimately a money award is made by the Supreme Court of Canada on appeal from a judgment of the lower court of first instance, which refused to make the money award, interest on the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada should date back to the date of the judgment of the lower court. He suggested that the period during which interest should apply in those cases should be the date of the institution of the action. I do not know why the clause was drafted as it was, and I have not been able to get the appropriate official today to have him explain it to me. I think what Senator Flynn said is quite right.

● (1430)

When a lower court gives a judgment for a money award, if interest is to apply—and I think it is in the discretion of the court to award interest or not—normally it applies back to the date of the institution of the action, be that the date of the issue of the writ or of some other form in which the action is instituted.

Another reason for supporting Senator Flynn's point is that in many of the provinces the courts of first instance have unmanageably large rolls. There are great delays resulting from the fact that the courts simply cannot deal with the cases as expeditiously as they would like. Perhaps that is a point which should be raised in committee. At any rate, it seems to me that the proposal is not badly taken. It is a valid point for consideration.

I come now to the main point raised by Senator Flynn. He said, I take it, that considering the practicalities of the situation section 36 is no longer viable. There are too many appeals coming into the Supreme Court of Canada as of right simply because the amount of money or value of property involved is $10,000 or more. The available statistics bear that point out. Moreover, the report of the committee of the Canadian Bar Association puts its finger on that point as the problem area.

What Senator Flynn had to say about the importance of developing a body of jurisprudence for the guidance both of practitioners and litigants is an essential point. If the court is now going to allow appeals only in cases where leave has been granted, then both litigants and lawyers should know the reasons which will permit them to have a successful application for leave to appeal. They should also know the pitfalls, if they are making an application for leave which might not succeed.

There is jurisprudence in other countries, for example in Britain and in the United States. Under clause 5 of this bill grounds for leave are spelled out a little broader than they were spelled out in the report of the Canadian Bar Association, and there is a wide discretion given. However, for the guidance of all people interested in the work of the Supreme Court of Canada there should be written reasons. We cannot very well legislate or regulate the courts in respect of issuing reasons for judgment, but the courts themselves—certainly, the Supreme Court of Canada—have this very much in mind.

I should just like to refer to an article published in the Canadian Bar Review in December, 1951. I might say that what I am about to read puts Senator Flynn on the side of the angels.

Senator Flynn: I am always on the side of the angels.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Well, you will find out about the angels in a moment. The article reads:

Whatever the position which the Supreme Court takes, the public and the legal profession ought to be informed with as much certitude as is possible in what cases leave will be given and in what cases denied. The court has already stated in Major v. Beauport that it views the statutory power to give leave as permissive and hence as a matter of discretion. This, however, is not incompatible with the feasibility of making administrative regulations by which litigants may be warned against wasting the time of the court on such things as, for example, appeals on the quantum of damages or appeals on findings of fact, whether by a judge or jury.

I am sure the Senate will be glad to know that the author of that statement was the then Professor Bora Laskin.

Senator Flynn: Very good!

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Another important point raised by Senator Flynn was whether the entire court should sit on applications for leave. For this purpose section 45 prescribes that the court is sitting when the quorum is three. I think what we have here is better than the prevailing regulation in the Supreme Court of the United States. Honourable senators will recall that for about 50 years that court has not been entertaining appeals except by leave. In their case the entire court deals with the applications for leave, and there are as many as 4,000 applications in the course of a year. What is notable about the practice in the Supreme Court of the United States is that there is no verbal argument. Written material and arguments are submitted to the judges. The judges do not sit in open court when allowing or denying leave, but, at the judges' conferences, hand in their judgments on whether or not leave should be granted.

In the Supreme Court of Canada, however, there would be oral argument as well as written submissions, which, to my way of thinking, is a much better arrangement. Moreover, having a panel of three judges sitting as the court for that purpose means that if there are a great many applications for leave they can be disposed of relatively quickly, and much more quickly than if the entire membership were to sit upon the matter.

Honourable senators, I have nothing further to add at this time. If the bill receives second reading I intend to move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

IMMIGRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Keith Laird moved the second reading of Bill S-12, to amend the Immigration Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill S-12 is a rather simple bill. In fact, it is so simple that even I can understand it. Contrary to what I have had to do on other occasions with respect to more complex matters, namely, starting out with the proposition that the bill should be referred to committee, the fact is that I do not at all think this bill should.

Now, this bill picks up the slack that exists in the Immigration Act involving sanctions to be visited upon persons deported from Canada. The situation as it exists now is that a deportee naturally cannot return to this country without the consent of the minister; but if he does manage to get into the country, then the worst thing that can happen to him is that he will be deported again. Well, you can imagine the unfortunate result of this state of the law. It is particularly evident in some of the bigger cities like Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver, and, yes, Windsor. I am sure that in Windsor it constitutes a real problem, in that it is a principal port of entry, and unfortunately, as you all know from experience, you cannot properly check on everyone who wants to come in. Therefore, there is always a possibility—and this has happened—that the most undesirable characters get back into the country. In due course they are picked up and simply deported.

● (1440)

This short bill simply adds this desirable feature, namely, that there will, if this bill becomes law, be a penalty imposed upon a deportee who comes back into the country without the consent of the minister. Perhaps just for the sake of the record I should read the existing section 35 of the Immigration Act:

[Senator Connolly (Ottawa West).]

Unless an appeal against such order is allowed, a person against whom a deportation order has been made and who is deported or leaves Canada shall not thereafter be admitted to Canada or allowed to remain in Canada without the consent of the Minister.

Just hearing that, you can of course see the frightfully important omission, namely, that there is nothing more you can do to him other than deport him. So the purpose of Bill S-12 is to provide for suitable punishment for such an individual, and in case you do not happen to have the bill before you I will put on the record what the proposed new section is.

Senator Flynn: You delay the deportation during the time of the sentence.

Senator Laird: Actually, yes; and I think it would be reasonable, to delay it to the point where we could then throw him in jail.

Senator Flynn: You could give him a chance to appeal.

Senator Laird: Yes. I am afraid we will hardly be able to deprive him of that.

Senator Haig: You can always make new regulations.

Senator Laird: We can always make regulations, yes. I will think that one over. In any event, the clause in this bill reads:

35.1 Every person against whom a deportation order is made who

(a) is deported or leaves Canada, and

(b) returns to Canada without the consent of the Minister, is, unless an appeal against the deportation order is allowed, guilty of an offence and is liable

(c) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for two years, or

(d) on summary conviction, to a fine of not more than five hundred dollars or to imprisonment for six months or to both.

In other words, no longer should we put up with the situation where these people can come back into this country with relative impunity. The worst that could happen is that they could be deported again. If they do come back in, then certainly we should have on the statute books a provision such as is now proposed in Bill S-12, which would enable suitable punishment to be meted out. I suggest that that would discourage the most undesirable characters from coming back in illegally.

Senator Flynn: But they would rather be in jail here.

Senator Laird: It is more pleasant here than in the States. Of course, I wouldn't know from personal experience.

Senator Denis: Could I ask a question of the honourable senator? What happens after the deportee has been sent to jail?

Senator Laird: He would be deported again, and if he came back we would put him in jail again. This could be frightfully discouraging to anyone.

Senator Grosart: May I ask a question of the honourable senator? Has he any information as to how prevalent this practice is of persons returning to Canada, without the consent of the minister, after having been deported? Are there any statistics on that?

Senator Laird: Like Will Rogers, all I know is what I read in the newspapers, and I have read that in at least one city in the province of Quebec, namely, Montreal, several undesirable characters have managed to come across the border, and it has even been alleged that while here they have committed crimes. I have no statistics on that, and to suggest that anyone else has would not be in accordance with the facts. But it is certainly known that this sort of thing happens, and now is the time to stop it.

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, there are a couple of things that occur to me. Following what Senator Grosart has said, surely there is a record that is easily available as to the number of people we have deported and who have come back here illegally. There are records on these things. In any event, when we deported them, we deported them at the expense of either Air Canada or the railways, and now we are going to feed them and look after them in jail for a couple of years, and then deport them at our expense, which seems to me to be a great economy indeed. But I cannot quite follow this. Can you tell me in what circumstances we indict one of these people whom we deport, and in what circumstances we charge them with a summary offence?

Senator Laird: On the first point, obviously there are statistics available as to the number of deportations. There is no question about that. I was thinking more in terms of those people who come back, and then commit a crime when here, and so on. I doubt if we have any statistics on that.

On the second point, the matter of whether the proceedings should be by way of indictment or summary conviction, I am sure Senator Croll will remember from his days in the practice of law that it is in order to proceed by way of indictment against an individual who has been guilty of more or less heinous crime, as compared to something minor. In other words, if the punishment to be meted out to discourage him is to be great, then you proceed by indictment. If not, you proceed by summary conviction.

Senator Croll: Yes, but that does not answer anything. A prosecutor will decide that in such and such a case he will proceed by indictment, and in another case, because he likes the colour of the accused's eyes, he will decide for summary conviction, and there is no difference in the offences. Moreover, now that you are relying on the newspapers, I think I read somewhere that there are a considerable number of people in Montreal who came from Haiti. You are now going to catch them under this act, so should there not be some exception, or does the act not affect those who are already here? Should you not give some starting period? It would hardly be fair to charge these people with coming here one way or another, and then to charge them suddenly with one or another of these offences, when we pass legislation that catches them at a later stage. Should we not make some provision for them?

Senator Laird: Frankly, I think, as always, we must leave some discretion to our public officials. Perhaps under those conditions they could very well decide it is not a case for laying a charge at all, but a case of mere deportation. Then, if there is an attempt to re-enter the country, they can utilize this new proposed section to punish them adequately.

Senator Molson: I have another question, following on Senator Croll's. Perhaps I am unduly confused by my honourable friend's reference to a heinous crime—a crime such as rape—in connection with indictment, rather than summary conviction. As I read bill S-12 the offence is that the person, having been deported, returned to Canada, and there is no other crime, whether it be petty theft or murder, involved at all. So, I ask Senator Croll's question: How is it decided whether proceedings shall be taken by way of indictment or by way of summary conviction?

● (1450)

Senator Laird: Quite frankly, this is the same situation that one finds in many pieces of legislation of this kind, where matters like this must be left to somebody's discretion. The person arranging the prosecution must decide in his own mind whether or not a particular individual who, let us say, is a known member of organized crime, should be proceeded against by way of indictment—in which event the punishment would be more severe—or whether, as in the case of some other individual who does not fall into that category, and who should not have the same punishment visited upon him, should be proceeded against by way of summary proceedings.

Senator Greene: Is there any reason why the situation is given in reference to a person who leaves the country and then returns? How does it apply in the case of somebody who stays in the country in violation of a deportation order? In the first case the crown has only to prove that he left the country and came back, and that there was a deportation order against him.

Senator Laird: This is intended to apply in the case of a person who has been deported and who has not obtained the consent of the minister to come back into Canada. He goes to the immigration people, deceives them and gets in through some subterfuge, and then he is found here without the minister's consent.

Senator Greene: But what is the situation in the case of a man who simply ignores a deportation order and stays in Canada? Has he committed an offence?

Senator Laird: Not under this section.

Senator Buckwold: I am concerned in the same way as Senator Croll about this judgment factor as to how a charge shall be laid, and whether the proceeding should be by way of indictment or by way of summary conviction. I realize that one way or the other it leaves the judgment to somebody. I appreciate the examples given of one who might be connected with organized crime, but at the same time this kind of thing worries me because it means that if it were felt that a man was politically undesirable, this rule could be used. Therefore, it concerns me that there should be this kind of judgment involved, particularly when there is a question as to who should exercise the judgment. Perhaps the sponsor of the bill could comment on that.

I am also concerned that if a conviction follows upon indictment the punishment is a term of imprisonment for two years. It seems to me that that is put in without any reference to any particular set of circumstances that may be involved. It is simply two years. Let us take, for example, the case of some unfortunate person who sneaks across the border to see his dying mother, or to go to her funeral. He would get the two years because that is a fixed sentence. And no matter how many times he came back, he would get two years each time. This is the kind of thing about which I would like some further information.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I have not made any particular study of this bill, but I would assume that the discretion given in the proposed section 35.1 is similar to that found in other pieces of legislation of this nature. A comparable discretion is given in the Income Tax Act in respect to violations of that act. The minister can proceed either on indictment or by way of summary conviction, depending on the nature of the violation. For example, in the case of a taxpayer who has removed his assets from the reach of the Department of National Revenue so that no income tax can be collected, the minister can issue directions and the department would proceed by way of indictment. If the offence is of a minor nature, then it would proceed by way of summary conviction. I presume it is proposed to adopt a similar process in the present legislation. Depending on the undesirability of having a particular deported person remain in Canada, and depending on the offence for which he has been deported, the department will issue directions to prosecutors as to whether they should proceed by way of indictment or by way of summary conviction. I would think this is a necessary discretion to be left with the minister or the department concerned, and in my view this is the reason for this particular clause in the bill.

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, if I may, I should like to suggest that the sponsor adjourn the debate, and at a later stage furnish some further information. He may reply by saying that this information will be provided in committee, but that is not good enough. We have to have an opportunity to think about the information given to us before considering the bill in committee.

Furthermore, I think that Senator Langlois picked a rather bad example when he suggested that this is similar to a provision in the Income Tax Act. I was going to cite the same section because I think it is a horrible example. Anyone who knows anything about that particular section of that act always wonders why Smith is charged and Jones is not, in practically similar circumstances. It is very hard to explain. I realize that in serious matters they do lay an indictment, but I have known of situations where prosecutions based upon similar circumstances have in one jurisdiction been proceeded with by way of indictment, and in another by way of summary conviction.

I do not think it is quite as simple as has been stated. We are entitled to further information with regard to this, because it is a very serious matter. We need to have this information so we can prepare our questions for the appropriate officials when this bill is referred to committee.

Senator Laird: Honourable senators, if anyone wants this bill sent to committee then, naturally, it will be sent there. But it seemed to me to be a very simple proposition. For example, I can answer Senator Buckwold's points very easily. The two-year period of imprisonment is flexible; it can be less than that. The wording in the bill is, "and is liable... to imprisonment for two years," so it does not have to be two years.

He then spoke about the matter of discretion when it comes to proceeding by way of indictment or summary conviction. Let us suppose the option is taken away and only one procedure is available, with a penalty of up to two years' imprisonment. Even then some person has to exercise discretion, and here I refer to the judge who hears the case. I cannot see how we can get away from the situation where an individual, whether the prosecutor or the judge—both of whom are human beings—has to exercise some discretion.

● (1500)

I do not know whether I misunderstood Senator Croll, but I am not clear as to the exact number of people deported. If he could give me a clue I would be glad to adjourn the debate and proceed afterwards.

Senator Thompson: Honourable senators, I have a question in connection with section 35.1(b) and a successful appeal against a deportation order. I assume that at the time a person is deported he has gone through all the available processes. On what grounds, therefore, would this appeal be allowed? He has illegally re-entered the country, yet this legislation suggests that he may not have gone previously through the full process of law, and an appeal may now be allowed. What would be the grounds for allowing the appeal after he has already been deported and has returned illegally?

Senator Laird: I suppose there could perhaps be very technical grounds, namely, that certain fundamental steps, which were a condition precedent to his deportation order, were not taken, or something of that nature.

Senator Thompson: My concern arises from the fact that this then would be the first time such a provision was contained in the legislation. There may be people who have been deported but changing conditions, such as you suggested previously, may have never been a reason for their return to have the deportation reconsidered. Is this the only way by which a person deported and out of Canada can have his case appealed? I feel, however, there are a number of blurred areas in the bill which perhaps the officials who drafted it could further clarify. I would like to see it referred to committee.

Senator Laird: Honourable senators, I thought we could dispose of this bill today. This has been a most interesting debate; one that I did not anticipate, but have enjoyed. It would appear that the sentiment is that this bill should be referred to committee. If it does receive second reading, and if that is the wish of the chamber, then that is what I will move.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, with respect to the need for this amendment to the Immigration Act, I would say that I come from an area which has been afflicted most adversely by those who contravene deportation orders. It has become a serious problem in the Vancouver area, and especially in the whole of southern British Columbia. Montreal and Toronto have also been affected. The criminal elements have been making a mockery of Canadian immigration laws. They have been deported from this country, and there are many cases on record—the information can be made available to the committee—in which within 24 hours those criminal elements have returned to Canada, engaging in crime and completely flouting any regulations which exist.

Whatever is done, in my view it is imperative that the two chambers of Parliament deal expeditiously with this particular measure. Law enforcement agencies are thoroughly alarmed about what has been going on. To have the present section stand without any penalty whatsoever, and allow a system to continue whereby time after time, when the minister orders people to be deported, they return across the border within a few hours, is not good enough. There are even cases on record in which they have returned within two hours of deportation, to go through the whole cycle again. Whatever we do, it is obvious that we must act.

Senator Flynn: I do not know whether the Leader of the Government is speaking to the bill, or putting a question to the sponsor. In any event, I will ask a question. Is there provision in the Immigration Act or the Criminal Code of a penalty for anyone entering this country illegally?

Senator Croll: Of course, there is.

Senator Perrault: In these circumstances, if other questions are in the minds of honourable senators, this bill should be referred to committee where we can hear the testimony of officials of the Department of Justice. Of course, there are penalties for offences of the type referred to. I would strongly suggest that we refer this bill to committee as soon as possible, perhaps to receive a report tomorrow afternoon.

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, I do not know the reason for this hurry. The House of Commons will not deal with any bills until after Christmas.

Senator Flynn: I would not say that. You may be exaggerating and hurting your case.

Senator Croll: But I do not see what the urgency is that requires us to rush. We have lived with the Immigration Act for a long time. In my opinion, we ought to be very careful before passing such a bill.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I believe there has been one misconception which the honourable sponsor of the bill cleared up, namely that the provision for two years' imprisonment on conviction on indictment is not a minimum of two years. There has been reference to the Income Tax Act and I point out that in that act, there is a distinction and where the Crown decides to proceed by way of indictment and there is a finding of guilty there is a minimum of three months' imprisonment. So the person who makes the decision as to whether to proceed by summary conviction or by indictment under that act is really making the decision as to whether or not, if the person is found guilty, he must go to jail. That is not the position under this bill.

Senator Flynn: Oh, yes, he has to go to jail if only for one day, if he is charged by indictment.

Senator Godfrey: Yes, and he can go to jail for one day under summary conviction under this bill, so there is no difference in the minimum sentence that must be imposed.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I wanted to deal with this bill this afternoon, but since many questions were raised and the bill, which seemed simple in its wording, certainly presents difficulties as to its meaning, I will call for the adjournment of the debate.

[English]

I move that the debate be adjourned in order that honourable senators will have an opportunity to study the bill further. Perhaps the sponsor could provide the committee with some clarification with respect to the questions which have been asked this afternoon.

On motion of Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

CUSTOMS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, October 17, the debate on the motion of Senator Cook for the second reading of Bill S-4, to amend the Customs Act.

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, in taking part in this debate, I would first of all like to join all those who have had the privilege and the opportunity to tell you, Madam Speaker, how pleased we are to serve under your leadership.

On February 9, 1971, I took part in the debate on the report submitted by the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in Canada. I then said that we had always been very impressed by the ability and the prestige of our charming lady colleagues and by their contribution to our debates, which is always very intelligent and widely appreciated. Their experience of life, as well as their feminine wisdom, often makes us see that any problem or discussion must be studied or understood with a very open mind.

In the same speech, as reported on page 514 of the Debates of the Senate, I said:

Mr. Speaker, I often praised the excellent work you are doing among us. Mrs. Deschatelets carries out her duties with great dignity, but I would like to be in the Senate long enough to have the privilege of sitting under the speakership of a female senator.

It is very obvious, dear colleagues, that the wisdom of the Prime Minister has surpassed my humble forecasts since only three years have passed and we are already privileged to serve under a second lady Speaker.

We must let go of the traditions which prevent women from participating in some areas of society. We cannot forbid our best subjects from acting on the scene of life.

Madam Speaker, your arrival in this house and your contribution to debate have been considered by the majority of the senators as a breath of spring and I hope you will continue the good work begun by your predecessor, Senator Fergusson.

● (1510)

[English]

The new Leader of the Government, Senator Perrault, comes to us with a large baggage of experience in the municipal, provincial and federal fields, and we wish him well. We hope that his broadmindedness regarding the new role of the Senate will not be lost in the legal entanglement of the establishment.

We are pleased that Senator Flynn has agreed to continue as our leader. Not only are we convinced that he has a great contribution to make, but also that he has so much French blood in him that it must be similar to good French wine.

Senator Flynn: I don't disagree with that.

Senator Bélisle: As it matures, champagne becomes much more appreciated.

To Senator Choquette, the former Deputy Leader of the Opposition, who has given us his best for the past 12 years, I personally say, "Thank you." His talented and humorous remarks as deputy leader will be missed by most of us, and we hope he will continue to enhance this chamber with his wit.

Senator Grosart, the new Deputy Leader of the Opposition, has a wealth of experience which will be put to good use. He will continue to perform in such a fashion that we will not be able to detect that he has too much controversial Irish blood in his veins.

Honourable senators, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to commend Senator Cook upon his fine presentation of Bill S-4. We too support the objects contained in the bill. We recognize the fact that it is largely a "housekeeping" bill in that it reconciles the jurisdictional provisions of the Customs Act with those of the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act, amended in 1970. Any measure, however small, that introduces consistency in our statutes is a welcome change and worthy of our support.

I need not remind honourable senators of the legislative Frankenstein, more politely referred to as the Income Tax Act, created by the Liberal government in 1971, which continues to haunt us with its anomalies and statutory discrepancies. Despite our wise counsel, which was rejected by the government during its passage, that act has to be amended every year because certain provisions in it are so specific in detail that they become inconsistent with existing legislation. When it is amended, other statutes are also amended. I ask the Leader of the Government: Why can the government not look in all directions first before crossing again on an amber light?

It is refreshing to find, therefore, that the government, at long last, is now proposing amendments to bring one statute permanently into alignment with another.

In this case, we understand that any future changes in the limits of the territorial sea of Canada will not necessitate further consequential amendments to the Customs Act. The use of the phrase "Canadian waters" in the proposed amendment thus bridges the gap.

This brings me to the important matter of the 12-mile limit. With the proposed amendments, the Customs Act would then deem the importation of any goods by sea to have been completed from the time such goods were brought within 12 miles of the coast or shores of Canada. Senator Cook mentioned that this amendment would alleviate a number of problems for Canadian industry and the government. He did not mention, however, that when the limit is extended to 12 miles, sensitive areas of Canadian sovereignty and customs control will become involved and other problems arise.

With regard to the latter, equipment and goods used in seismic surveys or mineral exploration between the three-mile and 12-mile limit now become subject to customs assessment. This would particularly affect oil exploration off the Atlantic coast.

I believe there are presently five drilling rigs in this region. Under the amended Customs Act, drill rigs of foreign origin, as entireties, would become dutiable under tariff item 49104-1 at 10 per cent ad valorem under the most favoured nation tariff. If entered in "used" condition, they would be subject to appraisal at the time of importation, with allowance given for depreciation.

Rigs of Canadian origin, however, would be eligible for duty-free entry as "Canadian goods returned," provided this was done within five years of the date of exportation and provided any drawback, refund or exemption granted at the time of exportation is repaid.

Obviously for some industries, the provisions contained in the amendment are favourable. For others, such as the oil industry, they are unfavourable and costly.

Proclamation of this bill will add a dutiable cost, at a depreciated value, to the costs of exploration. A 10 per cent increase in cost due to taxation, excluding the costs of money and inflation, is a sizeable sum on a multimillion dollar capital investment, as these oil rigs are. Furthermore, at a time like this, when we are desperately searching for new oil reserves, the last thing we want to do is to discourage oil exploration off our native shores, whether it be carried out by Canadian or foreign companies.

The government argues that Revenue Canada is presently prevented from providing duty and tax protection to Canadian industry in the Arctic offshore beyond the three-mile limit, where, as I say, a great deal of mineral exploration is taking place. That may be true, but the corollary is also true, that the extension of tax protection to Canadian industry to within the 12-mile limit might also deter oil companies, Canadian or foreign-owned, from carrying out further exploration in the Arctic as a result of other forms of taxation—for example, income tax. The so-called benefits to local residents in the Arctic would then become only a pipe dream.

Furthermore, it should be noted that by giving preferential tax treatment to Canadian companies over foreign-owned companies in resource exploration, there is no guarantee that Canadian investment in the north will increase and that employment opportunities for Canadians will expand. Indeed, from a report in the Ottawa Citizen dated October 21 there are indications that the opposite is true and that exploration in the north is declining. It says:

Drilling in Northern Canada declines as U.S. firms move rigs back home where business is better.

Oil Rigs Quit Canada in Drove.

Canadians urging more stringent conservation of non-renewable resources should take heart. While oil exploration has been stepped up the world over, drilling in northern Canada has declined this year.

Moreover, deep drilling rigs are leaving Canada in droves. They are heading south where business is better and the work year longer, according to Energy Information, a trade magazine published in Denver, Colorado.

[Senator Bélisle.]

The magazine reported earlier this month that between 46 and 62 drilling rigs left Canada in recent months. The exodus was spurred by threatened tax changes which would give more of the contractors' revenue to the federal and provincial governments.

The decline in northern drilling is supposedly a full 23 per cent at a time when drilling in other non-Communist parts of the world is up by 17 per cent . . .

Canada is still the second largest foreign oil supplier to the United States, a fact that is generally unknown, unappreciated or ignored. When oil is discussed in Washington the impression is created that all of it, or the vast majority, comes from Arab countries.

Honourable senators, when we approve amendments of this nature, we are changing the rules of the game. I hope, therefore, that the government will take note of the tax implications I have outlined, and that it will act accordingly in the interests of all Canadians.

In the light of recent developments—I say, in the light of recent developments; I know that this bill was drafted over a year ago, but now it is a different game—it may become necessary for the government to grant a special exemption from duty under the provisions of section 17 of the Financial Administration Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Senator Langlois, for Senator Cook, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, October 15, the debate on the motion of Senator Buckwold for the second reading of Bill S-6, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, in introducing this bill to the Senate, Senator Buckwold, who represents the wheat province of Saskatchewan, appeared to be flattered that his party had chosen him to pilot such a long and involved piece of legislation. I suppose that I also can feel flattered that my party has designated me to handle the "complicated" amendment consisting of several simple words.

We academics, according to the widespread opinion of students, are believed to be endowed with an extraordinary talent for complicating even simple matters. There have been suggestions that if we were to rewrite the Ten Commandments they would probably emerge in a larger volume than Tolstoy's War and Peace. However, gifted as I may be for complicating matters, this particular piece of legislation does not lend itself to such treatment. Everyone could understand Senator Buckwold's explanation.

Unlike most of the legislation brought before us by this government, this bill is simple, straightforward and intelligible. I shall go even further and say that Bill S-6 is good and useful legislation, based on practical considerations, if this is what farmers want.

While I am delighted to recognize the work of Senator McNamara, who comes from my province of Manitoba, particularly in the marketing of grain, unlike Senator Buckwold I am not at all tempted to use this opportunity to lavish unwarranted praise on the Canadian Wheat Board. There are many farmers on the Prairies who are not at all satisfied with the operations of the Wheat Board. However, this is not the occasion to deal with that topic, but I hope to return to it at another time.

To understand the need for this bill it is necessary to review some basic facts already mentioned. First, the crop year starts August 1, and ends July 31 of the following year. Secondly, grain farmers have in the past received final payment for their grain soon after it was sold. Thirdly, farmers normally received two payments per year, one in the late fall and another after the grain was sold, usually at the beginning of the following year.

However, in 1973 an unexpected problem arose. At the beginning of the year farmers received their second payment from the 1972 crop. Then in the fall of 1973 they received the first payment on that year's crop. Normally they did not expect a second payment that year; it should have come at the beginning of 1974. However, the 1973 crop was sold before the end of the calendar year, so the farmers received the final payment that year.

That meant that instead of the normal two payments, the farmers received three payments in 1973. A farmer's income was, therefore, much higher than it would otherwise have been. But, apparently, this did not produce joy. The higher money receipts moved him into a higher income tax bracket and he took a beating at the hands of the tax assessor, adding to his tax burden and financial planning difficulties. It seems that the Canadian Wheat Board cannot be entirely blamed for such transactions. As soon as the grain was sold the pool proceeded with the payments to the producers in order to close the accounts.

Bill S-6 attempts to prevent the recurrence of this situation. Accordingly, final payments on deliveries in any pool period cannot be made until January 1 or later, after the end of the pool period. Only one set of final payments can now be made in a single taxation year. This spreads the taxable income over a longer period of time, thus easing the farmer's tax burden by ensuring that he will not be placed in a higher income bracket. In such a way, the farmer can better plan his financial arrangements and be assured of some kind of income stability. Because of the higher world prices for wheat, oats and barley, which are not passed on to the farmer until later, the Wheat Board could better help him meet his needs by raising the initial price of grain sooner than has been the practice. In this I agree with Senator Buckwold.

We on this side of the house support this legislation, but I shall suggest minor changes. This government has caused much grief to the western farmer in many ways. Thus, when a piece of legislation such as this gives the farmer a small break for a change, we can at least have some satisfaction.

However, I do not fully understand the attitude of the farmer. I should like an explanation as to why he does not want his money immediately when it is coming to him. Even if he goes into the higher income bracket, why cannot he invest the extra sum in such a way as to pay the added taxes and still have more left over? A payment of $10,000, for example, deferred from November to April, at an inflation rate of 12 per cent, would be worth approximately only $9,400, which would be a substantial loss in purchasing power. Furthermore, the farmer is entitled to average his income over a five-year period for income tax purposes.

I also believe that consideration should be given to the final payment after January 1. We know that farmers need money for seeding in the spring. It would be of great help, and would ease a great burden, if they received the final payment, shall we say, by March 31 at the latest. Why not insert in this bill the deadline for the final payment?

I should like to have answers to these questions, and the consideration of a possible amendment. Consequently, I would recommend that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture.

The government as yet has not tackled the big problems that afflict the farmers and producers, and the country as a whole. Something must be done swiftly to prevent the looming economic recession and, perhaps, depression.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, after listening to Senator Yuzyk, one would agree that, while the official Opposition may be shorthanded, they have a well-informed spokesman in the field of agriculture.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: I am sure Senator Yuzyk will continue to make important contributions in this regard. However, I do want to make one or two comments on some of the things he has said.

Senator Flynn: Are you closing the debate?

Senator Argue: No. I did not move the motion. It is Senator Buckwold's bill.

Senator Yuzyk said that farmers are not satisfied with the Canadian Wheat Board. I think that statement is not correct. While the farmers may have suggestions as to how the operations of the Wheat Board might be improved from time to time, I am 100 per cent convinced that they stand fully behind it. I suggest that recent referenda have indicated that 90 per cent of the farmers stand behind the Canadian Wheat Board.

Senator Yuzyk asked why farmers do not want their final payment immediately after the close of a crop year on July 31. If it were possible in practical terms for the Wheat Board to dispose of the crop, the total crop bought from August 1 to July 31, within a few weeks after the end of the crop year, I am sure that farmers would want the payment quickly. However, the experience over the years has been, as I think Senator McNamara would agree, that it takes several months for the Wheat Board to sell and dispose of the balance of the inventory on hand at July 31. The Wheat Board has taken the position, and I think correctly, that it does not wish to close out a pool period when it still has large inventories of old wheat on hand. The Wheat Board feels that it is wise to process, to export and to sell its inventory. The experience over the years, therefore, has been that in general the final payment has been made in the early months of the calendar year following the end of the wheat pool year at July 31.

As Senator Buckwold pointed out, however, on one occasion, namely, in 1973, the final payment was made shortly after the end of July 31 and before the beginning of a new calendar year, which had the effect of placing an extra sum of money in the hands of the farmers in such a way that they had not budgeted for it and were, therefore, forced to pay higher income tax. Obviously, the farmers objected to the fact that, so far as this payment was concerned, they had no control over when it was made. Indeed, they had no knowledge that it was going to be made.

The fact is that, through this orderly system of marketing grain via the Canadian Wheat Board, the farmers wish to have a better idea of the money they are going to receive; they wish to have some stability in the price they receive as well as some orderliness in the dates on which the payments are to be made. I am convinced that farmers will support, and do support, this bill, which was explained so well by Senator Buckwold. I agree with Senator Yuzyk, however, that we should consider amending this measure by inserting a date beyond which the Wheat Board would not be allowed to close out the wheat pool account. In other words, there should be a set period during which the Wheat Board must close out the previous wheat pool account. Senator Yuzyk suggested March 31. It might just as well be April 30.

I also agree with Senator Yuzyk's suggestion that the final payment generally should be made in time for farmers to meet their seeding expenses with it, and, in general, that has been the practice. My inquiries demonstrate to me that over the last ten years the Canadian Wheat Board has made the final payments usually in the period from January to March. Only twice in that ten-year period were the final payments made after seeding. In fact, the Canadian Wheat Board, I am sure, would be quite prepared to live with a policy which would provide for the closing out of the pool period not later, shall we say, than March or April. So I suggest that this bill not only adds to the orderliness of the marketing of grain and the making of the final payment, but it could also be improved upon in this regard.

Senator Buckwold intimated that in his opinion the Canadian Wheat Board should increase the initial payments at this time. The authority for increasing the initial payments is provided, as I understand it, by order in council, so it is basically a decision of the Cabinet; it is a decision of the government.

I would think that Senator McNamara, who is more knowledgeable in this field than any of us, would feel that in relation to selling prices today the initial prices are unrealistically low and, in fact, distort the market situation as far as the farmer is concerned. This particular feature is more serious this year than it was a year ago, in that today feed wheat is sold on the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, and the farmer is placed in a ridiculous position. He can bring in his feed wheat, which may weigh as little as 32 pounds to the bushel—a bushel of wheat normally weighs 60 pounds, but frozen wheat can weigh as little as 32 pounds—and sell it on the open market, and receive perhaps $3.50 a bushel, depending on the market at that particular time. If he brings in a load of top quality or first grade wheat, he receives $2 a bushel, the initial price is so low. So, there is a tendency for the farmer to bring in the junk, the feed wheat, because he can get a high price for it, and he is perhaps reluctant to bring in his high grade wheat when he is receiving a lower price.

Senator Molson: May I ask my honourable friend if the same situation does not apply as between feed barley and malting barley?

Senator Argue: Yes, undoubtedly the same thing applies. The Wheat Board handles sales of malting barley. The sale of feed barley is now on the open market, so the farmer has that particular choice. I would think, however, that farmers are probably making a mistake. It is my unsolicited opinion that they are probably making a mistake in selling through the grain exchange, because with the upward movement of wheat prices there is an excellent chance that the Canadian Wheat Board, over the current year, will obtain an even higher price for feed grain and barley than is being received today.

I would like to mention the prices that prevail now with regard to wheat and barley as sold by the Canadian Wheat Board. Out of Thunder Bay, yesterday, No. 1, C.F. 13.5 per cent protein wheat was being sold by the Canadian Wheat Board at $5.85 a bushel, and the initial price is $2.25 a bushel, which is just 38 per cent. Durum wheat is being sold by the Canadian Wheat Board for $7.62 a bushel out of Thunder Bay, and the initial price is $2.25 a bushel. The initial price in this instance is just under 30 per cent of the selling price, and the farmers, I think, are justified in suggesting that the Wheat Board could double the present initial prices without in any way endangering the pool. This would give more money to the farmers now, it would bring the price of grain into better relationship with that of open market grain, and I would think that this is a very justifiable demand. An increase in initial prices would have the full support of individual farmers and, as far as I know, the support of all of their organizations, and I suggest it is something the government will just have to act upon in the days ahead. I would think that the sooner they act upon it, the better.

The main reason for this legislation is to make certain that payments are not lumped together in one crop year so as to bring the farmer into a higher income tax bracket, and not place him in a position where he has no control over his own budget and his own income tax. I suggest that the government should give further consideration to this question. I also suggest, as I suggested in a press release February 25, 1974, that one additional step should be taken—a major step—and that is that the farmer who sells grain should be allowed to defer his taking the proceeds into his income until such date in the future as he may select.

The wheat farmer selling grain on the prairies in 1974 is allowed, if he wishes, to have written on his cash ticket, "Not negotiable until January 2, 1975." In this way he indicates that he will not take that money into his income until 1975, and it is deferred until that time.

I suggest here to the government leader, and through him to his colleagues in the Cabinet, that they should allow the farmer to return his income from grain in any year in the future which he may choose.

Senator Laird: How about lawyers too?

Senator Argue: Perhaps; I do not know. I have not thought it through, but I would take it as a serious question—

Senator Buckwold: Lawyers do not have crop failures.

Senator Argue: Perhaps to make clearer what I am trying to say, I should read some excerpts from this press release that I issued on February 25, 1974.

What farmers are looking for is some way to continue deliveries and to defer these high returns—

And they are high returns.

—into the future to meet the 'bust'—

To meet the time of lower returns.

—that they feel must follow. The current one-year deferment and the announced final payment deferment—

Which we are dealing with today.

—are just not enough. These steps are designed to meet the small peaks of normal operations. The current situation is not normal and the farmers will continue to hold back deliveries.

In some cases.

The farmers should be able to postpone cash settlement for their grain sales not only until 1975 but indefinitely. The mechanism that I suggest is that the farmer be given wheat board certificates with a value equal to the value of his deliveries. These would be cashable at any time and the tax would be paid in the year they were cashed. Each farmer could thus establish his own stabilization fund to which he could add or from which he would draw according to his income needs.

The Wheat Board would have the use of the money to help finance its operations and could make a modest interest payment of say 5%. This would benefit all the farmers whether they were in the plan or not.

A further argument in favour of such being done is that it would be an anti-inflationary step. It would mean that this segment of Canadians could decide, if they wished, to defer receiving that money, rather than putting it into circulation at this time. It would be a form of insurance over which the farmer himself would have some control. It would be a form of savings. When the farmer decided to take it into his income the government, of course, would collect the full income tax in that year.

It would probably be a further anti-inflationary contribution by farmers who preferred to take this money at this time. Inflation is a fact, and they would be making an anti-inflationary move, though their money would probably be worth less when they decide to take it into income, but because grain prices are particularly high, the farmers feel that they should be given the privilege of taking the proceeds into income at a later date.

There have been few suggestions that I have made in the time I have been here that have received more support, and more publicity, than the suggestion to which I have now referred. I think it is fair to say that the farm organizations have not actively promoted this idea. It has, however, been warmly received. I hope the government will give this suggestion very serious consideration because it would enable the farmers to provide a stabilization fund for themselves, and it would make doubly sure that the grain on the Prairies is moved into market channels at this time.

The bill before us is a good bill. It is a step in the right direction, and I am sure it will receive the support of the Senate. Perhaps the Senate might even improve it.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must inform the Senate that if Senator Buckwold speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading of this bill.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I should like to thank Senator Argue and Senator Yuzyk for their very important contributions to the debate on this bill, relatively simple as it is in its original context. I am particularly pleased that Senator Yuzyk was kind enough to say a very unusual thing for the Opposition. I am not quite sure whether he received the endorsement of his leader or not when he said that this was good and useful legislation. I thank him very much for that. I think he also used the words "intelligent legislation", and that is even better.

Senator Flynn: It is unique.

Senator Buckwold: I think the points raised by Senator Yuzyk have been answered by Senator Argue in so far as the general level of the debate is concerned. However, I should like to point out, as Senator Argue has stated, that the Wheat Board is well supported by the vast majority of farmers, and anything that in any way attempts to weaken the position of the Wheat Board—and this we have seen recently during the debate on the bill to amend the Feeds Act—rouses the ire of the farm organizations. Their support is entirely for the Wheat Board, and they are against those who would in any way try to dilute it or alter its position as the main marketing agency for the farmers of western Canada. This should be clearly understood and probably Senator Yuzyk would agree.

Senator Argue has raised several points which are really not within the scope of this bill. He offers suggestions which, in his opinion, would improve the position of the farmers by deferring indefinitely their receipts from grain sales so that they would have the opportunity of providing their own stabilization fund, and take the cash when they need it with perhaps some small interest.

I am not here to debate that particular point, honourable senators, but I must admit that I would have to be convinced that in the long run it would be in the best interests of the farmers, or that in the long run it would stabilize the income of the farmers, or that it would be possible for the bulk of the farmers, and not just the wealthy farmers, to take advantage of it. I have a feeling that in many instances it would not be too meaningful. I would also remind Senator Argue of the five-year averaging program which, while it might not achieve all that he would like, does give a modicum of opportunity for farmers to level out the good years and the bad.

However, this is a very good forum in which to make the point. I hope the opportunity will arise for us to debate it in more depth, and I am sure it will be put to the witnesses when this bill is discussed, as I hope it will be, in the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture.

An important point was raised so far as an increase in the initial price is concerned. I indicated in my original presentation of the bill that I felt it important that this should be done. The initial payment for wheat now is $2.25 a bushel. Last year that went up, as a result of the follow-up, to $3.75 per bushel, and I agree wholeheartedly with Senator Argue and Senator Yuzyk that in all fairness that initial price should be raised to make it more realistic. I hasten to add that I believe it will be, and I say that not because I have any inside information, but simply from reading the farm press and speeches. It seems to me that the time has come for that action to take place, and for that initial price to be raised.

Reference was made to the fact that because feed grain prices are much higher a lot of feed grain is moving by sale through the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, because farmers want the additional funds now. That may be, but I am not underestimating the general intelligence of the farmers in the way they handle their grain sales, and I have a feeling that this is now levelling out very nicely so that the farmers themselves will benefit to the greatest extent. At least, I hope so.

Honourable senators, we have the bill in front of us and I think it has been fairly well explained. If it is read the second time, I shall move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture for further discussion and study.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Senator Buckwold, bill referred to Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture.

AIRCRAFT REGISTRY BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Louis de G. Giguère moved the second reading of Bill S-5, to enable Canada to comply with a Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill S-5, the Aircraft Registry Bill, was introduced for the first time in the Senate on June 26 last year by Senator Lapointe, who is now Madam Speaker. The bill received second reading, and was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications on June 26. On June 28 the bill was reported from committee without amendment, and on July 3 received third reading and was sent to the House of Commons.

● (1600)

On November 2, 1973, the bill was read a second time in the other place where it was debated by representatives of all parties, who agreed that it was important and timely legislation. It was then referred to their Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. That session of Parliament was prorogued before the bill was reported from committee.

As this bill, was discussed and explained at length in both chambers, and in the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, I have little to add, but I should refresh your memories by briefly reviewing its main clauses.

The object of the proposed act is to enable Canada to comply with the Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft signed at Geneva on June 19, 1948. It provides for a central aircraft registry in which may be recorded notices of interest in aircraft, which includes ownership, a lease of not less than six months, security for payment of a debt, and security for equipment or services provided in respect of an aircraft. This bill will eliminate the very complex procedure whereby financial interests in an aircraft, in order to be protected, must be registered in all the various districts of all provinces and in all countries where the aircraft may be flown. It provides for filing of a notice of interest in an aircraft which shall apply against its components and avionics, but not against spare parts. It assures priority of claims according to date of registering notice of interest, but it does not affect priority of claims recorded under any act of Parliament or of any provinces before the coming into force of the section on priority. A claim could not be enforced against an aircraft by sale without an order of a superior court, which order shall provide for notice and time of sale, and distribution of proceeds.

The bill also provides for the consent of each person who has registered a notice of interest in an aircraft before the registration can be cancelled for purpose of export. It gives greater security to the creditor or financier. One point that must be stressed is that the central aircraft registry is strictly an information system. It does not legally establish or guarantee clear title to an aircraft.

Another provision of the bill prohibits the seizure of an aircraft operating on a scheduled commercial air service, whether domestic or international. It assures that the aircraft and its passengers are guaranteed an uninterrupted preplanned journey. A notice of interest, unless cancelled, will be deemed to have expired five years after being recorded unless extended upon application. The bill also provides for making the necessary regulations respecting procedures, the form and content of notices of interests, setting fees, and prescribing penalties for filing false information.

Thirty-three countries have ratified, or deposited an adherence to, the convention, including the United States, France, West Germany, Italy and the Scandinavian countries. The United Kingdom was a signatory state of the convention, and has recently enacted provisions of a nature similar to ours under the Mortgage of Aircraft Order of 1972.

To conclude, the air law section of the Canadian Bar Association has been studying and advocating a central aircraft registry for a number of years. The bill has the support of the Canadian manufacturers of aircraft, and the Air Transport Association of Canada. As a similar bill was passed by the Senate and debated in the House of Commons in the last Parliament, I do not see the necessity of referring it to the committee for the second time unless some honourable senators wish a more elaborate technical or legal explanation, particularly on the constitutional aspect.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, the aim of this bill is obviously desirable. It is based on the Convention of the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft, signed at Geneva in 1948, the objectives of which convention have been proven by time, I suggest, to be worthy of support. The comments of the sponsor of the bill, Senator Giguère, add to this proposition. I am very much in favour of the objectives, but I have some doubt as to the constitutionality of the bill, of which doubt I should like to be relieved at a meeting of the Transport and Communications Committee.

I should explain what I have in mind. This legislation would in some ways parallel the Canada Shipping Act, under which a vessel is registered under federal legislation and claims, mortgages, et cetera, may be registered against the ship under that federal registration. As all honourable senators are aware, however, in the British North America Act, navigation and shipping is specifically referred to in section 91 as a matter of federal jurisdiction. This is not so with regard to aircraft, of course, for the very good reason that at the time of the enactment of the British North America Act aircraft were unknown. Since then, of course, aircraft, being movables just as any other movable, have come under provincial laws. If I am not mistaken, speaking of chattel legislation in the common law provinces, the chattel mortgage provisions in each of the provinces would apply to an aircraft.

In Quebec we have also had for some years provisions concerning that type of mortgage on movables, which is known as nantissement commercial. I do not have a copy of the Civil Code with me, and I do not remember the translation. Under this legislation it is not compulsory for the proprietor of an aircraft to register it. The only provision, contained in section 5, is that an aircraft registered in Canada in the registry provided by the Department of Transport is subject to the registration of a mortgage or a claim for provision of fuel or other material. If someone wishes to force sale of the aircraft by reason of judgment, of course, other claims registered against this aircraft in the federal registry must be taken into consideration. That would seem very reasonable on a general basis, and is not the source of the problem that arises in my mind. If the legislation is to be enforced in this manner I am very much in agreement with it.

● (1610)

The problem I have is: How would we resolve a conflict between two creditors, if one claimed on the strength of provincial legislation—such as the chattel mortgage under the common law of the provinces, or one under nantissement commercial in the Civil Code of Quebec—and the other creditor had registered his claim under this legislation? This is, to me, a very important question to resolve.

A reading of the proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, which dealt with this matter on June 27, 1973, does not offer an entirely satisfactory answer. It is indeed very vague. A question raised by Senator Choquette was answered by Mr. L. Shields, Legal Services, Ministry of Transport, but the answer does not satisfy me at all, and apparently it did not satisfy some members of the other place.

Therefore, I would ask the sponsor of the bill to obtain from the Department of Justice, for the sitting of the committee—I hope he will agree to refer the bill to committee—an opinion on the point I have raised, in order to clarify the situation and dissipate my apprehension. If the situation is not satisfactorily clarified, I think the Senate should give further consideration to this matter. It is our responsibility to adopt not only desirable legislation but also workable legislation.

Senator Giguère: As this legislation has been delayed for 25 years, I do not think we should worry about any further delay. However, this bill should be referred to committee, where the Minister of Justice or his representative can give an opinion.

Senator Grosart: I am a little puzzled about the long title of the bill—An Act to enable Canada to comply with a Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft. I should like to ask why we need an act “to enable Canada,” or is the act really an act to comply with the Convention of the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft? Why does Canada need an act “to enable” it to comply? Perhaps I might have the answer now, or in committee.

Senator Flynn: It is related to my question.

Senator Langlois: It is for ratification.

Senator Grosart: It is not ratification. That would be an “act to comply.”

Senator Giguère: The act itself will be called the Aircraft Registry Act.

Senator Grosart: But the full title is still there. I am asking whether we might have an explanation in committee of why this terminology is used, because it goes into the whole question of Canadian sovereignty. One of the essences of sovereignty is that you can enter into obligations under a treaty or convention. We are all aware that it is because of the division of powers between the central government and the provinces that this is not so for Canada. Normally an act of this sort would be an act to comply with the convention. I am merely querying those words, because it may apply to other acts and it may speak to a rather broad principle.

Senator Giguère: If the representative of the Minister of Justice is competent to discuss constitutionality, he may be able to help in this matter.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Senator Giguère, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Administrator's Speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Senator Neiman, seconded by Senator Côtteau, for an Address in reply thereto.

Hon. Bernard Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I should like to begin by extending to His Excellency the Governor General our best wishes for a full recovery. I am sure we are all most anxious to see him soon resume his official duties.

[Translation]

Senator Lapointe, I congratulate you on your appointment as Speaker.

As I have myself dabbled in journalism, I recognize your exceptional talents and I am well aware of your devotion to Parliament and to the country it serves. I am quite certain that your wisdom and personal charm ensure your success in fulfilling the duties of your very high position.

[English]

I should speak in Gaelic the next time.

May I express now my personal gratitude to the distinguished lady who preceded you, Madam Speaker. Since she first entered this chamber, Senator Fergusson provided all honourable senators, past and present, with a very special kind of example through her hard work and dedication. It is the Senator Fergussons of this country who have continued, and will continue, to make this place a worthwhile and enduring institution.

To Senator Perrault, that eloquent champion of the West Coast, from the East Coast I offer my most sincere congratulations. As all honourable senators know, Senator Perrault has had a rich experience in the public life of this nation. The knowledge, vigour and enthusiasm which he has clearly demonstrated in the short time that he has been leader, speaks well for his future in this chamber.

I am delighted to see that the government leader will continue to have the able assistance of Senator Langlois as deputy leader, and that our affable colleague from Newfoundland, Senator Petten, has accepted the onerous duties of Whip. With my colleague from Cape Breton, Senator John M. Macdonald, as Whip for the Opposition, we have the guarantee that whipping responsibilities on both sides of the house are in good hands.

One of our members, one of the most distinguished and respected public figures in the history of our country, is about to leave Parliament following 39 years of uninterrupted and remarkable service. No member of parliament ever brought to this or the other house greater dedication, and no member of Parliament ever demonstrated greater skill in the art of diplomacy than did Senator Paul Martin. He loved Parliament as much as anyone, and more than most.

When he moves from the domestic political arena back to the international stage, it will be, I am sure, but another chapter to enhance an already brilliant career. We all wish him well in his role of High Commissioner to Great Britain.

I am delighted to see Senator Flynn back in his role as Leader of the Opposition. He performs his tasks with ability and great sincerity, and I hope, honourable senators, that ways and means will be found to assist Senator Flynn and members of the Opposition in providing those research and other facilities which are necessary for them to discharge their responsibilities properly.

● (1620)

I congratulate Senator Grosart on his appointment as Deputy Leader of the Opposition. His native ability, his Irish wit and his ready turn of phrase assure this chamber of a valuable and worthwhile contribution whenever he speaks.

As others have said before me, I have every confidence that Senator Choquette will continue to give this house the benefit of his many years of experience as a wise man and a cunning and forceful debater.

I congratulate my seatmate, Senator Neiman, on the subject matter and excellence of her remarks in moving the motion for an Address in reply.

I am very proud of my fellow Nova Scotian, Senator Côtteau, for the manner in which he made his debut in this chamber in seconding that motion. Senator Côtteau and Senator Barrow, both of whom are longtime friends of mine, bring to the Senate a special kind of in-depth knowledge, expertise and experience from the diversified fields of business and education, and this house will benefit greatly from their presence.

Honourable senators, no topic has had as much discussion in recent years as the problem of inflation. We have all watched as prices of goods and services have advanced at a rate in excess of 10 per cent during the last year, and even at the present time there is little indication that the next months will show any amelioration. While we have been enduring this problem, debates are engaged in by spokesmen from the major sectors, attempting to place the blame for what many believe to be economic chaos. In this scenario, business blames the demands of labour, labour attacks the exorbitant profits, politicians blame the indecisiveness of whatever government they happen to be opposing, and economists debate whether inflation is caused by wage demands or aggregate demand. And all the time the consumer pays more and more.

I wish to state that it is not my intention in this debate to add further heat to that subject. However, I do feel that it is crucial to be aware that inflation is a worldwide phenomenon, and to meet this challenge effectively it will be necessary to have international cooperation. I also believe that part of the inflationary problem relates to a restructuring of international prices of basic commodities, such as oil, sugar and so on, and as well to some restructuring of prices within our own internal economy.

With a stable majority government in the next four years, at a time when other countries in the western world are facing serious political uncertainties, Canada may well be in a unique position to provide leadership in fostering and promoting the kind of international co-operation which is necessary.

I believe that the government of the day is deeply concerned with the inflationary crisis. The government tells us that we must understand that inflation for the most part is imported, and, secondly, that we must look at all problems in terms of the rate of inflation in the rest of the world, and more particularly in relation to our major trading partners.

At the same time, I must emphasize that inflation will never disappear in the dark of the night. In particular, I think we must be concerned with inflation as it affects the poor, and that is precisely what I want to speak about at this moment. Steps have been taken to link old age pensions to the consumer price index. Family allowances have been increased. Subsidies have been placed on milk and bread, and indeed on oil in the eastern part of our country, to ease the effects of inflation. Federal monies from the Department of National Health and Welfare have been increased to the provinces to allow improved benefits to the poor.

I fully appreciate that all problems must be placed and faced with a sense of priority and a sense of fairness. But it is not good enough to talk about the problem without offering at least some suggestions for improvement, so I would like therefore to suggest that the impact of rising prices on the poor cannot accurately or fairly be measured by reference to the consumer price index alone.

As I understand it, the consumer price index is computed once a month by measurements and samplings taken on a given number of commodities, or basket of goods if you will, in various sections of the country. However, I suspect that the basket of goods measured by the survey reflects the type, quality and quantity of goods to be found on the middle-class shopper's list, and thus the consumer price index does not place the impact of rising prices on the poor, the people at the lower end of the income scale, in proper perspective.

I believe that it may be necessary to modify or develop a new index that will more accurately reflect the increases in the prices of goods bought by the poor, those on low incomes, pensioners and those others with fixed incomes. Such an index might also reflect the inability of those on low incomes to make adjustments to compensate for inflation because of the high proportion of their incomes that goes to provide for the basic necessities of life. For example, in the face of rising milk prices, it may be argued that most Canadian families can reduce the cost of buying milk by purchasing skim milk or mixing whole milk with powdered milk. But for the poor who may already be consuming skim or powdered milk, or both, there are no alternatives to reduce their milk cost—short of drinking water.

I submit again that we should develop a new index that measures the increases in prices of commodities bought most often by the poor. I am sure it will be found that the costs of basic food and shelter in an inflationary economy rise much more rapidly than the consumer price index would indicate. Such a move as I propose, the establishment of a new index for the poor, would at least permit the government to stabilize, if not improve, the buying power of that segment of our society.

I also believe that the federal government must take new initiatives with the provinces to ensure that fresh milk is available to all people. When fresh milk costs over 50 cents a quart our children are being deprived, and we are, I suggest, risking the health of future generations. Subsidizing the price of fresh milk is an investment that the government cannot afford not to make. I also need not remind you that not only would it be important for the health of the Canadian people, but it would ensure the viability of the dairy industry, and it is for this reason that I would further ask that the subsidy be paid to the producer and not the processor.

The present inflationary pressures are pushing out of the agricultural industry all but the large integrated farms. Again, we must decide if it is in the best interests of the Canadian people to permit monopolies to be encouraged in the food industry. If not, then policies must be devised to give producers a fair return while the consumer is protected. Policy decisions in this area would have long-term effects on the direction of the agricultural industry.

● (1630)

I would also like to comment on another sector that has implications for many Canadians. I believe that most of us accept that the private market cannot provide for the housing needs of all Canadians. Therefore, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation was established, and from time to time legislation is enacted to provide for our housing needs. In the past two years we have had examples such as the Neighbourhood Improvement Program and the Assisted Home Ownership Program. The first of these was to provide for the improvement of older neighbourhoods, and the second was to assist lower income people to achieve some ownership. Unfortunately, neither program is presently receiving adequate financing, and, as a result, this sometimes leaves the people most directly concerned more frustrated than if the programs had never existed.

I would insist that any real attempt to solve our serious housing problems can only be productive and have beneficial results if good legislation is adequately financed. Certainly, the priority for funds for housing can hardly be challenged, and there is no doubt that the existing programs are sound and can be made to work. Now is the time for a solid commitment to match worthwhile programs with adequate funds.

Honourable senators, I would beg your further indulgence in dealing with two items which may be considered a bit parochial, but, nevertheless, in my judgment are of national significance.

As some of you may know, I was closely associated with the Cape Breton Development Corporation before coming to this chamber. In the late 1960s, when Devco came into being, we were told that coal was to be phased out and that steel was finished.

Let me talk about the coal situation for a moment. The Donald report, famous in coal mining circles, recommended in 1966 that, of four existing, heavily subsidized, worn out coal mines in Cape Breton, two should be closed as soon as possible and the other two should operate for a maximum of 15 years—to 1981. The latter move was designed obviously to assist in the adjustment of the work force. But there was no question about the finality of the year 1981. Operating losses, since Devco took over the mines in the spring of 1968, have ranged from $25 million to $30 million each year. Last year the loss was indeed $30 million.

However, as a result of much perseverance, a lot of faith, courage, determination and, more recently, some favourable breaks in the market place, there is today a new hope and a new confidence.

[Senator Graham.]

One Devco mine has been closed for safety reasons. Another was shut down by fire. A third is having its own aging difficulties. But a new mine, one of the most modern and potentially one of the best in the world, has been opened at Lingan; and rehabilitation of a second big producer is nearing completion. Local and world demand may well lead to other new mines.

However, the real story is that—because of the new mine, modernization, improved prices, improved production, and teamwork—Tom Kent, the widely known President of Devco, informs me that there is an excellent possibility that the day is not far off when Government of Canada subsidies will not be required at all. Some senior officials confidently predict that the company will reach a break-even position next year. Contrast that possibility with the previous dismal prospects, and I suggest the Government of Canada and all those involved deserve high praise for their perseverance and performance.

Hopefully, a much improved situation might enable Devco and the Government of Canada to make provision for further improvements in the conditions and benefits of the mining work force, both past and present.

The coal and steel industries of Cape Breton are very much interrelated. Most people in this chamber are aware of the rocky road steel has travelled in Nova Scotia in the last few decades. Here again, the plant was allowed to run down and was about to be pronounced dead when the Government of Nova Scotia was forced to take over. A major transfusion in the way of new equipment and modernization was required even to sustain the present plant. Expansion is necessary to be competitive; consequently, large amounts of capital are required from both the public and private sectors.

A new dramatic dimension has now been added to the Nova Scotia steel picture. The Government of Canada, through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, commissioned a major study, called the Canstel study, to examine the feasibility of developing a world scale steel industry in eastern Canada—on what they call the Atlantic Rim. While the results of the study have not yet been made public, it has been authoritatively indicated that eastern Cape Breton has the best combination of advantages for a major steel operation.

The Canstel study considered a steel industry which would start at a production base of between three and four million tons per year, and which could be expanded in similar modules to eight or even 12 million tons per year, if and when world conditions permit.

When he addressed the annual dinner of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council on Monday night last, Premier Regan said that definite progress is being made, and that the revitalization of Sydney Steel and the idea of a world scale steel plant can and will be looked upon as the same project.

These developments in large measure are made possible, among other things, by the work that is being done in the coal industry by Devco, to establish the suitability of Cape Breton coal for coking purposes.

Honourable senators, it appears that the economic wheel may finally be turning in a favourable direction for eastern Nova Scotia. I am confident that any beneficial results will be felt throughout the province and, indeed, throughout the entire nation.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators—I waited a few seconds, honourable senators, simply to be able to observe the anxiety in your eyes at the prospect of listening to me make a second speech today. I simply wish to move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report of the Director of Investigation and Research, Combines Investigation Act, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1974, pursuant to section 49 of the said Act, Chapter C-23, R.S.C., 1970.

Copy of a report of a study into concerns raised in the Food Prices Review Board's study on eggs.

Senator Flynn: That second report should be fascinating.

Senator Perrault: Yes, a real omelette.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE EXPENSES TABLED

Senator Forsey, Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, which was authorized by the Senate on April 23 and April 30, 1974 to incur special expenses in connection with its permanent reference relating to the review and scrutiny of statutory instruments, tabled, pursuant to rule 84, a report of the said expenses.

FIRST REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Senator Forsey, Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments presented the first report of the committee as follows:

Your committee recommends that its quorum be fixed at seven (7) members, provided that both Houses are represented, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings and receive evidence so long as five (5) members are present, provided that both Houses are represented;

That the committee have power to engage the services of such expert staff, and such stenographic and clerical staff as may be required;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time, and to adjourn from place to place; and

Your committee further recommends that it be empowered to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Forsey moved that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEPHONE COMPANY—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Haig, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-11, respecting British Columbia Telephone Company, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Perrault moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, October 29, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Before the question is put, I should like to give, as is customary, a brief outline of the work program for next week. When we resume our sittings on Tuesday afternoon we will consider the Appropriation Act, which is likely to come to us some time tomorrow. We hope that it will be ready for royal assent by late Wednesday afternoon.

On Tuesday we will also likely resume consideration of Bill S-12, to amend the Immigration Act, following which we will consider whatever legislation is reported back to us from committees. I am not in a position to give the sequence in which legislation will arrive, but I will endeavour to establish this in advance, in order to be able at least to advise the Senate the day before any legislation is put forward for consideration on our agenda.

There will also be many meetings of Senate committees. The Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs will hold its organizational meeting, then discuss two bills which have been referred to it. The Committee on Transport and Communications will likely deal with Bill S-5, the Aircraft Registry Bill, which was referred to it yesterday. The Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet Wednesday morning to consider Bill S-4, to amend the Customs Act, and the Committee on Health, Welfare and Science will sit Thursday morning at 10 o'clock to consider Bill S-9, to repeal the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act and to amend the Trade Marks Act. The Senate will have a fairly heavy load of work next week.

Senator Haig: May I inform honourable senators that the Committee on Transport and Communications will meet Thursday morning at 9:45 to discuss Bill S-5.

Motion agreed to.

WATERGATE TAPES

REFERENCE TO PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA—QUESTION

Senator Walker: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. The former President of the United States, while still President, used a very derogatory seven-letter word beginning with "a" to describe none other than the Prime Minister of Canada. I do not choose to repeat the word in the Senate but, as a former libel lawyer among other things, I would suggest that it is highly libelous and that it connotes many things, including defaming the character of the Prime Minister—after all, he is the Prime Minister of all of us—bringing him into ridicule and bringing him into disrepute and even contempt.

My question to you, sir, is: Would the Leader of the Government consult with the Minister of Justice to confirm, if there is any doubt in his mind, that this is libelous as applied to the Prime Minister, and ascertain from the Prime Minister whether he intends to institute an action for libel against Richard Nixon.

Had this seven-letter word beginning with "a" been used to describe the full cabinet, no action would lie because, of course, of a technicality—the technicality being that a group cannot sue.

To leave such an epithet as this unanswered, when the Prime Minister is having an almost De Gaullist triumph travelling through Europe—in Paris and Brussels, and, tomorrow, London—it is a shame, because all the tremendous éclat with which he is being treated, all the nice things that are being said about him, are shockingly disturbed by this report, which, to Europeans, may appear to have some semblance of truth. They do not know.

It cannot remain, with the greatest respect, unanswered. It should be answered. For instance, when the Prime Minister reaches London, and this episode is mentioned in the press, on radio and TV, and he is presented as the avant-garde of the new generation of statesmen, I should believe, honourable senators, that Mr. Nixon's pardon does not excuse him from a civil suit, particularly an action for libel, by Prime Minister Trudeau.

Senator Langlois: He would be pardoned again.

Senator Walker: In those circumstances, we could see how far the American system can be tested. If an action were commenced, Mr. Nixon could try to defend himself, of course, by stating, first, that this was a privileged occasion—and in the United States everyone tries that out for size over and over again—or he could defend himself by saying that his statement about the Prime Minister was justified. A third defence could be that his statement was, in fact, true.

Surely, honourable senators, in a trial by jury—and this must be a trial by jury—Mr. Trudeau should undoubtedly succeed.

I have one more question. If the Prime Minister, for any reason, chooses not to sue, and thus avoid the inconvenience—and, I might add to lawyers such as Senator Greene and others—the uncertainties of a jury trial, he could surely write Mr. Nixon demanding an apology.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, together with other members of this chamber, and of the other place, I was shocked and surprised to read the news accounts of certain language allegedly employed to describe the Right Honourable the Prime Minister. However, one must bear in mind that these are news reports, and traditionally we in Parliament have not accepted reports in newspapers or on radio or television stations as constituting the final word with respect to accuracy.

Senator Walker: It is a court report. It came from the court yesterday.

Senator Perrault: Again I would remind the honourable senator that it is a report of an alleged transcript from the court. But may I say that I think the Prime Minister and political representatives of all parties within the Canadian political system have shown an unfailing ability to rise above base invective and calumny, whatever its source, and it is my personal view that if in fact the epithet in question was employed to describe the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, it is beneath contempt and not worthy of reply.

[Later:]

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, I do not know if I am in order in speaking following the Leader of the Government in response to a question put to him, but if I may have your indulgence—

Senator Flynn: This is the time for questions, not for any kind of statement. I would not mind if it were done at the beginning of the sitting, but if you want to engage in debate, I suggest that it is improper at this time.

Senator Denis: Put your question.

Senator Flynn: I am not putting a question. I am objecting.

Senator van Roggen: Although the Leader of the Opposition objects, I wish to comment on Senator Walker's question.

Senator Flynn: That is the point. I am merely drawing the attention of the Senate to the fact that, if we allow Senator van Roggen to comment, we might as well start a debate.

Senator Grosart: The rule is clear.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

SENATORS' IDENTITY CARDS—QUESTION

Senator Blois: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator Greene: I hope it is a more intelligent question than the last one.

Senator Walker: You are a good judge.

Senator Blois: Senator Greene may think it is later; he may be involved in it too.

Is it necessary for all members of the Senate to carry a pass of some kind when they want to enter this building? Perhaps I could make this a little clearer if I might be permitted to elaborate by saying that when I attempted to enter the building today by the post office entrance, where I always come in to get my mail, I was asked by a security officer, not too politely, "Let me see your pass." I said, "What do you mean—pass? I have never had a pass." I was told, "You have to have a pass to get in." I will not repeat the word I used to him, but I said, "I am a member of the Canadian Senate. I have been a member for 15 years. I have never heard of a pass, I have never had a pass, I do not have one and I am going in." I pushed past him and he then said in a loud voice, "Thanks for being so cooperative." I replied, "All right, if you feel you should arrest me, do so, but I advise you not to."

If we need to have passes we should know if we have to line up and get them.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, none of us can be unaware of the very difficult position and role of the security forces, not only those on Parliament Hill but those throughout society today. In the past five or six years there have been a number of instances that have made it necessary, and indeed desirable, to take more stringent security precautions. It is not an easy task for our security people, who by and large I think serve parliamentarians very well indeed. If in this particular instance security officials appear to have pursued their duties with uncommon zeal, I hope the honourable senator will understand the problems that face them.

Senator Blois: May I ask the Leader of the Government if he has a pass? Do other members have passes? If not, how do we get them? Do we have to line up? Are they sent to us? I think we should have an explanation of this.

Senator Perrault: I do indeed have a pass. I have been challenged on occasion and it has been a pleasure to produce the pass when requested to do so.

Senator Blois: I have never had one, and I find that many others do not.

Senator Grosart: How do we get one?

Senator Denis: It is for your own safety.

Senator Flynn: Senator Blois is not an institution like Senator Denis.

Senator Denis: I could say the same thing about the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Greene: There are institutions and destitutions of Parliament.

[Later:]

Senator Haig: Honourable senators, I should like to point out that identity cards can be obtained from the office of Mr. Walter Dean, Director of Administration and Personnel. I obtained one for myself only this morning. The card bears a picture of the person being identified.

[Senator Blois.]

The picture is taken right in Mr. Dean's office and involves only a few minutes of your time. I might say that it is a rather good picture.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Flynn: Speak for yourself.

Senator Haig: In fact, I wanted to get more than one, but that is all I was entitled to. The picture is put on the card, you sign the card, and the card, bearing both your signature and Mr. Dean's, is then sealed in plastic. This card will give you admittance to any part of this building.

OFFICIAL VISIT OF PRIME MINISTER TO FRANCE

NEWS REPORT—QUESTION ANSWERED

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, yesterday during the question period Senator Molson asked whether there was any truth in a news report that nine other ministers went to Paris with the Prime Minister.

Senator Molson: On their own.

Senator Perrault: Yes, on their own. I have made inquiries, and I find that the news report in question was totally inaccurate. The Prime Minister was accompanied by one member of Parliament in the role of an assistant. There is no evidence to date of any other cabinet ministers in Paris, either on their own or officially attached to the mission.

Senator McIlraith: Perhaps they should have spelled "nine" with an "o" instead of with an "i".

Senator Perrault: That is a good point.

FEDERAL TRUST COMPANIES AND LOAN COMPANIES BILL

THIRD READING

Senator Langlois moved the third reading of Bill S-7, to authorize federal trust companies and loan companies to increase the monetary limit of their borrowing power and to issue subordinated notes.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY ADOPTED

The Senate resumed from yesterday consideration of His Excellency the Administrator's speech at the opening of the session, and the motion of Senator Neiman, seconded by Senator Côtteau, for an Address in reply thereto.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I could probably have abstained from taking part in this debate and in this way I would have saved you the trouble of listening to me, since the new Deputy Leader of the Opposition has worked well during my absence, but I shall come back to this later. Indeed, I could probably have chosen not to speak since I had this excuse and since this debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, at the start of this First Session of the 30th Parliament, can only remind me of the night of July 8 and of the election campaign that preceded it. However, these events are already vague in my mind so I shall not speak about them specifically. What good is it to dwell on memories? After all, the result is known and nothing can be done.

This result nevertheless explains the changes that took place in the other place and those that we have noted here, which are not those that I would have hoped to see.

However, there is always a silver lining to every cloud, and I am now thinking more particularly about the fact that you, Madam Speaker, have been appointed to the position of Speaker of the Senate. The French word "Orateur" is not commonly used here, even though it is the word used in the British North America Act. The custom is to use the word "Président" which is indeed more appropriate since your duties do not correspond exactly with those of the Speaker in the other place.

In Westminster, indeed, there is no Speaker or "Orateur" in the House of Lords. The person who presides is called Lord Chancellor. You do not have to address yourself to the Executive on behalf of the Senate, as does the Speaker of the House of Commons. Your duties consist in presiding over our debates, and in ensuring that decorum and order are maintained. This is not an easy task and to do it well a person needs to have great qualities—diplomacy, tact, patience. You have all those qualities, but you also have an additional one, a very personal one which will serve you well—your charm. It will be a great help to you in appeasing honourable senators from time to time. I know, since you have told me so privately, that you accepted this new responsibility with some apprehension. I can reassure you by telling you, in my own name and on behalf of the Official Opposition, that we shall cooperate with you fully and that we wish to make your task as easy as possible.

As for your role outside this House, which is to serve as an ambassador of the Senate, we are all convinced that you will fulfill it marvelously, following the example of your predecessor.

● (1430)

[English]

I should like, after congratulating our new Speaker, to say to our former Speaker that we are deeply indebted to her for the manner in which she discharged the duties of her office inside and outside this chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Flynn: She certainly presided over our debates with great efficiency, and she has helped by her many initiatives outside this chamber to improve the image of the Senate.

I now come to the new government leader, Senator Perrault, the English-speaking French Canadian from British Columbia.

[Translation]

Senator Perrault: I speak French a little also.

[English]

Senator Flynn: I describe him that way because I have been occasionally referred to as the French-speaking Irish Canadian.

His appointment is a spectacular jump out of back bench oblivion into front row prominence. It proves that the Prime Minister has finally found out who the hell the member from Burnaby-Seymour was in the Twenty-eighth Parliament.

Senator Perrault brings to his post unusual experience. He was Liberal Party leader in the British Columbia legislature for several years, and then spent four years in the House of Commons. Among his qualifications should be mentioned his powerful voice, which certainly will add weight to his arguments. On this side we all wish him well in his new position.

The departure of Senator Paul Martin will provoke some nostalgia here and in the other place, where he has served for 39 years, close to 25 of them as a member of cabinet. Senator Martin introduced into the Senate many innovations, all of which I am not totally in agreement with, but many of which have been very helpful. The Senate is indeed indebted to him. When he leaves to assume his new duties in London he may be assured of the very best wishes of everyone here, for we are convinced that he will continue to serve Canada effectively and with honour.

At the beginning of my remarks I mentioned that Senator Grosart had done a masterful job in opening fire on behalf of the Opposition in this debate. I am grateful to him for having agreed to act as my deputy. He has an excellent grasp of the problems that beset this country, and he is totally conversant with the methods and operation of this place. He therefore will be very helpful to us all in his new post.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I most sincerely thank Senator Choquette who has acted as deputy leader for 10 years. He had asked me to relieve him of that position and to give it to someone else, a position more unrewarding than honorary. I could not say enough how much I owe him, let alone pay him back. His help and his loyalty have never failed me. I thank him. But I get comfort in thinking that he is not very far from me and that now and then I will be able to rely on him as before.

Now, honourable senators, may I congratulate Senator Langlois who has finally been confirmed in his position as Deputy Leader of the Government. This appointment which the former leader never did make official has just been confirmed by Senator Perrault. Our congratulations and warmest wishes.

[English]

I next want to welcome Senators Barrow and Côtteau to the Senate of Canada, an institution everybody finds fault with until they are appointed to it.

[Translation]

May I say to Senator Côtteau, who made such an interesting speech to second the Address, that we have something in common: we both are members of minority groups for whom life has not always been easy. He is an Acadian and—I do not think I shall say French Canadian, no—I am referring to a smaller minority still, I am a Conservative from the province of Quebec.

[English]

To Senator Neiman go my congratulations on a very good speech. I'll bet the Liberal hierarchy is really frustrated. After all, what can you do to punish a Grit senator who criticizes a Liberal Throne Speech, when that senator already sits in the last row of the rump.

Honourable senators, the July 8 election settled only one of the problems facing us—the mandate of the Liberal government. That was confirmed. The other problems remain just as serious and possibly more so.

These are economically bad times for Canada. We are suffering from what is known as “stagflation.” Stagflation means stagnant economic growth accompanied by high inflation. A few more months of this and we could be into a recession, and it will not be because we shall have talked ourselves into it; it will be because the federal government will have failed to provide the leadership required to make sure we avoided it.

Our GNP shows no growth at all for the second quarter of this year. At one time it was predicted that the growth of our GNP for this year would be close to seven per cent. The Minister of Finance now goes around saying he expects it will be somewhere close to four per cent.

● (1440)

Our economic performance has not been this bad in years. The housing industry is coming to a virtual standstill; there has been a serious slowdown in consumer spending; and business investment has fallen off considerably.

Statistics Canada has revised its prediction with regard to the annual inflation rate for 1974. It had been predicting a rate of 12.8 per cent. It now predicts that the inflation rate may rise to 16 per cent.

But that is not all the bad news. The Conference Board in Canada informs us that the slowdown in real output growth will continue through 1975. They anticipate that the growth in real GNP will not be more than 1.2 per cent in 1975. It was 6.8 per cent in 1973, and 4.1 per cent in 1974.

Dr. Arthur Smith, president of the Conference Board in Canada, further informs us that unemployment will rise from 5.5 per cent to 7 per cent in 1975, as we head into our period of slowest economic growth in over a decade.

Real per capita income, or, if you prefer, the average standard of living will rise only 1.5 per cent in 1975, according to these experts on the Conference Board. This figure does not compare favourably with an increase in real per capita income of 5 per cent in 1974 and over 6 per cent in 1973. To top it all off, it is expected that government spending will continue to grow while corporate profits will fall drastically.

The question we must ask ourselves at this point is: Why are we in such an economic mess? What is the principal reason for such a poor showing? The government's reply is “inflation”. Suddenly, with the election over and Liberals firmly in command, inflation is once again the problem.

I hear some honourable senator clapping. Are you clapping because of inflation or because the Liberals are in command? In either case, I don't think you should.

Suddenly, the government is determined to “deal with its causes and to mitigate its effects,” according to the Speech from the Throne.

[Senator Flynn.]

Last March, when inflation was just as bad as it is now, the Prime Minister was saying that we had the resources necessary to cope with an annual inflation rate of 12.5 per cent. A few months later he was warning us not to become “obsessed with inflation.”

It's amazing how success at the polls can alter one's point of view. Now, inflation is again our “most serious problem,” I say “again” because in 1970, when the annual inflation rate was 4.6 per cent, the Prime Minister was warning:

Continued inflation will undermine our economy, dangerously alter the structure and stability of our society and impair the credibility of our political institutions. In the long run, it can constitute a threat to our future as a society and as a nation.

That's how bad it was in 1970 when the annual inflation rate was only 4.6 per cent. Since that time, the cost of living has gone up by 30 per cent, the cost of food by 44 per cent, the cost of housing by 29 per cent, and the cost of clothing by 21 per cent. We now have an annual inflation rate of 12.5 per cent, headed for 16 per cent.

We have had the continued inflation the Prime Minister was worried about in 1970. It has undermined our economy. There is no doubt about that. Our political institutions are on the verge of becoming incredible, the structure and stability of our society is seriously imperilled, and our future as a society and as a nation is really threatened.

Now, what are we going to do about it? According to the Throne Speech, we are going to launch an all-out war against inflation. Well if we are going to cure a disease, we had better know its causes.

When I read in the Throne Speech that “this world-wide problem had its origins in the largest increases in food, energy and other commodity prices in a generation, occurring at the same time as an upsurge in economic activity in all major industrialized nations,” I tend to worry. This government is about to treat an ailment, and it seems it can't distinguish symptoms from causes. Higher prices are not the cause of inflation; they are a result of inflation.

Surely the government's economic advisers know that inflation, very simply, is a dilution of the medium of exchange. Surely they know that inflation is an increase in the supply of money that outruns the increase in the supply of goods. It's very simple: we are creating too much money and we have been over-expanding credit.

Between 1969 and 1974, the GNP, in constant 1961 dollars, rose by 21 per cent. During the same period, the money supply grew by 66.7 per cent. That is more than three times the increase in the GNP. That's one of the causes of our current inflation problem.

Governor Bouey of the Bank of Canada, like Governor Razminsky before him, Raynauld of the Economic Council, Beigie of the C.D. Howe Research Institute, Smith of the Conference Board in Canada, and a host of others similarly qualified, are all agreed: You can't pretend to be fighting inflation seriously if, over a long period, you are allowing the growth in the money supply to outrun by far the growth in the supply of goods.

What we have to do is cut back on the money supply. We must cut back to the point where the growth in the money supply is roughly equivalent to the real growth in GNP.

But we must not attempt to remedy, in a matter of months, all the ills that took years to create. If we apply the brakes too quickly, we will do as much damage to the economy as we have already done by allowing, over the past few years, the growth in the money supply to outrun the real growth in the GNP.

Another question we must ask ourselves, if we hope ever to bring an end to these recurring attacks of severe inflation, is: Why does the federal government dilute the medium of exchange, when it must know that that causes inflation? The answer is really quite simple. The federal government causes inflation for basically the same reason governments all over the world cause inflation—it's afraid to say no to pressure groups. It gives in to all the demands made upon it and then proceeds to finance them not by means of direct taxation, as it should, but by an insidious indirect tax called inflation.

Honourable senators, if we are to avoid economic collapse, we must learn to live within our means. We are going to have to learn that we can't have what we can't afford.

The government informed us in the Throne Speech that it —will exercise restraint in its own expenditures with particular emphasis on improving effectiveness and efficiency in its existing operations while controlling expansion of new activities—

● (1450)

That sounds good, but what does it mean? Is the government going to cut back in its expenditures and make a determined effort at balancing the budget? Is that what it means? Or does it mean that they are going to increase government expenditures more slowly than in the past? One would hope they would cut back.

A study done by the old Prices and Incomes Commission concluded that the rise in government spending accounted for at least half of Canada's inflation through the late sixties and into the seventies. But we have good reason to be sceptical. The Economic Review of April 1974 states that the federal government's expenditures have increased from $12.23 billion in 1968 to a projected $29 billion for 1974. Since the first Trudeau government took over in 1968, the increase in government spending has been close to 150 per cent.

The Minister of Finance told us last year the government was going to restrain spending. Then he brought in a budget that set out spending of $24.4 billion, not only a record but a 22 per cent increase over the preceding one. Between April 1 and September 1 of this year, the government's budgetary expenditures totalled $9.2 billion. That is a great deal more than the $7.4 billion spent during the same period of the last fiscal year.

Then there is the matter of all those promises made by the Prime Minister during the last election campaign. Those could easily cost $4 billion or $5 billion. Can we seriously believe that he is sincere when he says he is going to "exercise restraint"? He has repeatedly promised in the past to cut down on spending, and to take steps to limit waste and extravagance. The Throne Speech promises are nothing new. He has also promised to slow down the rate of growth in the Public Service. But, in spite of those promises, the number of people working for the federal government continues to grow, like Topsy. Treasury Board alone has allowed its staff to double in five years.

So, we have excellent reason to be sceptical that, finally, the government will take the steps necessary to rekindle fiscal responsibility. It has failed us too often in the past to be deserving of any great trust.

But solve inflation we must. If we do not, we are headed for economic and social disaster. Look at what is happening. The cost of living keeps skyrocketing; people on fixed incomes cannot make ends meet; and interest rates are lower than the inflation rate. Consequently there is little incentive to save. People are being lured into extravagance and speculation, which further contribute to inflation. Inflation cannot be allowed to run unchecked any further. Unpalatable as the side effects may be, we must administer the required medicine. We cannot afford to wait any longer. Fighting inflation properly is not going to be easy. Some will suffer. But there will be much worse suffering if we do not fight it, and fight it vigorously. If we do not contain inflation now, we are headed towards a depression. Then, there'll be hell to pay!

I glean further from the Throne Speech that the government has concluded that increased supplies will lower prices. That is quite correct, but it is correct only if the money supply is not being tampered with—that is, if Government is not diluting the medium of exchange.

Now, how do we go about increasing production? Certainly, governments and their bureaucracies do not increase the production of goods—a more sterile lot you never encountered in this respect. It is industry that increases production, private entrepreneurs willing to take financial risks. These are the people responsible for producing the goods we use every day. How do these people increase production? They do it by expanding the business, enlarging the plant, buying bigger and better equipment, and hiring more people. But all that takes money. And where is that money to come from? The equity market? That has practically dried up. So, the money will have to come from profits. If there are to be enough profits to reinvest, then the government must be very careful not to allow corporate taxation rates to become oppressive. That would only serve to frustrate the government's purpose, which is to encourage expansion and increase production as mentioned in the Speech from the Throne.

Honourable senators, there is nothing new in the government's intended approach. There is nothing new to countering the effects of inflation by increasing production. These are the ways of classical free-enterprise economics. They are sound and will be effective, but only if they are accompanied by the necessary restraint in government spending, the production of money, and the expansion of credit.

Unfortunately, neither the assurances in the Throne Speech nor the past performance of this government give us reason to be very hopeful that the methods envisaged will be fully and effectively employed. So all we can do is sit back and wait. All we can do is hope that the government will succeed, that it will find the courage to do what is necessary.

[Translation]

An impressive number of other topics were dealt with in the Speech from the Throne and in the speech the Prime Minister made in the other place during the debate on the Address.

Most topics, including the patriation of the Constitution, do not, in the present context, have an urgency comparable to that of inflation. Most are not basically controversial but their practical achievement does create many problems.

So much the better if the government can solve its other problems! However, the government must not try to hide what is really pressing under that litany of objectives, doubtless desirable but, once again, not pressing at the present time, and which might divert the attention of the public from what remains the top priority.

Nevertheless, before resuming my seat, I want to say a few words on one of those topics. I am thinking of the Senate. The reform of the Senate has once again come to the surface recently as a result of what the Prime Minister has said and some of the statements made in the Senate by the Leader of the Government.

Senate reform can be envisaged over the long term, that is, within the framework of a revision of the Constitution, or over the short term; here, I am thinking mainly of the policy governing the appointment of senators.

With regard to the long term reform, the Prime Minister touched briefly upon the subject when he spoke of appointing senators for a seven-year term, subject to a second appointment, and of reducing their absolute veto to a suspensive veto. I have the impression that the remarks of the Prime Minister were meant more as a feeler to spur the debate. For my part, I still support in general the recommendations of the Joint Committee on the Constitution. Still I have the same reservations as Senator Forsey concerning the reduction of the power of this House to a suspensive veto.

As concerns an amendment to the Constitution, I believe that the suspensive veto could be dangerous and lead the way to radical changes, unwanted by the population, simply because of the accidental election of a majority of members of Parliament belonging to a radical party. The absolute veto of the Senate should probably remain in the Constitution.

To change the subject, I am more interested in the remarks of the Prime Minister and Senator Perrault concerning the adoption of a policy to reinforce the opposition in this house, and particularly the Official Opposition.

I believe it is in the interest of the Senate that there be better balance between the parties than at the present time; in other words, that the Senate become more representative of the differences in public opinion. It is especially essential that the Opposition in general be able to do its duty, that it be able to examine the legislation and the administration, and generally put a brake on an overly confident government.

On this subject, the remarks of Senator Perrault are clear and precise and show that he agrees completely that, in these circumstances, the Prime Minister should abandon the practice of appointing nearly exclusively government followers. On the other hand, the remarks of the Prime Minister are rather obscure and I will not try to determine his exact intentions. What is important for myself and for the Senate is to find a formula to increase the number of senators in the Opposition.

[Senator Flynn.]

I will certainly make every effort so that this formula may be found.

Honourable senators, I have one last word to say, that despite its weak numbers the Official Opposition intends to carry out to the best of its abilities the task that is facing it during the present session.

However, we should not be counted upon exclusively for lively discussions. A greater number on the government side should express themselves. The Senate is a deliberative assembly and debate is the essence of our operations. As Senator O'Leary said not so long ago: it is by sowing words that we shall reap ideas. It is by vigorous debate that we can best serve the Canadian population.

Senator Greene: Will the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Flynn: Certainly.

Senator Greene: I should like to ask the honourable senator whether he is speaking for his party or for himself, in his tiltings at the windmill, when he advocates a tight money policy and lower corporate taxes.

Senator Flynn: I would suggest that if the honourable senator reads my speech tomorrow, he may put his question in different terms.

Hon. Muriel McQueen Fergusson: Honourable senators, on this my first opportunity during this session to speak in this chamber I want to say how pleased I am, as I am sure we all are, to know that His Excellency the Governor General is recovering so well from the illness which caused such deep concern to his many friends.

I extend congratulations to Madame Léger on the magnificent manner in which she has been carrying on alone so many vice-regal duties and responsibilities during His Excellency's illness.

Although I was unable to attend the Senate sittings during the preceding two weeks, I have read with great interest the debates held in this chamber throughout that time.

Like those who have spoken before me, I offer my congratulations and very best wishes to Senator Lapointe on her appointment as Speaker. She is an able, courageous and delightful person. I know she will fill the position admirably, and will bring much credit to herself and the Senate. I know also that she will receive the same heart-warming friendliness and co-operation that was extended to me by all my colleagues, and by the officials and other employees of the Senate during my term of office. I trust she will enjoy her term as Speaker during this Thirtieth Parliament as much as I did mine during the preceding Parliament.

I should like to take this opportunity to say that I am deeply touched and very grateful for the kind references made to me by many of the participants in this debate. I thank them very much.

I congratulate the new Leader of the Government in the Senate, Senator Ray Perrault. To this responsible position he brings youth, enthusiasm and new ideas, and I wish him well. I have been a member of this chamber for a long time. I recall that a former distinguished senator from his own province, the late Senator Tom Reid, often said in this chamber that the Leader of the Government in the Senate should really be designated as the Leader of the Senate in the Government, because he is the only official representative of the Senate in the government, the only voice of the Senate in the cabinet. Our new leader will, I am sure, bear in mind that it is his responsibility to convey to the government the opinions and wishes of honourable senators, as well as to convey to senators the wishes, and sometimes barely-veiled demands, of the government.

We owe much to the former Leader of the Government, Senator Paul Martin, who is leaving us to represent Canada at one of our most prestigious missions abroad—the United Kingdom. Senator Martin has made a tremendous contribution to Canada. He was elected to the House of Commons many times. He has held several cabinet portfolios, as we all know, and since 1968 we have been fortunate in having him as Leader of the Government in the Senate.

My own association with him goes back to the 1940s, when I was appointed by the Civil Service Commission—not without difficulty, due to my sex, I may say—to be Director of Family Allowances for New Brunswick. That position came under the Department of National Health and Welfare, of which Senator Martin was minister at that time—and a very excellent minister he was.

Since that time, Senator Martin has been a loyal and helpful friend, and many of my most interesting experiences during the years since then I owe to his interest and support, for which I am truly grateful.

Like other senators, I am glad to see that Senator Langlois is carrying on efficiently, as usual, his duties as Deputy Leader of the Government.

Senator Buckwold, with all his responsibilities associated with his home province, is glad, I am sure, to be relieved of his duties as Acting Whip. I wish Senator Petten success in discharging his new tasks as Government Whip.

It is pleasant to see in his accustomed place as Leader of the Opposition my old friend and associate of Wartime Prices and Trade Board days, Senator Flynn. In those days we were the enforcement counsel, each in our own province, for that board, and the problems, experiences and associations we shared in those strenuous and trying days are not easily forgotten.

I look forward to observing with the greatest interest the skillful and knowledgeable support that Senator Flynn will receive from his new and able deputy leader, Senator Grosart.

Although Senator Choquette has decided to relinquish the responsibilities of deputy leader, his deep interest in Canada and in the work of the Senate will undoubtedly prompt him to continue making vehement, witty and timely interjections, as he has done in the past.

● (1510)

Everyone in this house, where he is so very highly regarded, wishes Senator John Macdonald well in continuing his very adroit handling of the problems of Opposition Whip.

It would be impossible for me in this chamber to express adequately my delight on listening to the very able and well-informed speech of Senator Neiman, the mover of the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I congratulate her, and also Senator Côtteau, whose speech in seconding the motion was fine indeed. We shall look forward to hearing more from him.

I congratulate all the other speakers who have preceded me, and I extend a warm welcome to the new senators from Nova Scotia, Senator Barrow and Senator Côtteau.

Honourable senators, many people, especially among the younger generation, consider remarks such as those I have just made to be unnecessary and out of date. I have been a member of the Senate for many years, and as I do not expect to participate in any future Throne Speech debates I trust you will not be too critical of me for carrying on the old custom of expressing thanks and appreciation to those senators who have served the Senate well during the preceding Parliament, and in expressing good wishes to those who will have special responsibility during the Thirtieth Parliament.

There are two matters about which I should like to speak briefly today, the first of which concerns Canada's senior citizens. In case the more recent appointees to the Senate are not aware of my special interest in this field, may I remind you that in 1952 I was responsible for setting up in my own province, New Brunswick, the Old Age Security Administration. I was director for old age security and family allowances, and I administered that until I was appointed to the Senate. This gave me a very close contact with those who benefited from old age security, and I became deeply conscious of the importance of this financial help psychologically, and not only because it gave them buying power, small as the amount then may seem to us in these days.

Shortly after my appointment to the Senate, when I was only 53 years old and not yet among those now classified as senior citizens, as I am now, I was visited by Dr. Richard E. G. Davis, who was then the executive director of the Canadian Welfare Council, now the Canadian Council on Social Development, of which Mrs. Agnes Benidickson, the wife of our colleague Senator Benidickson, is now the distinguished and able president. Dr. Davis, whom some of you will recall as the invaluable consultant to the Special Committee of the Senate on Aging, had recently returned from the Scandinavian countries, where he had been greatly impressed by the way they were responding to the needs of their senior citizens.

The Canadian Welfare Council, following Dr. Davis' report of his findings in Scandinavia, proposed to set up a Committee on Aging, and invited me to act as chairman, which I did for some time. In fact, I did so until I was ill in 1961, when Miss Hope Homestead succeeded me as chairman. However, I have always continued my interest in this field.

I think it is fair to say that the Canadian Welfare Council Committee on Aging, together with the Special Committee of the Senate on Aging chaired by Senator Croll—concerning which Senator Croll gave an interesting report in this chamber on October 22, last, including a detailed analysis of results, attached to the Senate Hansard of that same date, and which I hope you will all read—did much to make Canadians in our youth-oriented society conscious that there is a large number of older people in this country, and that their needs also deserve consideration. During the 1960s this interest resulted in a number of provincial conferences on aging, and a national conference in Toronto. This interest continues, but it needs to be co-ordinated.

I am deeply interested in a suggestion made by our elder and much respected statesman, the Right Honourable J.G. Diefenbaker, when he attended the Canadian National Exhibition in Toronto on a day called "Salute to Senior Citizens Day" on August 30, 1974. Mr. Diefenbaker is quoted in the Toronto Star as saying that "the creation of a future department of geriatrics would help senior citizens recognize their potential". He is also quoted as saying that men and women over 65 are a natural resource that we squander.

One of the recommendations of the Special Committee of the Senate on Aging was that the federal government establish a national commission on aging. This was the last recommendation, and if you read the analysis of the report you will see that it has not been implemented. Definitely there should be some central place where the problems and concerns of our ever-increasing population of older citizens can receive attention. The Department of National Health and Welfare has a consultant on aging, Miss Lola Wilson, who is a dedicated and knowledgeable person in the field of aging.

During visits to other countries I studied many programs, such as meals-on-wheels, wheels-on-wheels, home-maker services and other such things. Some of these are being carried on in Canada, but does the government give to them the kind of support that is given in other countries? Is the government giving sufficient attention to the contribution to Canadian life that can be made by people who have reached the age of 65 and been forced to retire? There are some who, due to their physical or mental health, should retire at 65, but that is no magic figure. There are some who, due to ill health or other reasons, should retire long before that age.

Senator Buckwold: I see that Senator Flynn got the message.

Senator Fergusson: I assure my friend Senator Flynn that that was not meant for him.

Senator Grosart: We were wondering whom you were looking at.

Senator Fergusson: If people have gained skills, wisdom and experience, is it not wasteful to set an arbitrary age at which they must retire? Is our country not the poorer if we do not take advantage of that accumulated wisdom, skill and experience? Honourable senators will remember that Leonardo da Vinci painted The Last Supper when he was 80 years old. Sarah Bernhardt was the greatest actress of her time when she was 79. Grandma Moses was still painting on her one hundredth birthday, and did not start to paint until she was 58. Toscanini did some of his most brilliant conducting after he was 80. Darwin, Carlyle, Longfellow, Gladstone, Churchill, Charles de Gaulle—

● (1520)

Senator Perrault: Konrad Adenauer.

Senator Fergusson: Yes, and Mao Tse-tung, for whom I have had great respect and admiration since I visited China in 1972—these and many others did their very best work in their later years.

Senator Walker: And Senator Perrault, our new leader.

Senator Flynn: But he is very young. He is a spring chicken.

Senator Buckwold: He is aging fast.

Senator Flynn: That may be so.

Senator Fergusson: Our own Senator Roebuck was most active until the time he was stricken, when he was past the age of 90. Sometimes I wonder how wise we were to pass legislation in 1965 requiring new appointees to the Senate to retire at the age of 75. Certainly mankind would have been deprived of a magnificent wealth of experience had the persons I have mentioned been forced to retire at the age of 65 or even 75.

You all must know that many doctors, scientists and businessmen who have retired in Canada at the age of 65 have gone to underdeveloped countries where they have been warmly welcomed and given the opportunity to make use of, and impart to others, their skills, wisdom and experience which Canada has discarded due to stupid adherence to a rule which requires people to retire at a chronological age and which takes no account of the contribution the person involved is able to make.

For these reasons I think there is no question that we should have either a whole department or a directorate of a department of the government which would give its time to research and study and to providing help so that we can make use of the abilities of such people.

Honourable senators, I wish now to deal with the subject of the status of women, a matter I have been interested in for quite some time. Indeed, on March 7, 1972 I spoke enthusiastically in this chamber about what had been done up to that time to implement the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. I had been led to believe that we would hear about this subject in the Throne Speech of this session. For that reason especially I listened most attentively to the Speech, but it was only towards the end of the Speech that any reference was made to legislation respecting the status of women. I certainly hope that is not an indication of the priority the subject of the status of women will receive in the government's program of legislation. As Senator Neiman said, when moving the motion for an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, many Canadian women will be less than ecstatic at this expression of the government's intention. She pointed out that Canadian women know, as we all do, that in the four and one-half years since the royal commission report was tabled only one-third of the recommendations in the federal field have been implemented, and they are not the recommendations considered by women to be the most basic or those requiring priority.

The so-called omnibus bill has not yet reached this chamber, but when it does I shall certainly have some comments to make on it. I understand from press and other reports that the new omnibus bill is practically identical to the omnibus bill which was introduced in the last Parliament. If that is so, I am certainly correct when I say that this bill will fall far short of dealing with the discriminations and grievances which women resent most and which they are hoping to see eliminated. It seems to give only a perfunctory bow to women's demands in that it focuses attention on matters which are peripheral to the causes espoused by women's rights groups.

For instance, how important is, and how many women will be affected by, the admission of girls into the cadet corps? It is certainly commendable and appreciated, but it is peripheral. Perhaps, though, the enactment of anti-discrimination legislation in areas of minor importance such as this will have a cumulative effect, and will build up a climate of tolerance so that eventually legislation can be enacted to deal with matters which women consider the central and important issues.

Recommendation 166 of the royal commission urged the establishment of a federal status of women council which would advise the government on matters pertaining to the status of women, and on May 31, 1973 the Advisory Council on the Status of Women was set up. However, instead of reporting to the government as was recommended, and as is done by some commissions, this council reports to a minister—at present the Honourable Marc Lalonde. This advisory council has established certain priorities which it lists in its annual report for 1973-74, copies of which we have all received. I should now like to refer to some of those priorities, the first of which is the "establishment of a federal human rights commission."

Many grievances have centered around the difficulty of enforcing current women's rights legislation. Such legislation is of little use if there is no way to enforce it. It is useless to pay lip service to a policy of equal opportunity for women unless there is some effective way to ensure that such a policy is initiated. We have enacted human rights legislation, but the means of enforcing it are meagre. Women feel that the promised human rights commission should be established without delay. I understand that the Minister of Justice has stated there will be a strong representation of women on the commission, but I have been asked by many women just what is meant by "a strong representation." Will it be half, considering the fact that women make up half of the population?

Senator Flynn: The better half, too!

Senator Fergusson: Well, I am glad you feel that way. Will the chairman be a woman? Is there any chance of that?

I am not going to discuss all of the priorities listed here, but I should like to refer to them briefly. Another priority is an "amendment to the Canada Labour Code to ensure equal access to job opportunities." I hope we shall have such legislation.

Another priority is "amendments to the federal Superannuation Act to ensure equal pension and fringe benefit rights without discrimination on the grounds of sex." I certainly hope those amendments will soon come about.

Also listed as priorities are "equality for women and inclusion of homemakers, in the Canada Pension Plan;" "Divorce Act amendment to reduce the waiting period from three years to one;" and "ensuring, on the dissolution of marriage, that there is an equitable distribution to both spouses of property acquired during the marriage."

Honourable senators, discrimination against women in our laws has been brought to public attention through recent divorce cases—and I think particularly of the cases of Irene Murdock and Helen Rathwell—in which women who had made tremendous contributions to building up family property in accordance with existing laws received scandalous treatment. Our laws should be changed in this regard. These particular cases have aroused the anger of women throughout the country.

● (1530)

I remember when I was a member of the Joint Committee on Divorce and we were studying these matters, I pointed out that such situations could occur, but the majority of the members of the committee felt that there was nothing we could do about it. I certainly think something must be done now. Surely some way can be found to do away with this injustice.

Another priority is more equitable employment of women by the federal government. On this I propose to read from an article in the Globe and Mail of October 18, 1974. The article, in part, reads as follows:

A booklet published by the Office of Equal Opportunities for Women complained that, in 1971, "more than 65 per cent of the female public servants worked in the administrative support category in office support positions."

The most recent report of the Public Service Commission shows that the number of women in such positions has increased to 68.7 per cent. About 11.8 per cent of men are also in these positions. In the highest of the seven public service categories, that of executive, women make up about 1 per cent. In the entire public service, women make up 30 per cent.

From the same article I quote a statement made by one of the people working in this field:

Despite the fact that quite a bit of machinery has been established and that a considerable amount of work has been done to improve the situation, the statistics don't show any improvement, and this is very depressing. Maybe it's just a normal lag. I just don't know.

Another priority listed refers to the proportionate appointment to and employment by federal boards, commissions and crown corporations. We know there has been some improvement in this area, but just the other day there came to my desk a report of the Metric Commission, which was established in 1971, dealing with matters that affect every woman in Canada. I noticed, on looking through the report, that there were 18 members of the board, one of whom was a woman.

I do not think I will refer to the other points because you can read them for yourselves, but I would like to refer to the last one. This is one that was suggested at the second meeting of the Advisory Council, and it is to remove abortion from the Criminal Code. Senator Norrie has already spoken strongly on abortion in this debate, and I support all that she said. You may be interested to know, if you do not remember, that in speaking about abortion, on the Criminal Law amendment bill, on June 10, 1969, as reported in Senate Hansard of the 1969-70 session, page 1544, I said:

In fact, I think it would be better if the whole matter were deleted from among the offences in the Criminal Code and the decision left to the woman and her doctor.

I still feel the same way.

Honourable senators, I do not want to labour this matter, and I have been talking for quite a long time, but I ask for your sympathy; I do not want to antagonize you. I have been warned that I should never tell a story in the Senate, but I have one that I tell very often when making speeches to groups, and I hope that you will bear with me. The reason I like to make a short speech is because I heard that Mark Twain was asked at one time, "Which is better, if you want to put over something—a long speech, or a short one?" Mark Twain replied that the only way he could explain this was by relating what happened to him on one occasion. It appears that he had gone to church, where a missionary from darkest Africa was telling about the great needs of his mission. Mark Twain was greatly moved and said to himself, "I'll give him $100." The man kept talking for half an hour, and Mark Twain then said to himself, "Well, maybe $50 will do." The missionary talked for another half hour and Mark Twain said, "Well, I guess I can't spare more than $10." At the end of the hour, the speaker stopped. Mark Twain said, "When the plate was passed I stole $2." Sometimes I have felt inclined, when listening to long speeches, to steal a little off the plate, but I do not want to reduce you to that.

There is one thing in this connection I would like to mention, because it has received a great deal of publicity in the press. I refer to the $5 million that will be spent in 1975, the year designated by the United Nations as International Women's Year, for seminars, conferences and national publicity.

We had a very good conference in Canada in September. It was held in Ottawa at the request of the United Nations. Canada was the host, although the United Nations took charge of all the necessary arrangements. I think a great deal of good work was done, and this really opened international Women's Year. But there is some question in women's minds as to whether we should have so many seminars, because they really are preaching to the converted. A report in the Ottawa Journal of October 22 states that 76 woman delegates from all over Canada, who attended a conference on plans for the International Women's Year, questioned the expenditure of such a large amount of money on conferences, seminars and national publicity. According to the article, they sent a telegram to the minister to whom the Advisory Council on the Status of Women reports, the Honourable Marc Lalonde, saying that they would prefer that priority be given to significant legislation and changes in existing legislation.

To me, honourable senators, the assigning of such a large sum of money to this kind of purpose seems like the old-fashioned attitude of a husband who loves his wife, and who has been urged by her to permit her to play a more serious part in the solving of family problems, financial or otherwise, which he does not think she is wise enough to do, and who, to placate her, decides he will give her a mink coat. It seems to me that this is much the same sort of thinking.

I have spoken principally about two matters this afternoon. With regard to aging, in Canada we have done a considerable amount to alleviate the need of older people for money, but we have not really given much thought to other things that might be done to make life good for them. The advancement of the status of women is a cause that I have supported over a great many years. I found at first that neither of these subjects was very popular, and did not get very much public support. Over the years, however, aging has become more acceptable, largely through the hearings and the report of the Special Senate Committee on Aging, and the work of the committee on aging of the Canadian Welfare Council, now known as the Canadian Council on Social Development. More respect, also, is now paid to the status of women as a result of the hearings and the recommendations of the royal commission on the status of Canadian women.

The point I wish to make this afternoon is that we have given money to older people, but we have not given thought to the question of setting up a department to co-ordinate the work that might be done for them. Similarly, while we have done things in the area of the status of women, have we done the most important things? The fundamental question is: Are we going to do the most important things? Those things that we have done up to now in Canada are not the complete answer to either of these problems, both of which are very important in this country.

Motion agreed to, and the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne adopted.

On motion of Senator Perrault, ordered that the Address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Administrator of the Government of Canada by the Honourable the Speaker.

AGING

THE ANATOMY OF A SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE REPORT— ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Croll calling the attention of the Senate to the anatomy of a special Senate Committee report, and in particular to

- (a) its evaluation,
- (b) its beneficial results, and
- (c) as a follow-up, to a suggested future course of action for the Senate.—(Honourable Senator Carter).

Senator Carter: If no other senator wishes to speak to this order in the meantime, may I ask that it stand until Tuesday, November 5?

The Hon. The Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the Estimates and Supplementary Estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1975.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter moved that the report be adopted now.

He said: Honourable senators, in moving the adoption of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, I feel it might be helpful to honourable senators, as well as to readers of Hansard, if I supplement the report with a brief analysis of the committee's findings with particular respect to budgetary estimates generally and a review of the estimates over the past ten years, the public debt, and the relationship of each to the gross national product in percentage terms.

The President of the Treasury Board, the Honourable Jean Chrétien, with his officials, Mr. G. F. Osbaldeston, the Secretary of the Treasury Board, and Mr. B. A. MacDonald, Assistant Secretary, Program Branch, Treasury Board, appeared before the committee. In my opinion, we had a very interesting and fruitful session. All questions were answered frankly and in a straightforward manner and, I believe, to the satisfaction of all members present.

As the report indicates, the committee considered both the main estimates and supplementary estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1975. The total of the proposed expenditures for the current fiscal year amounted to $23,296 million. This amount can be broken down into statutory items amounting to $11,544 million; items to be voted amounting to $10,478 million; and $1,274 million of non-budgetary items for loans, investments, advances and activities of that kind. The expenditures that can be classified as purely budgetary items total $22,022 million.

The initial estimates for the year ending March 31, 1974 totalled $18,393 million, and supplementary estimates brought that to $20,080 million. To that must be added $909 million for non-budgetary items, making a grand total of $20,989 million. That is approximately $21 billion, as compared with $23.3 billion for the current fiscal year, 1974-75. If we omit non-budgetary items we have expenditures of $22,022 million for the year ending March 31, 1975, as compared with $20,080 million for the year before. The bulk of the increase of $1,942 million was accounted for by an increase in expenditures in five government departments and two agencies. They are set out in item 4 of the report, and are as follows:

Canadian International Development Agency	$ 50 million
National Health and Welfare	1,286 million
Post Office	109 million
National Defence	145 million
Canadian Broadcasting Corporation	60 million
Environment	51 million
Agriculture	55 million

The total of that is $1,756 million. The balance is made up by other government departments.

Looking back over the past ten years, the committee was informed that federal expenditures had grown from $8 billion in 1965-66 to approximately $23 billion in 1974-75. However, during that same period the gross national product has grown phenomenally from $55 billion in 1965-66 to $119 billion in 1973-74. For that reason the federal government expenditures, when expressed as a percentage of the gross national product, have remained relatively stable. For example, in 1965-66 federal government expenditures were 14.5 per cent of the GNP, as compared with 15.2 per cent in 1969-70, and 17.2 per cent in 1973-74. In the current fiscal year they amount to about 16 per cent.

● (1550)

I should point out that these percentages include transfer payments to the provinces, which have increased considerably over the years. For example, in 1965-66 the total was $466 million, which increased to $932 million in 1969-70, and to $1,874 million in 1973-74. So that these transfer payments doubled from 1965-66 to 1969-70, and doubled again from that year until 1973-74. For the current fiscal year the figure is approximately the same, $1,839 million. In percentages that means they increased from 6 per cent of the GNP in 1965-66, to 7.9 per cent in 1969-70, and to 8.4 per cent in 1974-75. These transfer payments are actually paid by the provincial governments and not by the federal government. To get the true picture, the transfer payments should be deducted from the federal totals, and when this is done it can be seen that as a percentage of gross national product federal spending has declined quite considerably, while provincial and municipal spending has increased tremendously.

The committee was informed that the total percentage of GNP spent by all levels of government amounted to 39 per cent. That 39 per cent is broken down between the three levels: 16 per cent for federal government, 10 per cent for provincial governments, and the balance, 13 per cent, for municipal governments. It is plain, therefore, that the federal government now accounts for considerably less than half the total of spending by government.

Honourable senators might be interested to note some striking increases in one or two other areas. The most striking increases have occurred in health and welfare, economic development and support, and transportation and communications. For example, the budget for health and welfare in 1965-66 was $1,786 million, and in the current fiscal year, 1974-75, that has increased to $6,855 million—it has increased from $1.7 billion to $6.8 billion. I should point out, however, that this latest figure includes the increased family allowances. These now amount to $20 per child and are taxable, which means that of the amount paid out in family allowances $350 million will be recovered by the Treasury.

Economic development and support has grown from $975 million in 1965-66 to $2,870 million in 1973-74, and is down a little in the current fiscal year to $2,672 million. In other words, it has gone from 12.6 per cent of the total expenditures in 1965-66 to 14.3 per cent in 1973-74, and back to 12.1 per cent in the current fiscal year. Transportation and communications increased from $839 million in 1965-66 to $1,556 million in 1973-74, and $1,637 million in 1974-75. This has declined from 10.8 per cent of the total expenditures in 1965-66 to 7.4 per cent in 1974-75.

The yearly additions to the gross public debt have increased from $1,111 million in 1965-66 to $2,592 million in 1973-74 and $2,925 million in 1974-75. In percentage terms that becomes 14.4 per cent for 1965-66, 12.9 per cent for 1973-74 and 13.3 per cent for 1974-75.

Senator Grosart: May I interrupt the honourable senator? Would he mind repeating the figures he has just given for public debt?

Senator Carter: The public debt increases were $1,111 million in 1965-66, $2,592 million in 1973-74 and $2,925 million in 1974-75.

Senator Grosart: May I interrupt the honourable senator again? I may be confused, but my understanding is that the table that was put before us by the Treasury Board officials shows, for example, that the public debt in 1973-74 in gross terms was $55,557 million. In other words, it was $55 billion. The whole series of figures is quite different from that which he has just given us. If I am right, perhaps the honourable senator will wish to correct himself.

Senator Carter: That is true. We were given two tables. The one from which I was quoting is entitled "Federal Government Budgetary Expenditures by Function and the Percentage Share for Each Function." We were also given another table, which stated that in 1964-65 the gross total debt was $26,564 million, and that had grown in 1973-74 to $55,557 million. However, the table also listed "recorded assets," which were deducted from the total gross debt, giving a net public debt of $15,505 million in 1964-65, which increased to $18,128 million in 1973-74. I rather think that the figures we are talking about relate somewhere in between those two figures—namely, the gross and the net public debt.

● (1600)

Senator Grosart: May I again interrupt the honourable senator? I was not criticizing his figures. I think it is clear that in one case he was giving us the annual figures, and in the other the totals.

Senator Carter: That is correct. I am sorry I did not make it clear. Senator Grosart will remember that we questioned the President of the Treasury Board and his officials as to what was meant by "recorded assets". The reply was that they included cash securities; departmental working capital advances; foreign exchange reserves; social security accounts; loans, advances, investments—domestic; loans, advances, investments—external; securities held in trust; deferred charges; et cetera.

Further questioning revealed that some of those assets might not be readily recoverable—for example, loans to the CMHC. In view of that, the figures of the net public debt are probably not too meaningful.

Senator Langlois: They are fiscal assets.

Senator Carter: There are some fiscal assets, but some of the loans, advances and investments might not be recoverable.

Senator Benidickson: Loans to the CBC, for example.

Senator Carter: In considering the supplementary estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1975, the committee noted that all the items cover special warrants issued during the period that Parliament was dissolved, except for two items which are mentioned in item 6 of the report—namely, $330 million for the Energy Supplies Allocation Board of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, and $79 million for the Grains and Oilseeds Program of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. There will be bills introduced relating to those two items.

The committee was given to understand that during the fiscal year there will be added to supplementary estimates (A) supplementary estimates (B) and (C), and it is anticipated that supplementary estimates (B) will be tabled in approximately the latter part of November.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I congratulate Senator Carter on an exhaustive explanation of the report of the committee. We are all aware that one of the purposes of the committee's reporting at this time, and in asking that its report be adopted, is to prepare the way for the consideration of the appropriation bill or bills that will come to us subsequently. I understand that an appropriation bill or bills will come to us on Tuesday next and that we shall deal with them then.

Senator Langlois: Only one bill.

Senator Grosart: Senator Langlois informs me that there will be only one bill, which will be rather extraordinary. I cannot remember when we have had the main estimates and supplementary estimates included in one bill only, although I do not object to that. The normal procedure is, of course, for each book of estimates to be dealt with separately, but in this case, for convenience, perhaps it is the better way, despite the fact that the bill will embrace two groups of expenditure items a long way apart in time.

As we are all aware, the situation at the present time is that the main estimates—what we call the Blue Book—was introduced in Parliament early in the year.

Senator Langlois: In February.

Senator Grosart: Yes, in February. As is customary under the new rules of the House of Commons, the estimates were sent to the standing committees. Some of them have reported back, but not all.

We have passed an interim supply bill, which took care of the first four months of the fiscal year. The next four months of the fiscal year were dealt with by way of Governor General's special warrant, because of the intervention of the election. We are now asked to pass the total main estimates for the year as well as supplementary estimates (A).

It is my understanding that supplementary estimates (B) will be coming to us next month. So at the moment we are not in a position to say what the total expenditures that the government anticipates are for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1975. We do know that the figure will be gigantic.

Senator Carter, quoting from the report of the committee, indicated that the present figure is somewhere—taking both the main estimates and the supplementaries—in the neighbourhood of $24 billion. It will be higher, of course, and the question has been raised as to the significance of this as a percentage of the gross national product.

I should like to deal with that when we receive the appropriation bill. It is an important subject in view of the many recommendations of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, adopted by the Senate, urging the government to establish a principle that in no year, particularly an inflationary year, unless there are very special circumstances, will the percentage increase in government expenditures be higher than the percentage increase in the GNP—which sounds like a very valid principle. I may have more to say about that and the Senate's attitude toward the kind of escalated payments we have in the figures now before us.

Senator Carter commented on the matter of the public debt. I raised a question merely to clarify the figures he gave us, because I am somewhat concerned about this fictional figure which we get from time to time, which is given to us, not in the book itself but certainly in the public accounts and in supplementary papers, as Canada's recorded assets.

This is utterly fictional. To say that Canada's recorded assets—taking the figure that Senator Carter gave us—are lower than our current liabilities, our debt, means that Canada is broke. Not even the most rabid critic from any side of any house in Canada would suggest at the moment that Canada is broke, as yet. Of course, these figures do not take into account the real assets of Canada. For example, all the buildings on Parliament Hill are shown as being worth $1, which is an indication of the thoroughly fictional nature of these assets.

So honourable senators need not be greatly concerned about these figures showing that our net assets at the moment are less than our net debt. I am sure that those who have personal accounts, or an interest in corporate accounts, would be very concerned if that were the situation confronting us. I shall have further comments to make when the appropriate bill comes before us.

Having been a member of the committee, having heard the questions asked and the answers given, I am prepared to say that the report we have had is a justifiable indication of what went on in the committee.

Finally, I will say that we were very pleased that the main witness appearing before the committee was the President of the Treasury Board, the Honourable Jean Chrétien. He made a very distinguished appearance and, though he is a very new President of the Treasury Board, he greatly impressed the committee with his broad knowledge of the Blue Book and all its implications.

Report adopted.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, October 29, at 2 p.m.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1974

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-31, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March 1975.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a second time?

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, now.

Honourable senators, I have given instructions to have two tables placed on the desks of honourable senators to assist them in a better comprehension of this complicated bill. The first table is entitled, "Estimates, 1974-75, including Budgetary and Non-Budgetary (Loans, Investments and Advances) Expenditures but excluding Old Age Security Payments". There follows the breakdown of the main estimates. The second table is entitled, "Appropriation Act No. 3, 1974." In that table will be found a summary of the bill, giving numerous figures, which will, I hope, assist honourable senators in following what I have to say.

The bill before us covers both the balance of main estimates for 1974-75 and the supplementary estimates which were tabled recently in this house. On March 28 last, approval was given to the first interim supply bill for the fiscal year 1974-75. That bill, entitled Appropriation Act No. 2, 1974, was based on the 1974-75 main estimates and provided for the expenditure for the months of April, May and June, in the amount of $3,138,241,654.50. These estimates were originally tabled in this house on March 5, 1974, and referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on March 19. Following the convening of the new Parliament, the main estimates were retabled in this house on October 8 and again referred to the National Finance Committee on October 15. These estimates were discussed in committee with the President of the Treasury Board and his officials on October 17.

The new supplementary estimates (A), which were tabled in the Senate and referred to the National Finance Committee at the same time as the main estimates, were also discussed in committee on October 17.

The supplementary estimates total $904,968,334, consisting of $889,780,834 in budgetary items and $15,187,500 in non-budgetary items. The total estimates tabled to date for 1974-75 amount to $24,202,369,371, consisting of budgetary expenditures in the amount of $22,912,684,671 and non-budgetary expenditures in the amount of $1,289,711,700. This bill provides not only for the full supply of the balance of the 1974-75 main estimates but also full supply for the whole of supplementary estimates (A).

Honourable senators will no doubt remember that the first interim supply bill approved by Parliament for the fiscal year 1974-75 only provided for expenditures up to June 30 last. For the subsequent four months, from July through October, the government has obtained funds it needed to operate through the issue of special warrants, as authorized by the Financial Administration Act. The funds made available under the warrants issued are expected to be sufficient to meet financial requirements to the end of October, by which time it is hoped that Parliament will have approved full supply for this fiscal year. While most of the items which were covered by special warrants were originally included in the main estimates, some eleven of those required additional funds. These needs were not foreseen at the time of the preparation of the main estimates, in the fall of 1973, and they have therefore been included in the supplementary estimates (A).

I have a list of those eleven estimates and would like to give them in the following order: vote 25a, Agriculture, in the amount of $6,780,500; votes 15a, L16a and 30a, Environment, in the total amount of $8,097,000. Under Finance there is vote 25a, Insurance, in the amount of $133,584; under Indian Affairs and Northern Development, votes L15a and L26a totalling $9,687,500. Under Labour, Information Canada, vote 10a, in the amount of $400,000; under Privy Council, Chief Electoral Officer, vote 10a, $469,750; under Secretary of State, vote 10a, $100,000. The total of these eleven votes is $495,668,334.

● (1410)

In addition, there are two items included in these estimates which were not covered by special warrants. The first, known as the Two-price Wheat Program, covers the costs incurred since September 1973, in maintaining the subsidies designed to reduce consumer prices for bread and other wheat products. The second, which is shown under the Energy Supplies Allocation Board, provides for the cost of subsidizing the price of petroleum products for November and December.

Senator Grosart: Would the honourable senator give us the designation of those two votes?

Senator Langlois: Energy, Mines and Resources, vote 11a, $470,000; Industry, Trade and Commerce, vote 41a, $79,300,000.

The form of the present bill is the same as those passed in previous years, except that this bill includes those amounts which were authorized by special warrants, as I have already explained, issued by the Governor General during the months when Parliament was not in session. It does not include any additional borrowing authority, nor does it include any $1 items, which should please those honourable senators who have voiced opposition to those items in past years. I assume this will be considered as a welcome departure.

Honourable senators, I think I have covered the most important features of the bill, and if you wish any further explanations I shall endeavour to supply them to the best of my limited ability.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I take it that the sponsor of the bill is prepared to give us the usual assurance, that the passage of this bill will not prevent us from examining any of the items contained in the estimates? I think it is usual to have that assurance.

Senator Benidickson: How would that be possible if we pass all the items in the main estimates now?

Senator Grosart: The fact is, we have not yet passed them, and the right to examine, as I understand it, is not denied simply because we pass the estimates.

Senator Benidickson: We have always left one-twelfth or something of that kind, and we have not done so here.

Senator Grosart: Still, the assurance would be welcome.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned until later this day.

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, October 23, the debate on the motion of Senator Laird for the second reading of Bill S-12, to amend the Immigration Act.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, when our colleague, Senator Laird, moved the second reading of the bill, he said that in his opinion it was a simple bill which, upon reading, could be easily understood. Of course he did not elaborate upon its internal complexities which were later proved important by questions of my honourable colleagues.

I obviously have my own reservations as to a precipitated passing of the bill since in my opinion we were given no proof that it is urgent the bill be passed. Moreover my reservations bear on the fact that legislators will have too much discretion on the method of prosecution to be used against the persons convicted under the legislation.

● (1420)

If we look at the bill, it provides that every person guilty of an offence is liable—

(c) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for two years, or

(d) on summary conviction, to a fine of not more than five hundred dollars or to imprisonment for six months or to both.

The following question arises in the minds of those who know something about law: Who will determine the method of prosecution? Nothing in the bill indicates that someone who will have committed an offence, has a police record or is a member of organized crime, should be prosecuted by way of indictment, because, as those who are knowledgeable in legal matters know very well, proceedings by way of indictment lead to much stricter punishment than prosecution by way of summary conviction. Naturally, we should get from the sponsor of the bill some explanations on that aspect.

Who will be prosecuted by way of indictment? Is it those individuals who have police records, members of organized crime or would-be political refugees? We are presently faced with the case of the Haitians.

In the case of the Haitians, I would like to digress a little since I believe the problem is of utmost interest for our colleagues in the other place and for a great many Canadians.

It happens that, following the amendment of the Immigration Act, 1,500 French-speaking Haitians are in our country, subject to a decision of the Immigration Appeal Board; they are here as political refugees. According to press and television reports, their government claims that these individuals are criminals because they are thought to have consorted with communism; but, actually, they are criminals because they are against the regime. Furthermore, we know that if they are sent back to their country they will have to face extremely harsh sentences, even death. That is the reason why yesterday, through the House of Commons, and, this morning, through the newspapers—the Gazette mentioned it—the whole population appealed to the humanitarian feelings of the Minister of Immigration, asking him to review the case of these people, in order that, if they were sent back to their country, they could avoid being subjected to the punishments which are most certainly awaiting them.

I was glad to learn yesterday that the Minister of Immigration, the Honourable Mr. Andras, told the House that he would make use of his humanitarian feelings to review the case of these Haitians according to their merits. I think it is the duty of the Senate to make its feelings known that the Minister of Immigration should deal with these people with the utmost compassion and that he might even, as is his privilege, make use of his right of review of the decisions of the Immigration Appeal Board.

After this digression, I am getting back to the bill. To sum it up, I was saying that the mover of the bill has not clearly indicated who will be prosecuted by indictment, and who will be prosecuted by summary conviction. I am under the impression that before passing this bill we should seek assurance and details on the nature of the accusations which will be brought against those who have transgressed these provisions of the law.

However, even subject to the reservations that I have just made, the question I am asking myself is whether we really need such a law.

Honourable senators, let us first take a look at the Criminal Code. I am referring you to clause 115 of the Criminal Code, which covers all the offences that are not to be found in or described expressly by the law, and it reads as follows:

Every one who, without lawful excuse, contravenes an Act of the Parliament of Canada by wilfully doing anything that it forbids or by wilfully omitting to do anything that it requires to be done is, unless some penalty or punishment is expressly provided by law, guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

This means that if there are no specific provisions in the Criminal Code allowing the Solicitor General or the enforcement authority to prosecute someone in regard to a specific clause, clause 115 covers all offences which are not referred to as such in the Criminal Code, and in the past—and I know it because of my legal experience—legislators have used that clause to prosecute for crimes which were not expressly described in the Criminal Code.

Since we are dealing with immigration legislation, I am under the impression that we will have to examine the provisions of the act in order to find out if the cases that this bill is trying to cover are included in our present legislation.

Referring to the Immigration Act—the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, volume IV, one can find in clause 46 of the Act that:

Every person who . . . is guilty of an offence and is liable on summary conviction, for the first offence to a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars and not less than fifty dollars or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months and not less than one month or to both fine and imprisonment, and, for the second offence to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars and not less than one hundred dollars or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve months and not less than three months or to both fine and imprisonment, and for the third or a subsequent offence to imprisonment for a term not exceeding eighteen months and not less than six months.

I think I must call the attention of the mover of the bill to this:

(b) comes into Canada or remains therein by force or stealth or, knowing it to be false, misleading or improper, by reason of a false or improperly issued passport, visa, medical certificate or other document pertaining to his admission or other false or misleading information or fraudulent means.

● (1430)

When Senator Perrault, the Leader of the Government, asked us to pass this bill quickly on second reading, the reason he gave us was that after coming into Canada illegally, people were deported from our territory and then they came back a second time and there was not any clause in the act to prevent them from doing that. But if we have a look at the section I just quoted, with the penalty provided in the act, we read this:

every person who comes into Canada or remains therein by force or stealth—

The offence I refer to is in section 46—it is exactly the situation Senator Perrault explained to us; he said that in Vancouver the problem was serious; people come into Canada and then leave for 24 hours and come back after, and we are not able to prevent them or to impose a severe sentence so that they would be discouraged from doing so. However, I think section 46 of the Immigration Act provides for those cases:

comes into Canada or remains therein by force or stealth—

That is the offence I referred to in the beginning of section 46, the offence provided in those cases. If we consider section 46 of the Immigration Act, I wonder if this bill is necessary since in my mind, in the interpretation I give to the section 46, the offence provided in Bill S-12 can also be found in section 46 and also in subsection (b).

Honourable senators, could it be possible to know what is behind this bill? Is the objective to go further than section 46 itself?

Such are of course the questions we ask ourselves. And we wish to be provided with answers before we vote for a bill which, in my belief—I do not know if I make myself clear enough—is already included in the Immigration Act.

And there is also section 48 in the Immigration Act, which still covers all offences not specifically referred to in the Immigration Act.

Section 48 provides the following:

Every person who violates any provision of this Act or the regulations or any order or direction lawfully made or given thereunder for which no punishment is elsewhere provided in this Act or the regulations is guilty of an offence and is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or to both.

That is included in the statutes to which I referred in the beginning in the Immigration Act. Why not use the existing act? Why another piece of legislation which, in my mind, is a copy of what already is in the statutes? I have always been against overloading our statutes with amendments to a section of an act that often go contrary to the original section. This, of course, does not satisfy me; neither, I believe, the official Opposition. We are not at all satisfied with the explanations given. I do not blame the bill's sponsor who, in my opinion, showed great skill in succeeding to introduce a bill as simple as this one, but which raised so many doubts amongst senators who, like myself, raised certain questions—Senator Croll for instance. Other senators put questions when the bill was presented.

Given therefore the number of such questions, and the important doubts raised by honourable senators, which I raise also on second reading, I think the government leader would be wise in referring the bill to committee so that we may meet and question the experts and those who drafted the bill, and find out the ideas behind the bill.

I think if we refer the bill to committee for a more thorough and comprehensive examination, maybe our questions will have very easy answers. But until then, I believe that everything in the bill is already included in the general act, and I do not see the point in having an extra section which, in my opinion, would only duplicate what already exists in the act.

Honourable senators, in concluding, I do hope that the Government Leader will allow this bill to be referred to the committee so that we may meet the experts who drafted this piece of legislation and direct questions to them that may dispel our doubts so that we may have clear legislation. I say once more that there is a hidden motive here and we do not know the main reason for which this bill was introduced in the Senate.

● (1440)

[English]

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, there is not much that I can add to what has already been said by Senator Asselin in his very potent attack on this bill. I don't know why any member of this house should be asked to vote on a bill when we have not been given some very important information which I consider to be necessary.

I attempted this morning to find out from the appropriate department how many people have been deported from Canada during recent years, and I was informed that 2,504 were deported in 1970 and 4,027 in 1971. I said, "This is 1974. If you haven't got the figure for 1974, what about 1972 and 1973?" The reply was that this information would be provided to honourable senators before we vote on the bill. I have not seen any of it. I do not know whether the honourable gentleman has that information. He shakes his head.

Senator Grosart: The bill is going to committee.

Senator Croll: It is not a matter of the bill's going to committee. We are not "patsies" here. When a bill is presented it should be judged on its merits in this place. The purpose of a committee hearing is to clarify, but we ought to know all about a bill before referring it to committee. Senator Asselin points out that the Criminal Code covers this bill completely. Of course it does, and it has done so for a hundred years. It is a proper point to find out from time to time how many have been jailed for entering the country illegally, or after being deported, whichever the case may be.

This may appear to be a minor matter which arises in connection with the Haitians, 1,500 of whom are now in Montreal. When did they arrive there and how? Who brought them in and who gave them work permits? Surely our department should have known that these people were coming in. The number is not 100 or 200 but 1,500. Records are kept of those who enter, and inquiries should have been made when after two or three weeks this mass was seen entering. But all of a sudden we discover them and tell them they must leave. These are human beings, and they may have been misled. Some agency may have lured them to the country. If you read the news stories in the Montreal papers you will see that work permits were provided for them. They did not work for wages, not even for peanuts. All they got were the shells, and when there was no further work they were tossed out. Now we talk of deporting them.

I have not seen any need for the bill. In the light of the present immigration controversy in this country, about which I will have something to say, it seems to me that the bill is premature. Always in the past such matters have been presented to us after being dealt with by the House of Commons. In this particular instance we have an opportunity to say something about it before it reaches the other house and before it reaches us in a more formal fashion. Perhaps we can reach some conclusions as to why this is being presented in this fashion rather than in a green paper in due course.

What has happened? I will give you the situation in capsule form. There were 120,000 immigrants to Canada in 1972 and 180,000 in 1973, and it looks as though there will be 200,000 in 1974—approximately half of whom are not white. Normally 70 per cent of our immigration is European or American. That is what our panic is all about. It is much more emotional than it is real. No one in this country disagrees that it is not the birthright of any person to be allowed to settle in Canada and become a Canadian citizen. However, Canada needs and will continue to need new people from abroad to develop and build it, but they must fit into our Canadian milieu. No one denies that limits are necessary on immigration, and never again must we find ourselves in the position we did some time ago when we lost control of our immigration. We badly need immigrants who will do the manual and menial work that native-born Canadians increasingly will not do. There are a thousand jobs available in hotels in the Toronto area. These jobs cannot be filled. Alberta needs 40,000 more workers and will need perhaps 100,000 in the almost immediate future. We need a flexible immigration policy that will provide a steady flow, because once the spigot is turned off it is difficult to turn it on again. It is a backward step to bring in immigrants just to match jobs. To the knowledge of every member of the Senate, hundreds of thousands of immigrants have entered this country in recent years without jobs. Since 1946 they have been coming here and finding employment. They have enriched this country, and our horizons are still high. The suspicion that is aroused in my mind, if not in the minds of others, is that we are back to the Mackenzie King doctrine that immigrants should be sought to fit the country's social structure. We had gotten away from that policy, but we are returning to it. If that happens we will find that immigrants from northern and southern Europe and the United States will be welcome, while people from Asia and Africa will not. This country needs people. In the early 1900s, almost up to World War I, we landed immigrants in this country at the rate of 1,000 a day. We sent them to the West and they built that country. Some sit in the Senate and the House of Commons. They are everywhere in Canada.

We are now faced with a different situation. Alberta and Saskatchewan are golden provinces, rich beyond dreams in natural resources. But resources need people, they need consumers and workers. If these provinces are to fulfil their destiny, if we are to stop sending our resources out of the country, we need people where the resources are. If we believe in the policy that the Minister of Finance has been preaching, which in my opinion is eminently correct, we need an expansionary economy. One cannot work out the number required in advance. It is too unpredictable and there is too great a time lag between the time we need people to fulfil our requirements and the time we are able to get them. Few realize the problems. In parts of the country unemployment is now as high as 10 per cent. The average figure is 5 per cent, but in some areas it is as high as 10 per cent. Alberta has an immediate need for 40,000 of the sort of people who will not be afraid to dirty their hands and use their shoulders.

● (1450)

In 1967 we did away with the quota system affecting migrants. Administratively we handled the problem well. We could still handle the problem in that way, but for some reason we are making a big issue of it. No one suggests that we should have an open-door policy, particularly when doors are closing in almost every part of the world. But self-protection on our part should not be too rigid or fixed. We must make allowance for human and humane considerations and responsibility. We need to introduce green papers as quickly as possible. We are getting bits and pieces of information from government and from newspaper leaks, and the situation is hard to understand. It is understandable that misunderstanding follows. The result is that great harm is being done by people going about the country accusing Canada of racism, which in my view is not true. There is no intention of racism. Such accusations do harm to this country, to those who have come here with the intention that others will follow in due course, to those who have benefited this nation, who have helped build it.

Senator Asselin has made a total case. We have the Criminal Code, which has dealt with law breakers in a particular way for 100 years. What are they doing, building a bureaucracy within the department? What is the purpose of it? We haven't heard what the purpose is. So far as I am concerned, I would vote against this bill whether I sat on this or the other side of the house.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, it is quite obvious that many questions in your minds have not been answered. The sponsor of the bill has said he is prepared to send it to committee, and it has been suggested—particularly by Senator Croll a moment ago—that it might not be the best procedure. Senator Croll made the very good point that if these important questions are raised on second reading, answers should be given on second reading.

I agree. I therefore propose to the Leader of the Government—when he is ready to listen—that we avail ourselves at this time of one of our rules which would permit the minister to enter the Senate chamber and discuss this important bill here. I refer to rule 18, which reads:

When a bill or other matter relating to any subject administered by a department of the Government of Canada is being considered by the Senate or in Committee of the Whole, a minister, not being a member of the Senate, may on invitation from the Senate enter the Senate chamber and, subject to the rules, orders, usages, forms and proceedings of the Senate, may take part in the debate.

I suggest this is a unique time, an appropriate time, for us to avail ourselves of this rule.

As honourable senators have suggested, this bill may well be—if I may use the phrase—“jumping the gun” on the consideration of our whole immigration policy. As has been suggested, the minister and his officials, and the newspapers, have given us some indication of the oncoming immigration policy by bits and pieces. So we have nothing but an ad hoc conception of what is involved in our immigration policy affecting the future.

I therefore seriously suggest that the Leader of the Government give consideration to our using this rule, which has not been used for many years. I do not believe it has been used during my time here, but I think this is an excellent opportunity to create such a precedent in our ongoing consideration of bills.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, as much as I value the proposal put forward by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, may I suggest that one of the most competent bodies in this country is to be found in the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. I suggested at the outset of the consideration of this measure that, because of the many questions in the minds of honourable senators on both sides of the house, we should refer this matter to the committee constituted specifically for the purpose of considering this and associated legislation.

Senator Grosart: Would the leader not agree that under our rules the bill should go not to that committee but to another committee?

Senator Langlois: Foreign Affairs.

Senator Perrault: I accept the observation of the Deputy Leader of the Opposition. He is right. The measure would go to another committee of this house, Foreign Affairs, made up, however, of a similar body of expertise and legal ability. I do not believe it is beyond the competence of the members of the Senate to consider in committee the clauses of this bill, its nuances, and ask appropriate questions of departmental officials. After that process has been gone through and exhausted, if the members are still desirous of hearing from the minister and of receiving his assurances, that is a step we can consider. But it is difficult to conceive that every time a measure comes before this chamber our automatic reaction should be to ask the minister to appear on the floor of this house. As the Deputy Leader of the Opposition has said, it is an extraordinary procedure which is not commonplace.

Senator Grosart: I did not say “every time.”

Senator Perrault: I hope the suggestion is not that this chamber is not competent to deal with such a simple and straightforward measure as the one before us. As I stated last week, I hope we can refer this bill to committee as expeditiously as possible, there to ascertain the views of honourable senators from all parts of the chamber.

Senator Grosart: On the possibility that my remarks may have been misunderstood, as apparently they were, may I make two comments. My reason for making my proposal, following Senator Croll's speech, was that I have never, during my time here, seen a bill in the Senate where so many questions were raised and not answered. I agree with Senator Croll that this question should be answered in the Senate. Whether the method I have suggested is ideal I do not know, but certainly I fully agree that such questions must be answered in the Senate. It is not good enough to ask the Senate to approve such a bill in principle on second reading when many of the principles inherent in the bill are not before us. I therefore suggested that it is a unique case and the matter should first be dealt with in the Senate.

Secondly, the Leader of the Government seems to have some objection to calling the minister. He reminds me of secretaries who are sometimes anxious to protect their bosses and in the process do more harm than good. I suggest that in this particular case the minister would be delighted to come. He has shown himself well able to explain the immigration policy. It is not essential that he come before the Senate under rule 18, but I think it is essential that he appear before the committee if it is not discussed in the chamber.

● (1500)

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I rise to suggest that the use of rule 18 is not such an extraordinary measure as has been suggested by the Leader of the Government. If my recollection is correct, this rule was adopted in 1947. Between the years 1947 and 1952 it was made use or very extensively and, I think, with general satisfaction. Of course, I was not here, so I cannot speak from personal knowledge, but from my reading of the record I think that is true.

I have never heard it suggested before that the use of this rule in any way reflected upon the competence of the Senate. I think it would be a great pity if the remarks of the Leader of the Government on this subject were allowed to pass unchallenged. Perhaps this is not an appropriate occasion for using rule 18, but I think it ought to be on the record that not only is the rule there, but it was put there for a purpose and it served a very useful purpose in the years it was used. It should not be regarded as something utterly extraordinary, outrageous, insulting to the Senate. Surely we cannot take it that something passed by the Senate and put in its rules is a reflection upon the competence of the Senate. If that is the way we feel about rule 18, then we had better get it out of there, not leave it sitting there as a monument of a momentary aberration of the Senate in the past, when it apparently was prepared to reflect upon its own competence. I should like to utter a most emphatic protest against any slur upon this rule, or upon its use whenever the Senate sees fit to make use of it.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I find this to be a rather incredible exchange. There is a substantial measure of chloplog being employed this afternoon. The sponsor of this proposal has not even been given an opportunity to close the second reading debate and, in so doing, to answer some of the questions posed by honourable senators. I find it incredible that before the mover has been given an opportunity to reply and to deal with some of the questions raised by honourable senators, some honourable senators talk about calling the minister to testify before the Senate. It is almost a case of, "Don't confuse me with the facts, my mind is made up."

May I suggest that Senator Laird be given an opportunity to close the debate. If there are concerns still in the minds of honourable senators at that point, then let us follow the procedures clearly called for under rule 67(1)(g) whereby the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs shall deal with all bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to foreign and Commonwealth relations generally, including immigration.

Senator Grosart: You should have read that earlier.

Senator Perrault: I cannot understand why certain honourable senators are determined to shortcut the procedures under our parliamentary system, and I find it especially difficult to understand in view of the fact that the Deputy Leader of the Opposition has, in the past, spoken so eloquently about the parliamentary system and the rights of honourable senators.

May I suggest that we follow the established procedures, and if there are still concerns in the minds of honourable senators with respect to this measure, by all means let us call the appropriate minister.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I do not like being accused of ignoring the rules of the Senate. I wish to make it clear to the Leader of the Government and to honourable senators that I have the right, as has any other senator, at any time to invoke a rule of the Senate. I suggest to the Leader of the Government that he not allow his emotions to run away with him again. In no way is there any breach of the rules when I suggest that a rule be invoked. I am entitled to invoke any rule of the Senate at any time during a debate, which is exactly what I did.

As for the suggestion made by the Leader of the Government that Senator Laird be permitted to close the debate, there is no need for such a suggestion. Under the very rules which the Leader of the Government has talked about, Senator Laird will inevitably close the debate, and Her Honour will call attention to that fact.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Senator Grosart's proposal is certainly in order, but it is premature. That is the essence of the situation. We have procedures in the Senate which have stood the test of time rather well, procedures which suggest that this measure can be dealt with without creating a national issue and without requiring the minister to testify on the floor of this chamber, before all of our established practices have been employed. That is the only suggestion from this side.

Senator Bélisle: Honourable senators, may I be permitted to answer, in part, the sermon to which we have just been subjected by the Leader of the Government? I feel that if the Leader is going to perform a service in this chamber he had better cool off and give us an opportunity to study matters properly. Patience is an important asset for any leader. The Leader of the Government has expressed the view that we on the committee have already made up our minds. Our minds have not been made up. However, if he continues in this vein, I, as a member of the committee, will vote against it on principle. I would suggest to the Leader of the Government that he be a little more composed during our debates, if he wishes to be more successful.

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege regarding the unnecessary, uncomplimentary reference made by the Leader of the Government in suggesting that too much attention was paid to what I have said. It would be much better for him to pay attention to substance rather than emotion.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I should like to make a few remarks in this debate but I am not prepared to proceed at this time. Therefore, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Argue, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1974

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from earlier this day the debate on the motion of Senator Langlois for the second reading of Bill C-31, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March 1975.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, Bill C-31, which is now before us, once again seems to me to point up the very unsatisfactory way in which the Parliament of Canada is attempting to deal with the business of supply. There have been many attempts over the years to improve the procedures. Honourable senators will be well aware of the decision in the other place a few years ago to send all estimates automatically to standing committees and get rid of the more cumbersome procedure of having the estimates dealt with in Committee of the Whole.

This has been an extraordinary year, particularly in view of the election, and one of the results, not only of that but of other matters, is this bill, which is in many ways the most extraordinary bill of its kind that has ever been before Parliament. Another result is that in the other place they are now back to the old procedures whereby, in the last few days, even as late as yesterday, they were still dealing with estimates in Committee of the Whole.

This bill now comes to us with some sense of urgency, because we have been told that if this bill is not passed by October 31 next the government will not have the money to pay its bills. This, of course, is an old story to us, but I think we are entitled to wonder why once again the government has let itself run so close to the deadline.

Parliament has been in session for a month. There has been time to introduce this bill, certainly time to proceed with the estimates, much sooner than was done. Certainly there has been lots of time, having proceeded with the estimates, to bring the appropriation bill before us. As I say, we are now faced with some sense of urgency. It is not our intention on this side to insist on our regular procedures, because we have undertaken to permit two readings of the appropriation bill today. All being well, I say "all being well" assuming that all goes according to the plans made in the corridors—the bill will be up for third reading tomorrow. That has been part of the agreement undertaken by the Leader of the Opposition.

In placing the basic information on the appropriation bill before us, Senator Langlois gave us his usual exhaustive explanation, and I compliment him on it. He told us, of course, that we can discuss all the figures in the estimates. We have an expectation of government expenditures this year of some $24 billion. In addition there are certain other items which are most certainly expenditures, as Senator Langlois admitted—old age pension and income supplement expenditures—which will bring the total government expenditures anticipated for this year up to the amazing total of over $26 billion.

This raises the question that has been raised before in the Senate, and also from time to time by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. I am glad to say that there appears to be at this time a disposition on the part of the government to pay some attention to what the Senate and that Senate committee have been suggesting.

We had in the Speech from the Throne a statement that the federal government would use "restraint" in its spending. It did not say specifically that the government would use any restraint this year, and the fact is that there is no restraint whatsoever being used, because federal government expenditures in the first six months of this year are up 20 per cent. The recommendation which the Senate and the Senate committee have made over and over again is that in no year, and particularly not in an inflationary year, should the increase in federal government expenditures be greater than the increase in the GNP.

I should also like to refer back to the year 1969, when Senator D'Arcy Leonard was chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. The committee's report in that year, as quoted in Senate Hansard of June 25, 1969, contained this statement on expenditures:

This led to the committee's recommendation that Government expenditures do not increase at rates greater than that of the gross national product when there are inflationary forces present. The committee holds that this recommendation is still valid.

In the following year, 1970, dealing with the committee's report on the same point, Senator Leonard, as reported in Senate Hansard of March 24, 1970, said:

Your committee has been concerned in the past to compare the trend of Government expenditures with the increase in gross national production. It is obvious that as we grow wealthier and our production increases our expenditures are also going to increase. However, there is a broad, rough guideline that may be used in this type of study. The increase in federal Government expenditures can be compared from year to year with the increase in our gross national production. Our expenditures for the year ending March 31, 1970, one week from today, are up about 11 per cent from the expenditures in the previous fiscal year. Our gross national production . . . is up about 9.3 per cent. Our federal Government expenditures have again in this current, now-ending fiscal year increased more rapidly than the gross national production of the country. This is a warning sign that has been needed to some extent by the Government in announcing during the year what has been called its austerity program.

Once again, honourable senators, we have an announcement of, if not an austerity program, at least a restraint program; but there is not much evidence that anything is being done about it. I should point out that in the figures before us we are only dealing with about $9.5 billion of the total of $26.2 or $26.3 billion. These are the figures before us, but they are, over and over again, specifically related to the estimates.

Whenever the subject of the galloping increase in federal government expenditures comes up we are invariably given certain sets of apologia. One, of course, is the old statement that provincial and municipal expenditures have been rising faster over a period of time than federal government expenditures.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Grosart: The Leader of the Government says, "Hear, hear." I wonder if he will also say, "Hear, hear," when I reiterate that in the first half of this year federal government expenditures are up 20 per cent, whereas all the evidence indicates that in the current situation both the provinces and municipalities are showing far more restraint in expenditures than the federal government.

The trend of the past was a good one. Perhaps it should have been followed. But the evidence before us is that it is not being followed this year and will not be followed in the next year. Of course, we are often told that, if you look at total federal government expenditures, you must extract the transfer payments to provinces and to individuals. That is a useful exercise for certain purposes. It is useful when comparing federal, provincial and municipal expenditures, otherwise you would be duplicating the numbers, but it is not germane to the basic proposition that the problem facing the country at the moment is the very high percentage the federal government take is of the national productivity.

Then we are also told that there must be a division between budgetary votes and budgetary statutory items, and perhaps non-budgetary items. Well, here again it seems to me that the argument is specious. What this argument seems to suggest is that because certain acts were passed, and certain expenditures are now falling on the government because of those acts, those acts must never be changed. It is like saying that the board of directors of a corporation, having once decided on a certain program, no matter whether it is a loser, or whether it is too expensive or too rich for the blood of the corporation, must never change that program. I have often wondered if anybody could produce an example of the government's saying, "We have looked over all the statutory expenditures, which amount to more than half the budget, and have decided that there are some that are now unnecessary, and that can be cut."

The Leader of the Government on one occasion said, quite rightly, that what surprised him was that no one ever suggests what cuts could be made. The answer to that is that that is entirely a matter for the government, if it is as good a housekeeper as it thinks it is, to decide what such cuts should be, and where they can be made.

It is fair also to say that the minister, when he was before the committee, gave what appears to be a very explicit promise, that in the year ahead, at least, every attempt would be made to follow the suggestions made by the Senate and the Senate committee over the years. Mr. Chretien said to the committee:

Our goal is certainly not to take more of the GNP at this time than we have taken this year. I am preparing the estimates for next year and it is my goal that we will not as a federal government take more out of the share of the GNP than we are taking this year. Of course, the level will be higher, because the GNP will be much higher.

I read that into the record, honourable senators, because some of us will be looking at the estimates next year in the hope that the minister is able to achieve that very worthy result as he administers the departmental estimates as they come before him.

In Bill C-31 we have two sets of estimates. We are now asked to grant supply for the whole year, in the total amount of the main estimates of some $23 billion, and about $1 billion in supplementaries. We have already granted interim supply, as I said the other day, and some of the expenditures of the government have been dealt with in the last three months by governor general's warrants, which are now included in the estimates before us. In other words, Parliament is now asked to validate the action of the government in expending certain amounts under governor general's warrants. I make no complaint about that, because the governor-general's warrants have, in the main, been instituted for this specific purpose, to provide for government expenditures at a time when Parliament is not in session due to an election.

In looking through the bill there are a few items that perhaps I should call to the attention of honourable senators. I hope it will be understood that I am not necessarily critical of these expenditures. I bring them before the Senate largely for information. I hope that the Leader of the Government will not misinterpret my purpose, as I thought he did this afternoon when I was seeking a method to get better information. I hope he will not assume that I am necessarily being critical. I think it is the function of those on the committee who have some responsibilities, particularly those of us who are members of the Official Opposition, to bring some of the larger figures to the attention of the Senate.

The report of the committee has already dealt with the main items in which there are very substantial increases on a year-to-year basis in any one department. Therefore, I shall not deal with those now. There are, however, other items that may be of interest in indicating the kind of expenditures that become necessary in the operation of a business as large as that of the Government of Canada.

Atomic Energy of Canada, for example, will require this year, or at least will be given, about $196 million—$81 million representing budgetary, and $115 million representing non-budgetary items.

The item for the Canadian International Development Agency, which represents Canada's contribution to the problems of the developing world, totals this year $566 million. I draw this particularly to the attention of honourable senators because, when the transfer of resources from the private sector is added to this sum, Canada, for the first time, will have attained that figure of 1 per cent of the gross national product which, according to the famous Pearson report, was the objective we should set for ourselves. It is a matter of congratulations to Canada that we have finally reached that figure.

Under Indian Affairs and Northern Development, vote 5, on page 10, provides for operating expenditures for the Indian and Eskimo Affairs programs in the amount of $273 million. I draw this particularly to the attention of honourable senators because it has always seemed to me that there must be something wrong with our expenditures in this field because over and over again we are told that we are not doing the right thing by our Indian and Eskimo population. As I say, the total this year is $273 million in operating expenditures, with an additional $81 million in capital expenditures. This is part of a very large ongoing program of some $700 million for the whole Northern Affairs spectrum. About $300 million is being spent on Indian and Eskimo problems. One wonders what is wrong. These are fantastic amounts of money for our deserving native population of perhaps not more than 250,000 people. What are we doing wrong? Apparently we are spending this kind of money, and not satisfying their requirements.

When he was before the committee the minister said that he was very proud of the program, and I am sure he is, but it seems to me that there may be a time when either this chamber or the other will need to look very carefully at these expenditures to see whether the tremendous amounts of money involved are being spent in the right way, at the right time and for the right purposes.

Then, honourable senators, coming to vote 10 under the Department of Justice on page 14, we find that Information Canada is being voted $10.4 million. I am not sure if that indicates that the government has lost some faith in Information Canada, because that is about the level that its expenditures here have been at for some time, and we have had evidence in our committee that Information Canada could use more money if it could get it. Is this, perhaps, an admission that this highly touted program is now a failure and is being phased out? I don't know. I merely raise the question.

● (2020)

In looking through the bill, and thinking of those items in which honourable senators have in the past shown particular interest, on page 21 I find a very large expenditure item, which I am sure will have the full approbation of the very distinguished senator immediately to my left, of $47,752,000 for the Cape Breton Development Corporation.

Senator Macdonald: Little enough.

Senator Grosart: On page 22, under the Secretary of State Department there are votes 45, 50 and 55, which will be of particular interest to Senator Beaubien and, I am sure, to others. These refer, of course, to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Its total claim this year on the consolidated revenue fund will be $298,839,000. Vote 45 is payment to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for operating expenditures in providing a broadcasting service, $234,982,000; vote 50, payment to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for capital expenditures in providing a broadcasting service and to cancel some previous votes, $56,657,000; and vote 55, payment to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for operating and capital expenditures providing host country broadcasting services for the 1976 Summer Olympics, $7,200,000.

I am sure that honourable senators who have been concerned about some of the fictions of these expenditures on behalf of the CBC will be interested to know that apparently at long last there is going to be an end to this nonsense of the government's providing money to the CBC to pay the interest on loans from the government. I have this note from the Treasury Board, which perhaps it would be well to read into the record:

In 1974-75, for the first time, the annual capital requirements of the CBC were provided for as a budgetary vote rather than as a loan vote. Table 7 only compares budgetary amounts for 1973-74 and 1974-75. The increase of $60 million that is shown does not reflect the offset of $34.5 million in non-budgetary capital loans provided in 1973-74. Pages 24-50 and 24-51 of 1974-75 main estimates display the total program of the CBC for these two years, and show a net increase of only $25.6 million or 9.4 per cent, the higher capital amount being partially offset by the elimination of the amount previously provided as a budgetary expenditure to service the capital loans outstanding.

I come now, honourable senators, to three items in the supplementary estimates (A) which are examples—proof, I think—of the statement I made earlier that the manner in which Parliament is now dealing with the business of supply is in serious need of revision. In fact, I hope, when I am through dealing with these three items, that honourable senators will agree with me that there is a degree of absurdity in this way of granting supply to the government. I refer first to page 32, schedule B. Vote 11a under Energy, Mines and Resources, headed Mineral and Energy Resources Program—

Senator Langlois: Is the honourable senator referring to the vote?

Senator Grosart: I am referring to the bill. I am sure Senator Langlois would expect me to refer to the bill, and not to some other document, in this context. The vote is described as:

Payments for purposes of the Petroleum Products Compensation Program, as described generally in the Imported Oil and Petroleum Products Compensation Regulations made by the Governor in Council pursuant to Energy, Mines and Resources Vote 11b of the Appropriation Act No. 1, 1974—

And so on.

—such payments being for the restraint of prices of petroleum products to consumers—

This is an item of $470 million. It is to provide for the Petroleum Products Compensation Program. But the extraordinary thing is that the act setting up the program is not yet before us. Here we are providing this amount retroactively, because it has been handled in governor general's warrants. We are now validating expenditures of a government program which has not been approved by Parliament.

The second item, also under Energy, Mines and Resources, vote 52a, Energy Supplies Allocation Board, is for:

Payments, in accordance with and subject to regulations made by the Governor in Council—

That is to say, the same program.

—and to authorize the Energy Supplies Allocation Board (c) from and after November 1, 1974 to administer the said regulations, and (d) to perform such other duties and functions in connection with the said regulations and the Petroleum Products Compensation Program as the Minister may require.

What has happened here is that a decision was made to spin off the expenditures under this program from the department itself to this board, and it is true that the board was set up some time ago under the Energy Supplies Emergency Act. But we are faced with the same situation here. At the moment there is no authorization whatsoever in substantive legislation other than this bill, if it is passed, for this expenditure. The government has merely said, "We intend to give this money to the board when Bill C-32 is passed." Bill C-32 had first reading in the House of Commons on Friday. So here we have $330 million which we are asked by a vote in the supplementary estimates to provide for a new program that has not been approved by Parliament.

If there can be any further indication of the absurdity in the way we are doing this, I do not know what it is.

What is the authority of Parliament? Someone will say immediately that this bill will become an act of Parliament. Of course it will, if it is passed. So we shall have money provided for two types of government program and have money available to be expended by a board whose authority to do so has not been approved by Parliament.

One wonders what would happen if Parliament refused to pass that bill. What would happen to this money? Parliament would be in a position of having refused to pass the act setting up the program while there is another act—merely an appropriation bill—which authorizes those expenditures and, in effect, legislates this program into action.

I say it is an absurd situation, that we can have a government program that has not been approved by Parliament established by a mere vote in the supplementary estimates.

● (2030)

Perhaps I should now read from an explanatory note that was put before the committee by Treasury Board. It is as follows:

The purpose of the Oil Import Compensation Program is to maintain a stable oil price regime in Canada by protecting eastern consumers of petroleum products from the effect of increased costs of imported oil in the period since January 1, 1974. There is as yet no statutory provision for the program, and no allowance for payments was made in the 1974-75 Main Estimates.

Yet Treasury Board is prepared to come before a committee of this house and boldly state, "There is no statutory provision, but go ahead and vote $440 million and $330 million."

Further in the explanatory note there is this:

The Energy Supplies Allocation Board Vote 52a covers payment requirements for the months of November and December. Payments for the period January 1 to March 31, 1974 were provided for in Supplementary Estimates (B) 1973-74.

The best that can be said for the whole program is that you may find here a one-paragraph description of the purport of an act which is an inch thick. That is what Parliament will be asked to approve. But what Parliament is being asked to approve will already have been legislated once we pass this bill, if it is passed.

A further example appears on page 34 of the bill under Industry, Trade and Commerce, vote 41a in the departmental estimates. Here we have exactly the same thing. We have a vote in connection with the Two-price Wheat Program, the amount being $79 million. What is happening is that there is another bill coming. The explanation we have is as follows:

The Two-price Wheat policy announced on September 12, 1973 is designed to provide a fixed domestic price for wheat for a seven-year period.

[Senator Grosart.]

I am leaving out those parts which do not relate to the point I am making.

This policy was embodied in Bill C-33, that was before the last Parliament. This legislation will be re-introduced shortly. Payment for the current year is proposed via an Appropriation Act, with payments applicable to the following six years to be authorized by the legislation.

Here, again, is the bald statement that provision for payment for the last six years of this program will require legislation, and by that is obviously meant the passage of a bill explaining the whole program. But the bald statement is that as far as this year is concerned the attitude is, "If Parliament is foolish enough to agree, we are going to ask it to approve the first year of the program on the basis of a one-paragraph description. Forget the bill; it will come along."

What will happen if the bill does not pass the other place? It can be said, of course, that these are problems created, to some extent, by the election. But one has to ask why these bills were not brought before us? They could have been. Other bills are going through the other place. The bill in relation to the petroleum situation has been introduced now, and could have been introduced two or three weeks ago if anybody was really concerned about respecting the rights of Parliament in this regard.

I am sure I will be told, as we have been told over and over again in these circumstances, that this appropriation bill will become an act of Parliament. That is not the point. The point is that the bill spelling out the program in detail, which is subject to discussion, amendment, and so forth, here and in the other place, is not before us. Yet, we are now being asked to pass these three items in this appropriation bill.

Honourable senators, I make this protest because I think the time has come when our officials, our ministers and the government have got to be told that this practice should not continue. It shows disrespect for Parliament. In the discussions on the estimates, there were refusals by ministers to answer questions. One minister said, "I won't answer the question," and one wonders what this whole concept of the business of supply amounts to. The traditional concept is that the voting of supply is the essence of the control of the executive by Parliament. Well, we can see in the kind of thing we are asked to do here today what the executive bureaucrats and others think of the control that Parliament should have, the information that Parliament should have, and the respect that Parliament should have from the executive and those who present this situation to us.

● (2040)

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I should like to make a small contribution after listening to the Deputy Leader of the Opposition. I think we would all have to agree with some of the erudite expressions of his opinion so far as the business of legislation is concerned, but I believe we should be reminded that the record of the government is exceptionally good, and in my relatively brief tenure here is, I think, the best with respect to supplementary estimates. With scarcely an exception, the major items in the supplementary estimates were provided for the purpose of holding down the cost of living.

They were provided for the purpose of protecting consumers during these very difficult days of serious inflation. I am sure that even the members of the Opposition would agree that in the energy emergency the action taken by the government was absolutely essential. The fact that we were in the process of an election for some months certainly made the work of Parliament more difficult, and in this I agree with what Senator Grosart has pointed out.

When we look at the supplementary estimates totalling in the budgetary field $889 million—an immense amount of money for supplementaries—we should remember that $470 million plus $330 million was provided for the purpose of holding down the cost of energy in the province of Quebec, the Atlantic provinces and some parts of Ontario. Surely the members of the Opposition would agree that that was money well spent.

Senator Grosart: Nobody said otherwise.

Senator Buckwold: I agree with Senator Grosart's point. The fact is that it was essential to do it. The only reason I am speaking is to point out to honourable senators, and those who may read the debate, the fact that the expenditure of $889 million involved $470 million for energy and another $330 million for the environmental aspect of energy—all for the price of oil—most of which is recovered as a result of the export tax. It is really an exchange of dollars, by which one part of the country has been protected against exorbitant increases in the cost of fuel. The government, whatever its political philosophy, must be complimented on this, and I am sure the members of the Opposition would agree.

The other major aspect is the $79,300,000 for the Two-price Wheat system, as we know it, which is another form of subsidy for those who eat bread. When listening to Senator Grosart one would feel that this was, in fact, a misdemeanour on the part of the Government of Canada.

Senator Grosart: So it was.

Senator Buckwold: I suggest that in the interests of the consumer we would all have to agree this was money well spent.

Adding those three items, the $470 million and $330 million for energy, and the $80 million for the bread subsidy in the budgetary expenditures, we get, out of $889 million, a total of $880 million provided for the sole purpose of protecting consumers. I suggest to honourable senators that that is a very good record indeed, and that an additional $9 million is pretty minimal when we look at the supplementary estimates for budgetary purposes.

The great bulk of the non-budgetary items is, of course, in respect of milk—$9 million in the non-budgetary items, out of a total of $15 million.

I feel it incumbent on me once again to remind honourable senators that of any year I can recall these supplementary estimates are minimal so far as general over-expenditure is concerned. I say that in answer to the accusation that was made. In fact, the government has watched the expenditures very carefully. The main estimates have been enough to carry the government, and I would estimate that 95 per cent of the supplementaries that we are asked to approve is in the interests of consumers, the users of goods in the country. I think this is to the credit of the Government of Canada.

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must remind you that if Senator Langlois speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I feel I should begin my remarks by referring to the question put to me this afternoon by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition. At the time I was not sure what he had in mind, and even after obtaining a copy of the transcript of his remarks I am still at a loss to understand exactly what he had in mind. His question was:

I take it that the sponsor of the bill is prepared to give us the usual assurance, that the passage of this bill will not prevent us from examining any of the items contained in the estimates? I think it is usual to have that assurance.

My memory might be failing me at this time, but I have searched my memory at great length, and even asked someone to make some research into answers given for a number of years past during which I have sponsored similar bills in this house, and I do not recall, nor indeed has any record been found in the debates of this chamber, to the effect that I have even been asked for, much less given, such an assurance in the past. I am at a loss to understand how I could give such an assurance to my honourable friend. I am in the hands of the Senate as much as he is. Provided any member of the house keeps within the ambit of our rules, he can raise a question and initiate a debate on it, make all kinds of inquiries about it, and I can assure my honourable friend that I will not raise any objection to his doing just that. Even if I did, I think I would be ruled out of order.

I would assume that my honourable friend wanted to word his question so as to refer to the inquiries made last year by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance into the expenditures of Information Canada. It was a matter for the committee to decide. I was not asked for, nor indeed did I give any assurance that this was going to be the case. If this is what he had in mind this afternoon, I can assure him that I would not oppose any inquiry of this kind into any matter pertaining to the present bill. Indeed, I would welcome it. I think our committee did a wonderful job last year with respect to Information Canada, and it could serve the same purpose in the future. I think this disposes of the question. I hope I have answered it to my honourable friend's satisfaction, and that I need say no more on the subject.

Senator Grosart: The Deputy Leader of the Government has, in effect, asked me for an explanation. The easiest one I could give him is that the minister in introducing the estimates in the other place did give such an assurance, and it seemed to me that if the minister felt it necessary to give an assurance in the other place it might be well to have it here.

Senator Langlois: Yes, but in the other place, as my honourable friend should know, they have a different way of doing things. They have what they call "grievance motions." Such a thing does not exist in this chamber.

Senator Grosart: Yes, but surely my honourable friend is not saying that there is something wrong in my rising to ask for an assurance that we can look at these figures again? It has nothing to do with the rules. I am merely asking for the assurance, and I can see no reason why there should be any objection to that kind of request, or, for that matter, any other I might make. I might ask him for an assurance that we will get out of here before midnight. That is not covered in the rules, but I think it would be quite acceptable.

Senator Langlois: My honourable friend is sidetracking a bit now. At any rate, I am not opposed to his request. I was simply trying to understand what he had in mind. Indeed, I thought I did understand what he had on his mind and I said, "I am sorry. I cannot give such an assurance." I think I have expressed myself clearly enough. I do not see what I could add to clarify what I have in mind at the present time.

I come now to Senator Grosart's remarks on the bill before us. He opened his remarks by expressing the opinion that we were handling these estimates in a rather unsatisfactory way. Both the main estimates and the supplementary estimates (A) have been dealt with by the National Finance Committee. The President of the Treasury Board was in attendance at that meeting; so were his officials, his experts on the matter. Every opportunity was given to each and every one of us on the committee to ask questions, and to obtain any information we wished.

Tonight, as was his right, Senator Grosart rehashed the whole process of what had taken place at the meeting of the National Finance Committee. I do not criticize him for doing that. It is his right. He is free to do that, if he wishes. I do not see what I can possibly add to the debate by merely repeating what was said in committee, and what has been said by Senator Buckwold. However, there are some points that I should touch on.

Senator Grosart spoke first of the new policy of restraint which the government has expressed as being its policy for the years ahead. As my honourable friend will recall, the President of the Treasury Board mentioned before the committee that this restraint policy was, for the coming year, going to be translated into terms of asking the various departments to hold the line, to try and live within their budgets. What he said was to the effect that he could not compress expenditures which were decided upon a year ago. They will have to live with what was in the main estimates tabled in Parliament in the fall of 1973. But he is now working on the estimates for the next year, the fiscal year 1974-75, and he is asking all departments to live strictly within their budgets. And he added that if they come to him with any new expenditures, his first reaction will be to ask them to change their priorities and try again to live within their own budgets.

Now, for me, that is a policy which is likely to succeed. Moreover, I think my honourable friend himself had to agree with the President of the Treasury Board when he voiced that attitude, and explained how he was going to deal with future estimates of departments. I think this is a good sign, and that this policy has every chance of succeeding.

My friend also referred to the relationship between the GNP and the increase in government expenditures. I should like to read what Mr. Chrétien, the President of the Treasury Board, had to say on this very subject when he was before the committee:

The total federal government expenditure is 16.7; the total provincial government expenditure is 10.9; and the total local government expenditure is 8.5. But there is a series of entries that are calculated in that 39 figure, such as hospitals, for example. Pension plans do not appear in the budget, and so on. There is a series of items and some transfer payments that are not included in the 16.7 for the federal government when we transfer, and the same thing applies to the municipal governments when they transfer to hospitals, and so on. When you add all that, we get the 39.

Then Senator Carter said, "The fact is that of the 39, the federal government takes less than half," to which the minister replied, "Oh yes."

Senator Grosart: Of course. I did not deny that.

Senator Langlois: You did not, but it is worth putting on record, though.

Senator Grosart: It has been put on record many times. I have never disputed that.

Senator Langlois: At any rate, I will not delay the house further by quoting excerpts from this transcript of the proceedings of the National Finance Committee. I should like to remind the house that in relation to previous years, the early sixties, for example, the present ratio between expenditures and GNP shows a decrease. And that example was given by the President of the Treasury Board in committee.

My honourable friend shakes his head. If he would like me to go through this transcript in detail I should be happy to give references, and to quote what the minister actually said when he related the early sixties to another administration with which my honourable friend was closely associated.

Perhaps that explains why Senator Grosart would like to challenge my statement. At any rate, the transcript is there and I am quite ready to quote from it at any time, but I do not want to waste the time of the house in rehashing what took place in the committee. After all, what is the use of spending hours and days discussing these estimates in committee, if we are merely going to rehash the whole thing in the house afterwards. Every member of this house is perfectly entitled to attend the committee meetings, and to ask questions. The only restriction upon senators who are not members of the committee is that they cannot vote on any of the issues before the committee.

I come now, honourable senators, to a long list of items, rather large amounts, which my honourable friend mentioned, not in any particularly critical way but simply in order to bring them to the attention of the house. There is not much I can say in respect of these, since no direct criticism was voiced by my honourable friend opposite.

Having said that, I come to two items in the estimates to which my honourable friend referred with some particular emphasis. I refer honourable senators to page 32 of the bill where, in schedule B, under the heading "Energy, Mines and Resources", votes 11a and 52a are set out. I am sorry if I seem to be delaying the house, but I should like to read the wording of these two votes, since it is rather clear. Vote 11a is:

Mineral and Energy Resources—Payments for purposes of the Petroleum Products Compensation Program, as described generally in the Imported Oil and Petroleum Products Compensation Regulations made by the Governor in Council pursuant to Energy, Mines and Resources Vote 11b of the Appropriation Act No. 1, 1974—

If I may interrupt myself, I should point out that my honourable friend was looking for the parliamentary authority. Well, there it is in black and white in the description of vote 11a. I see my friend rising. I suppose he is going to get up and say that this is not legislation.

Senator Grosart: No. I would just like to ask the Deputy Leader of the Government if he does not recall that I mentioned the very fact that this is the authority for it. I did not deny that there was authority in an appropriation act. My criticism was that this is not the right kind of authority for a program involving almost $1 billion.

Senator Langlois: You are saying exactly what I anticipated you would say. As you were moving in your chair to get up, I said to myself, "My friend is going to claim that this is not parliamentary authorization".

● (2100)

Senator Grosart: I said that this is an act of Parliament. I do not deny it is an act of Parliament.

Senator Langlois: This is an act of Parliament. A supply bill is an act of Parliament just as much as any other act of Parliament.

Senator Grosart: I said that five times when I was on my feet.

Senator Langlois: You said that this is not parliamentary authorization.

Senator Grosart: I did not say anything of the kind.

Senator Langlois: I do not want to elaborate on this point any further. It is clear that there is parliamentary authorization for the expenditure of these moneys, and for the extension of the expenditures provided in this bill before us.

The following item, vote 52a, is included in this bill to finance the Petroleum Products Compensation Program for the months of November and December next. It is hoped that this sum of $330 million will finance the program until the legislation is passed.

Senator Grosart referred to that legislation and blamed the government for delay in getting it through the house. Well, as my honourable friend must know, that bill has been before the other place for quite some time. It has received first reading, and is expected to get second reading this week in the other place.

I cannot, as I have said on several occasions in the past, prophesy or forecast what will take place in regard to a bill in the other place, but I do not think my honourable friend was justified so early in the session in laying the blame on the government for not having that legislation adopted by both houses at this stage.

My honourable friend knows that early in the session there is some priority in debate, as in the case of the Speech from the Throne, which delays ordinary procedure in the other place for quite some time. Until the rules of the other place are changed I do not think we can look forward to expeditious disposal of any legislation before that body. We have no right in this place to criticize in any way the workings of the other place, which is an elected chamber and quite independent of this house.

However, setting the record straight is a thing which must be done. That is what I have done tonight, and I hope I have succeeded in satisfying my friend and setting his mind at rest by showing him that things are not as black as he has painted them.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Grosart: They are just a little grey.

Senator Langlois: On the other hand, to call these amounts that I have just mentioned expenditures is to stretch the meaning of the word, because these are essentially transfer payments. This is money that we are collecting from the American people—the American consumers—through our exports of energy across the border to the United States, and we use that money to compensate our consumers in Canada east of the Ottawa Valley line—the demarcation line for petroleum products—in order to obtain stabilization of the cost of energy in Canada. We are merely transferring money from one hand to the other, and this could be properly called a transfer payment.

My honourable friend knows, from the point of view of accounting with respect to government expenditures, how these transfer payments are considered. If, when the federal government transfers money to a provincial government in any cost-sharing program, it enters the transfer payment as an expense, and the province does the same, then you have double accounting. That is why these transfer payments are not taken into consideration, accounting-wise, in establishing expenditures of the federal government. The provincial governments do likewise, and so do the municipalities when they transfer any public funds of their own to hospitals or other programs. I think these categories of payments I have just referred to should be considered as transfer payments.

There is nothing I can add to what I have said so far without running the risk of being repetitious, and going over again what was said tonight in this chamber, or what was said at the meeting of the National Finance Committee.

Honourable senators, I thank you for your kind attention, and with that I would commend this bill to the house.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

On motion of Senator Langlois, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FIRST REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the first report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, I do not think that this report requires any extensive discussion. It seems to me that the proposals in it are quite standard, and are necessary for the transactions and workings of the committee in an orderly fashion. If any honourable senator wishes to raise questions about it, I shall be very happy to answer them. The terms of the report are in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of Thursday last, and I think that they are self-explanatory. I do not propose to detain the house any longer unless, as I say, somebody wishes to ask questions about some part of the report.

Motion agreed to, and report adopted.

BRITISH TRADE MISSION

INQUIRY STANDS

On the Inquiry of Senator Forsey:

That he will inquire of the Government:—

1. Is it true that the British Trade Mission in Montreal has been transformed into “the British Consulate”?

2. If so, why?

3. If the Montreal office of the Mission has been so transformed, have the offices of the Mission elsewhere in Canada suffered the same sea-change?

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, these are really, in effect, questions which I asked of the Leader of the Government the other day, and I do not think that I can very well discuss them until I have some kind of answer. I was a little surprised when I was informed by some of the officials that these should be put down as Inquiries, because it seemed to me that they were more properly the kinds of thing that should be brought up in the Question Period, but if that is the way the thing is handled I have no particular objection.

However, I cannot see that I can offer any discussion until I have some kind of answer from the administration, so that I ask that the matter stand until I get some answer from the Leader of the Government.

Inquiry stands.

AGRICULTURE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE ANY ASPECT OF AGRICULTURAL INDUSTRY

Senator Argue, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, moved pursuant to notice:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture be empowered, without special reference by the Senate, to examine, from time to time, any aspect of the agricultural industry in Canada; provided that all Senators shall be notified of any scheduled meeting of the Committee and the purpose thereof and that the Committee report the result of any such examination to the Senate;

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such counsel, staff and technical advisers as may be necessary for the purposes of such examination; and

That the Committee have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, October 30, 1974

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

THE HONOURABLE PAUL MARTIN, P.C.

FAREWELL SPEECH TO PARLIAMENT

Hon. Paul Martin: Honourable senators—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Martin: I wonder if I may rise on a question of privilege before the proceedings of the Senate begin today? I will be leaving the Senate today after having been here now for some six and one-half years. Later, in the month of December, I am to assume new duties as Canadian High Commissioner in the United Kingdom. In the meantime I have much preparation for this assignment ahead of me. I wondered, honourable senators, whether today it was necessary for me to speak at all. It will be my last speech in Parliament. I thought that I would prefer to have left without speaking but with your friendship and greetings, but some of my friends thought that I should say a word before I depart. Then what to say? What to say that would be substantive, that would be useful, that would arise out of one's experience, one's appreciation for the great institution of Parliament of which I have been privileged to be a member for almost 40 years—and there, perhaps, is the matter of substance about which I should say something, namely, the institution of Parliament itself.

Not only have I been a member of the Canadian Parliament, as a commoner, for almost 33 years but as a senator for over six years. I have had the privilege of being a member of four different administrations and of serving under five. In my judgment, there is no doubt about the importance of the parliamentary system. It is about that which in very general terms I wish to say a word.

[Translation]

I have been a Member of Parliament for some 40 years. During all those years in the Commons and as a member of four different governments, I have been in a very good position to evaluate and judge our parliamentary system.

I will not talk about my personal career, leaving this to impartial observers who will appraise it on its merits. Suffice it to say that I have been happy and particularly proud to be a part of my country's free legislative bodies, as you all are, first in the House of Commons, then in the Senate, that is in both Houses that make up Parliament according to the Constitution.

My wish is to speak in favour of our Canadian parliamentary system. We must not lose faith in that system. Let us defend it, against those who feel it is obsolete. We must of course define it and find new ways to improve it, but the principle is good.

Such is the view I have of the Canadian parliamentary institution I am about to leave, not without a certain emotion, firmly convinced of its usefulness and power.
[English]

In our Confederation the Senate plays a very important part. We must remind ourselves of the fact that it is part of the Parliament of which I have spoken so strongly. Forty years ago I came here along with Senator Denis and Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière) as new members of the House of Commons. They alone share with me that tenure since 1935. We have seen, as all of us have seen, so much of the history of our country evolve in political terms in the House of Commons and in the Senate.

The Canadian Senate is a very essential part of our parliamentary life. I have learned to recognize that, particularly during the years I served here as government leader. I thank all honourable senators for the understanding, support and the collaboration they gave me during that period as I sought to discharge my duties as Leader of the Government in the Senate.

When one thinks of the Senate one has only to think of such personalities as Meighen, Dandurand, Power and Chapais, and so many others who took their seats in the Senate during my first days in the other place. When we talk of the value of the Senate, let us not forget that that value is portrayed so much by the contributions of the great personalities who have occupied seats in this chamber, of whom I have mentioned only four.

As I make this last parliamentary speech, perhaps I may be permitted in the Senate to say a few words about the House of Commons, that other essential part of the Parliament of Canada. When I think of the House of Commons, I immediately think of the great figures who have contributed to our parliamentary and political life. I cannot speak of the period prior to 1935, except as an occupant in the gallery seats. The first time I sat in the gallery in the House of Commons was in 1926 along with my friend, Lester Pearson, who was a lecturer at the University of Toronto and with whom I had occasion to listen to the dissolution debate in 1926. Of my own time in the House of Commons I think of King, Bennett, St. Laurent, Pearson, and now of Trudeau, Diefenbaker and Stanfield. Of an earlier period, I think of the great Ernest Lapointe, Jim Ilsley, Norman Rogers, Colonel Ralston, C.D. Howe, and so many others who have made this country what it is today. All these men were living examples at one time of the great vitality and strength of the parliamentary institution itself.

● (1410)

I said that I had been in Parliament for forty years. As I mentioned, Senator Denis, Senator Fournier (de Lanaudière) and I had come in together. During this time I have been given, as they have been given, a rare opportunity to appraise and measure the worth of the parliamentary system. I speak not of my own record; that will have to stand by itself; it will have to be assessed by more impartial judges. Suffice it to say that I have been happy, and indeed I have been exhilarated, by my participation in this free and deliberative assembly, in the Commons and in the Senate, the two houses of our Parliament according to our Constitution. I feel something like Charles Fox, who said that he was never happier than when he found himself on the floor of Parliament, and I am sure that is true not only of Fox but of many of us.

But of the parliamentary system I do speak affirmatively in this last speech. I do affirm my belief in it. Our Parliament is based on the Parliament that is derived from the old land, and from which so many other free assemblies of the world have derived their genesis and inspiration. We must not lose faith in the parliamentary system. There are so many challenges today—challenges that have not succeeded in Canada but have succeeded in so many other countries of the world, where totalitarianism in one form or another has supplanted what we call Parliament, what Senator Walker and I called Parliament when we were students debating in Hart House debates. That is where we were getting our inspiration from our professors, who taught us about Mill, Bright, Burke and Gladstone. We have transposed all that, we have brought it into this place and into the other place. That is what Parliament is, and we must not forget it.

We must respond to those who say that Parliament is irrelevant. Of course we must streamline it; we must make it more functional. That was the purpose behind the Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons a few years ago when it examined the reform of the parliamentary institution itself, not only this house but the other place as well. Let me say this through you to the younger generations of Canada. This institution of Parliament, imperfect as it is, is sound. Take away this Parliament and you take away the guarantor of our freedom in this country. Make no mistake about that.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Martin: I am glad I can say this today with conviction. In 1918 I was a student of the Holy Ghost Fathers, some ten miles away from here. On a clear day from the college hills, which lie along the beautiful Gatineau, we could see the spires of the Parliament Buildings. The magnificent centre tower was not then erected. It was being rebuilt because of the fire of '17. But there stood in the background, on a clear day, clear indications that there was the Parliament of the nation.

What influences in my case caused me early to want to become a member of Parliament, it is hard for me to recall, but they were perceptively there. They are as firm in my mind today as they were when I resolved that some day I should seek to represent a constituency in the Parliament of Canada. I will always be grateful to the people of Essex East, who sent me back to Parliament after ten elections, during what was of ten times a hectic and difficult political life, as is the case for everyone who assumes that role and who does it for that length of time.

Well, I have said all I want to say, all I should have said—indeed, much more. There are so many things that one, in these last few minutes, would like to say but which obviously cannot be said. I am grateful to the Prime Minister and to the members of the government who have thought that I might serve in another public capacity in addition to the role that I have already had in this house, in addition to my ministerial responsibilities in the House of Commons and my role as a private member. There are so many people around this place whom I would like to be able personally to thank. I think of the years in the House of Commons, of people who are no longer here to thank—great figures. The statesmanship of Canada need not take second place to that of any other country in the world. I think of Mr. Bennett and Mr. King engaged in daily debate. And make no mistake about them: these were two powerful men, as had been Borden and Laurier before them. But that was long before my time. Yet in my own time in the House of Commons there were also great figures. I mentioned some of them, and there are senators here who will recall the great figures who carried on their responsibilities in this chamber during the period that I was a private member in the other place in 1935. Many a day I sat in our gallery listening to Senator Dandurand and to Senator Meighen, as well as to others, and I say that it is well that we should think of these personalities because they were almost part of the instruments behind the infrastructure of Parliament itself.

As I say, there are so many to whom I owe so much: my own political leaders, who gave me preferment, gave me opportunities to serve—as a private member, as Secretary of State, as Minister of National Health and Welfare; and Mr. Pearson, whose foreign minister I was. There are so many to whom I owe so much that all I can express is a collective thanks:

To all of you, to all honourable senators wherever they sit, to all members of the staff from the top to the bottom, I acknowledge my debt. I acknowledge what I owe for the collaboration, for the loyalty and for the support I have received. What I have done, small as it is, is only part of a much greater and collective effort, all of which is designed to strengthen the institution of Parliament in our free and great country, the most envied country among the nations of the world.

TRIBUTES TO SENATOR MARTIN ON RETIREMENT FROM THE SENATE AND APPOINTMENT AS HIGH COMMISSIONER TO THE UNITED KINGDOM

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, we have just heard from a very great Canadian, a person who has made an immense contribution to the public life of this nation and to the entire parliamentary system. He is leaving this place to assume a new challenge, a new opportunity to serve this country. I know that I reflect the feelings of all honourable senators and, indeed, all of those on Parliament Hill when I wish him well. He leaves behind in Parliament an immense void, but, as well, a record of service which, hopefully, shall be emulated by generations to come.

Senator Martin has made a notable, indeed, a memorable, contribution to the institution of Parliament, and to the framing and passage of some of this nation's most significant legislation. While we regret that he is leaving us to assume these new responsibilities abroad, we know that he will continue to serve with outstanding distinction, and that in the process he will bring even greater lustre to the name of Canada.

On your behalf I thank him for his notable and, indeed, historic words this afternoon.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I need hardly say how much Senator Flynn, the Leader of the Opposition, regrets that it was absolutely impossible for him to be here today, on this important occasion, to pass on to the Honourable Paul the sentiments and, indeed, the sentimentality, of this group towards him at this time. There will, however, I am quite sure, be another occasion on which the Senate will do appropriate honour to the Honourable Paul.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Grosart: On that occasion I am sure that Senator Flynn will speak the things that should be said, and will speak them as well as they should be said, to our parting colleague.

It may be premature to refer to him as "His Excellency." I understand he will not take up the duties which will officially entitle him to that honour until December 31; but, honourable senators, I think there would be most general agreement that if it were one of our functions on this occasion to assess his distinguished career we would mark against every part of that career, not merely the word "good", not just "very good," but, "excellent."

His has been a career which we are all happy to know has not yet reached its peak and where it will now lead we have no way of knowing. But I am sure we are all aware that two of his predecessors in the office to which he goes as High Commissioner in London went on, as we hope he will go on, to other areas of distinguished public service. Sir Charles Tupper came back to be a Prime Minister of Canada, and perhaps this will happen to the Honourable Paul. Another, the Honourable Vincent Massey, came back to be Governor General. So, we are happy that there is so much scope for further promotion available to the Honourable Paul.

His career in the Senate is in many ways the most distinguished, in a parliamentary sense and in a ministerial sense, of any in our history. I don't think there is any other Canadian politician or statesman of our time who can match the record of 39 years in the Parliament of Canada, 33 years in the House of Commons and six years in the Senate, and 29 of those years as a minister of the crown.

When the time comes for history to look back over his distinguished record, it seems to me that it will concentrate, perhaps, on two achievements as epitomizing what he has done for Canada. The first will be in the general area of social security, because I believe it is true to say that he, more than any other Canadian, has been the architect of our present system of social security which is the envy of the world. There are millions of Canadians today who are the beneficiaries of the brilliance of his mind, his wisdom and his concern for his fellow man.

The second area is, of course, that of foreign or external affairs: his contributions to the United Nations as Secretary of State for External Affairs, and, above all, his passion for peace. He too is the architect of our present renown in the world as a military peacekeeper. Over and over again the initiatives he took in the councils of the world were all marked by this passion for peace and his belief in the extension of the rule of law from domestic affairs to the affairs of the nations.

He has—generously as always—referred to some who have gone before him. He said of them that they have made the country what it is. Well, honourable senators, I am sure that today we would add to that distinguished list the name of Paul Martin.

Perhaps at this stage I might be permitted a personal note. I was a student at the University of Toronto when he was also a student there. He was a great debater and he became at that time my first Canadian idol.

Senator Buckwold: You should have followed him more closely.

Senator Grosart: I might say in excuse that I cannot have been a very good student, because another very distinguished Canadian whom he mentioned, the Rt. Hon. Lester Pearson, was my professor of politics and history. So, I went astray on both counts. But after a good many years our careers did come together again in those interesting and fateful years 1956, 1957 and 1958. We found ourselves in opposition in many matters as to our concept of the future of Canada, and on at least one occasion he dealt with me in rather harsh terms because of the tactics I had used or the action I had taken against the interests which he favoured at that time. But I am glad to say that there was not a great deal of malice in it, or, at any rate, no personal malice but perhaps some sound, understandable, political malice. I watched his career very closely in those days for the reason that the Liberal Opposition in the House of Commons had been reduced to, I think, fifty, and it is my view as an outside observer that the comeback of the Liberals from that very low point in their political fortune was due to Paul Martin more than to any other member of the Liberal hierarchy or group in Parliament at that time. None of us who had any responsibility for countering some of his brilliant moves will ever forget the "Martin Bureau of Statistics"—the statistics which he quoted over and over again as indicative of the height of unemployment, all of which were completely contrary to the official statistics but which, I am sorry to say, were much too widely believed. I often thought he followed that very sage advice the great Benjamin Disraeli gave to an aspiring politician. Disraeli said, "Be frank and explicit—that is the right line to take when you wish to conceal your own mind and to confuse the minds of others." I know he will not mind my saying that, because I quote that as a tribute to his political acumen over those years.

● (1430)

As the Honourable Paul goes to his new assignment, I think of his recent accident in which he fractured his right arm. It is perhaps characteristic that this happened when he was playing with his grandchildren. I recall a statement made by one he will remember and whom I have no doubt he knew personally, Charles Dawes, the great American ambassador, who said, "Diplomacy is easy on the brain but hell on the feet." Henry Fletcher, also a former ambassador, replied: "It depends on which one you use."

We on this side of the house wish to say to the Honourable Paul, "We thank you for the fair and sportsmanlike way in which you have opposed us over the years. We thank you for the way you have led us in the Senate and we wish you the very best in your future career."

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Alan A. Macnaughton: Honourable senators, I assume that you will permit me, after 25 years of close association with Senator Paul Martin as both his friend and colleague in many, many situations, some difficult and some pleasant, to say just a few words.

We were together in the other place. We have been together here in this place and I cannot think of a better representative that we could send to the Mother of Parliaments in London, England. I say this because we will have there a man who has gone through the mill, a man who has gone through the workhouse of this Senate, a man who knows what the political implications of life are, a man who is trained in the practical school of politics. We will have more than that. We will have an elder statesman at the home of the Mother of Parliaments, which at the present time is going through a tremendous transition. We will have a trained observer, a trained statesman there; in fact, we will have a jurisconsult there. In my opinion, both Canada and Britain are very fortunate in having this type of person as this country's High Commissioner in London at this time of changing conditions.

So, on behalf of all of us here, Senator Martin, I wish you great personal success and, of course, success on behalf of Canada.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, it was said at one time in this house when the Honourable Paul Martin received his sixteenth honorary degree that he was becoming popular by degrees. When I saw his hand in a sling today it reminded me of 1919, when the Prince of Wales had his hand in a sling from shaking hands with so many people and I thought this fate had befallen our former Leader. If it had not, it should have. That is why we have difficulty today when we think of his leaving here to take what I consider to be the most honoured post that Canada can bestow on any one of its sons, that of High Commissioner to the Court of St. James. It is the greatest honour that can be given anyone, and it is the most useful field of service. It can do tremendous good for Canada's trade and public relations. It is an open format from which to look out on Europe. There is no one in Canada better qualified at this time than the Honourable Paul Martin. I thought the news leak of his appointment was too soon, and I have seen prime ministers in the past, as soon as a leak got out which they had not authorized, just cancel an appointment. I was on tenterhooks. So I want to tell the Senate that I feel very much relieved today to hear that it is all very official and true.

As my honourable friend has said, there have been many great leaders in this house. I know that Raoul Dandurand and Arthur Meighen are spoken of with reverence, and I join with that great group the Honourable Senator Connolly (Ottawa West), who was an outstanding leader of this house in the years during which he occupied that position. As someone has said, but has not really put it as strongly as it should be, we are losing today one of the greatest parliamentarians in contemporary Canadian history. I say that in all seriousness. His career has been meteoric and he has done most of it on his own sheer ability. I knew him fifty years ago, went to college with him, debated with him and in those days obtained advice from him. In 1925 I had occasion to debate against Mackenzie King, when he was the great Prime Minister of Canada. I remember the advice of Paul Martin when I was about to go up against the great man. He said, "Take it easy, Dave. Remember, he is the Prime Minister." That was good advice, but he mowed us down, anyway.

Senator Martin was born in 1903. That was a long time ago, but he is still young. I lost track of him after the University of Toronto years, because he went on to Harvard Law School, where he obtained a degree with honours, then to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated cum laude. Then he went on to Geneva, where he obtained another degree. Therefore, his most recent achievement is not just luck. He has been forming the background for this most of his life.

He has not said, nor has anyone mentioned, that he is the Chancellor of Sir Wilfrid Laurier University. What a wonderful name, Sir Wilfrid Laurier! How appropriately that goes with the chancellorship. It was Waterloo Lutheran University, of course, when he took the chancellorship. There was a question of grants, and the name of the university had to be changed. It was just by chance—I am sure it had nothing to do with Senator Martin—that Sir Wilfrid Laurier's name was given to that Conservative university.

● (1440)

His career in Parliament, as has been said before, is almost unsurpassed in length. Had the Prime Minister waited 10 more days before announcing his cabinet changes—and I am sure he did not know this—Senator Martin would have equalled Mr. Mackenzie King's length of service as a Privy Councillor. Apart from one other exception, Senator Martin served as a cabinet minister for a longer period of time than any other in any country of the British Commonwealth. That indeed is a mighty achievement.

The amazing thing about him is that, apart from the first time when he offered himself provincially, he succeeded in getting elected each time he ran. I guess he learned a lot of lessons. To think of being elected 10 times in succession! I found it hard to get elected twice. It is a very difficult undertaking, but he rode through with the greatest of ease. He has never been defeated.

During those hectic years, as has been pointed out, he served with distinction.

He waited a long time for his first Cabinet appointment. His stewardship was long. He was 10 years in the House of Commons before he became Secretary of State. He was a young man even then. As was pointed out by Senator Grosart, he served as Minister of National Health and Welfare, and the social security program which he inaugurated is something which is the envy of the whole world. We have had criticism of it, of course, but that was to be expected. He held that job for 13 years, until my party came into power in 1957.

Senator Greene: Those were black days.

Senator Walker: They were for the honourable senator. I remember you well, Joe.

Senator Martin's years in External Affairs, from 1963 to 1968, were outstanding, and none of us will forget them.

He was at his best in Opposition. I would like to talk about that for just a moment, because I sat opposite him. He was like the devil incarnate in Opposition. There we Tories were—we inherited a recession in 1957 when we came into power, and we were doing our best to pull the country out of it, but every day the Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse, as I called them—they had been "apocalypsed" but they only stayed "apocalypsed" for a few years—took turns in shovelling out—that is hardly the phrase—very severe and cogent criticism. I refer, of course, to Jack Pickersgill, Lester Pearson, Lionel Chevrier—an amazingly able man—and, of course, the leader of them all, Paul Martin.

Frequently Mr. Martin would be out of order, but the Speaker, who had gone to Oxford with Mr. Pearson, did not always call the Liberals to order. When he finally called Mr. Martin to order, Mr. Martin would conveniently turn the other way, feign deafness, and continue. How Mr. Martin always managed to get the unemployment statistics a day early, I do not know. I can think of only one other person who could have done it—Joe Greene. If the figures were good and showed a decline in unemployment, Mr. Martin would not mention them; if they were bad, he trumpeted them.

Senator Greene: They were always bad when you were in office.

Senator Walker: That is very nice. The honourable senator is speaking in generalities this afternoon. That is not unusual. We always appreciate it. No matter how he speaks, it is very nice to hear from him.

Paul Martin had some way of getting those particulars from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics a day before the government got them. Well I remember some fierce fights with him when I was Minister of Public Works, and always after one of them I would be called to our lobby, and Paul Martin would walk up to me and say, "Davie, I thought you and I were friends." That would clear the decks so he could give me hell again the next day.

He was a master craftsman. I do not suppose there is anyone of this generation, other than Mr. Diefenbaker, who is a greater parliamentarian. Certainly there is no Liberal of this generation that I know of who could surpass or even equal the technique and ability of Mr. Martin on the floor of the House of Commons.

One of his great achievements during all those years—he was elected in 1935 and Mr. Diefenbaker in 1940—is that he has remained a close friend of Mr. Diefenbaker. The fact that he, a member of the Opposition, of the other side, could manage that reflects great credit on him.

Finally, I point out that this is a terrific job that Paul Martin is taking on. His responsibilities will be enormous.

I was impressed last fall when, in connection with meetings of NATO, I was in Istanbul, where we had foregathered to see the opening of that huge bridge across the Bosphorus linking Asia to Europe. We were in the company of diplomats—there seemed to be hundreds of them—who spoke every possible language except, it seemed to me,

French and English. Paul Martin was there, and knew every one by his first name.

I suggest to you, honourable senators, that it is a fact that the former Leader of the Government who is now retiring knew more diplomats than any other diplomat in the world, and was more highly regarded as an individual at the United Nations, and at one time at NATO, than any other diplomat. The liking which people have for him is absolutely remarkable.

I have no axe to grind. I just want to pay tribute where tribute is due. Paul Martin has earned his spurs. He has had everything except the Prime Ministership, and when he ran against my old university professor, Lester Pearson, I subscribed $200 to his campaign fund to see if he could beat Pearson. I was certainly convinced of one thing—that Pearson would not make a good Prime Minister, but Paul Martin would. One thing that I regret, as we meet and part today is that he did not fill the role which he was trained to fill, and which we predicted 50 years ago he would fill, namely, that of Prime Minister of Canada.

He has now a wonderful, golden opportunity, in his latter years, of giving his greatest service to the Dominion of Canada and perhaps, to Harold Wilson in helping him out of some of his difficulties in Britain.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators, we need not apologize for taking a little longer than usual on this occasion, because it is a rather historic one. Forty years in Parliament is a long time, and today is the culmination of a great record of achievement.

As Senator Walker and others have indicated, it is virtually impossible to outline the career of the Honourable Paul Martin on the floor of the Senate, unless one is prepared to talk almost indefinitely. The story of his life is really a history of our own time.

Paul Martin has spoken about two things in particular. He has spoken about Parliament, and about the great figures of Parliament. The contribution that he made this afternoon to parliamentary debate in describing the importance of Parliament in the affairs of this nation—indeed, in the affairs of the world—is one of the greatest in his very fruitful career. I hope that school children and university students who are interested in the public affairs of our country read the words he has placed upon Hansard today as to the value and quality of the institution that we call Parliament.

● (1450)

In speaking of Paul Martin's career, it can be said that Parliament made him, Parliament fed him. Hilaire Belloc said that about Balliol.

I recall many years ago, before I even thought of being in Parliament, sitting in the gallery of the House of Commons, often on an afternoon when attendance in the house was very thin, and almost invariably seeing Paul Martin, who was a backbencher at that time, in his seat. I think he got the feel of Parliament in those days, and it seems to me that his love of the institution developed from that early experience. Every member of the other place in the days when Paul Martin was there realized they were getting a personal contribution from him, because of his efforts on the floor of the house.

Senator Walker has said that Senator Martin might very well have been the leader of his party. I think that is true. However, as I have said to Senator Martin, the contributions he has made to the public life of this country over these years, at immense sacrifice, and the contributions he has made to Parliament and to the political party to which he and I belong, are such that no one can ever assess them adequately. I do not think the fact that he did not become the leader of his party detracts in the slightest from Paul Martin's career. Those of us who have been associated with that party and, I am sure, with any other party, know that so much of the life and spirit of that party is embodied in Paul Martin's own career, and in his work on behalf of this great country which he loves so much.

His career has been one of lustre. I am very proud to have sat in government with him. I am sure I speak for everyone here when I say that when Paul Martin goes from Parliament, Parliament will be the poorer. All of us feel proud at having sat in the same deliberative assembly with him, thereby sharing some of the lustre of this great career which he has had in the Parliament of Canada.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, on every day of importance, particularly those bringing transition, in the Senate there has been a pattern established whereby, quite properly, the Leader of the Government, the Leader of the Opposition and certain friends and associates of long-standing speak about the circumstances and the individual involved. It is only rarely that anyone else intervenes. It is appropriate that members of the individual's own party should speak of him, and that is particularly true when he has been their leader.

It is equally important that members of the Opposition should make some appropriate remarks and express their feelings, if for no other reason than that some of them have feelings of remorse after several years of sitting in Opposition.

The third group, those who are friends or long-standing associates, quite naturally want to express a few words on an occasion such as this.

Senator Martin has just made an address which, as Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) has said, is an outstanding one. It is one which I think has historical significance. Today I want, very briefly, to break the usual pattern by adding a few words to the tributes paid to Senator Martin. In the 19 years I have been here I have not been guilty too often of suggesting that, as the senior member of the independent party in this chamber, I should be able to express a few remarks on such occasions. I want to say to Senator Martin that this is done with the unanimous consent of my caucus. Some of you will know that my caucuses are held very regularly, very frequently, and terribly simply.

Senator Martin came to this chamber as the Leader of the Government, thereby accepting a difficult task, regardless of how much those of us who have been here for some time like to think of it as being simple. I can only say that it is never simple. The Senate is a peculiar place. Perhaps I should be a little careful of my analogies, but I was thinking of the donkey, the carrot, and the stick. That may not be the right analogy but certainly the Senate is a place where leadership qualities show up very definitely. Leaders can get an enormous amount done if they go about it in the right way, but they have considerable difficulty in getting the same results if they choose the wrong method.

I would not say to Senator Martin that he is a perfect person, because no one in the world is perfect. I should like to say, however, that in the years he was Leader of the Government in this place he was most considerate. In addition, he has a great saving grace, being his sense of humour and an essential kindness and gentleness, which was always appreciated by all honourable senators.

In seeing you go, Senator Martin, we are losing not only a great parliamentarian and a valued colleague, but a very great friend. We will certainly miss you. We are happy, indeed, that you have taken on this extremely responsible position, which in this modern day may have been slightly downgraded. It may be that people are tending to look down a little on some of our international relations. Personally, I am one of those who believe that our friendship, our understanding and our co-operation with the United Kingdom are still of absolute and paramount importance.

• (1500)

I am extremely happy personally that you are going to be Canada's representative in London. I wish you and your family well. We shall watch your career in London, and the later career that has been suggested, with the greatest of interest. We wish you God speed.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, without taking too much time, I would like to join my French-speaking fellow citizens and associate myself with all the compliments and good wishes which have been expressed to the Honourable Paul Martin.

Like many of you, since 1966, I have had the opportunity to hear and even follow his advice on occasion.

Paul Martin left an unforgettable impression throughout the world since, if we happen to go somewhere he has been before, by accident or otherwise, we are always told about Honourable Paul Martin and his accomplishments for Canada.

I sincerely believe that if Canada enjoys today such a high reputation throughout the world, it is largely due to the intensive and continuous work that the Honourable Paul Martin accomplished at various times during his long and interesting career. If we are losing him today as a friend in the Senate, we are convinced that we shall nevertheless see him working in far away places for Canada, her development and her good reputation.

We, French-speaking Canadians, wish to you, Paul, all the success that we are sure you will continue to gain for Canada during the years to come.

[English]

Hon. J. J. Greene: Honourable senators, I would be guilty at best of negligence, and at worst of thoughtlessness, if I did not take this opportunity of speaking to Paul Martin for the people of the Ottawa Valley on this occasion. Many of us tried but none of us was ever able—neither the Maloneys nor the McCanns, and certainly not myself—to displace Paul Martin as the favourite son of the Ottawa Valley, and I know that on this occasion the people of the Ottawa Valley would want to congratulate him and wish him well in his new venture.

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Laird, seconded by the Honourable Senator Carter, for the second reading of the Bill S-12, intituled: "An Act to amend the Immigration Act".—(Honourable Senator Argue).

Senator Langlois: In the unavoidable absence of Senator Argue, and with his knowledge and agreement, I beg leave to speak on this matter in his place.

The Hon. the Speaker: Has the Honourable Senator Langlois leave to proceed in place of the Honourable Senator Argue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I must at the outset express my sincere thanks to the honourable senators who took part in the debate on this measure and particularly to my excellent friend, Senator Asselin, whose contribution yesterday was remarkable. Indeed the Senate has proven once more that the importance of its role as a legislative body is increasing steadily.

In fact, although this bill is a measure that seems fairly simple, the Senate has given it very special attention over these last few days, enabling us to scrutinize it thoroughly.

However, my remarks as to the honourable senators' contribution to this debate, and more particularly that of my excellent friend, Senator Asselin, do not mean that I agree with what they said. I should like to refer especially this afternoon to the remarks made yesterday in this House by Senator Asselin.

First, senator Asselin implied that the need for an urgent passage of this legislation had not been shown. Now I know it was mentioned that it was important not to delay unduly the debate on this bill, on account of certain circumstances prevailing in certain major cities of this country, where illicit activities are taking place and from where, every day, people who are guilty of serious offences leave this country under a deportation order, but who can come back afterwards, without even being liable to arrest or to indictment for having thus come back to pursue here their illicit activities. At the present time it is not an offence to re-enter Canada even though one has not gone through the formalities provided by the Immigration Act. It is precisely that situation which this measure aims to correct. Besides, one has but to look at the single clause (e) in this bill and to read the first paragraphs of the new section 35.1, which is intended to be added to the Immigration Act, to realize that it is effectively a new offence.

As a matter of fact, the explanatory note of the bill reads as follows:

This Bill would make it an offence for a person against whom a deportation order is made to return to Canada without the consent of the Minister in the circumstances described.

That is the new offence being created and since that offence does not exist at the moment there is absolutely no way of prosecuting since there is no offence committed.

Senator Asselin: That is the general act.

Senator Langlois: I know my honourable friend just repeated what he said yesterday, that this is the general act. But it is precisely on that comment that I want to expand mainly this afternoon.

Yesterday my honourable friend first talked about deciding on the form of prosecution. He objected to the discretion being apparently given to the minister and his attorneys, and this is actually what is done, to proceed either by way of—

Senator Asselin: Indictment.

Senator Langlois:—indictment or summary conviction. He further added the following comment with which unfortunately I do not agree, saying there was a difference in the penalty, the punishment imposed by the court, depending on the way the case was prosecuted. However, he added this—and it is this point to which I would like to draw his attention and the attention of honourable senators—he said the penalties set out in the act are only the maximum ones. There is the answer. The presiding judge, whatever the form of prosecution, will have to base his decision and the exercise of his discretion as to what penalty should be imposed on the basis of evidence and of the circumstances of the offence which has been proven before him, and since the penalties are only the maximum penalties he may reduce those penalties according to the degree of the offence proven before him. I am therefore convinced that the presiding judge at one of these trials, whatever their form, will necessarily have to take the evidence into consideration—in other words, the seriousness of the offence in view of the evidence brought before him. The legislation provides him with a certain discretion because the sanctions are not minimum penalties. They are maximum penalties which will be left at the full discretion of the court to reduce, according—and I think that we must have confidence in our judges—according to the evidence submitted to the court.

I think that this takes care of the first argument of my honourable friend.

My honourable friend then referred—

Senator Deschatelets: Before Senator Langlois continues, I would like to say that I do not recall all the details of the bill but I understand that there would be a fine or a maximum sentence but no minimum sentence, which means that the court could, for instance, impose a sentence of one hour's imprisonment or a minimum fine. There would be complete discretion, according to circumstances; am I right?

Senator Langlois: You are absolutely right. I refer Senator Deschatelets to section 35.1, which this bill would add to the Immigration Act, and which reads as follows:

(c) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for two years, or

(d) on summary conviction, to a fine of not more than five hundred dollars or to imprisonment for six months or to both.

These are maximum sanctions, and the judge will have absolute discretion to reduce them. I am certain that, as always, the judge will base his decision on the seriousness of the offence according to the evidence submitted.

Therefore, in my opinion, whatever the type of prosecution adopted, the judge will always retain that discretion to lessen the maximum punishment as provided for in the act.

● (1520)

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, would the honourable Senator Langlois inform me of the criteria for decision between the alternatives under this act? During my remarks I commented that the indictment procedure is, in my opinion, a more serious one—and the honourable senator is aware of this because of his legal knowledge. Who will set the criteria to decide which way to proceed?

Senator Langlois: I was answering a question. I believe that earlier in this debate I gave an opinion, and I used the Income Tax Act as an example. I was told that it was a bad example; it may be so. Examples are always somewhat deceiving. Comparisons are never perfect. However, according to the Income Tax Act, the minister may proceed either by way of indictment or summary conviction. Such is the case under this act. The Minister of National Revenue issues certain instructions to his attorneys to the effect; for instance, in the case of a taxpayer who knowingly and wilfully failed to register his assets so as to escape paying a capital gains tax on them, the minister issues instructions to his officials, in consultation with the Minister of Justice, to the effect that they must proceed by way of indictment. But when the offence results from an error on the part of the taxpayer or his accountant, where there is no intention of evading income tax, the instructions issued are to proceed by way of summary conviction. However, here again there is a maximum penalty involved, which is left to the discretion of the judge. Neither the minister nor his attorneys will decide on the procedure; the judge will decide on the basis of the evidence submitted, whether to impose the maximum penalty, or to reduce the same.

I now refer to the other point raised by my honourable friend when he asked who would be prosecuted. In this respect I refer the house to what my honourable friend said. I have here a copy of yesterday's Hansard, and I quote the honourable senator:

Who will be prosecuted by way of indictment? Is it those individuals who have police records, members of organized crime or would-be political refugees? We are presently faced with the case of the Haitians.

I believe, first of all, and this is my first point, that the case of the Haitians presently in Canada has no relation at all with this legislation. Besides, they are not deportees, they have not been deported yet, but seemingly, if we can rely on press reports, they will be very soon under a deportation order. If this legislation is passed by Parliament, once deported, they will come under the provisions of the legislation if they come back to Canada without the minister's consent. That is the new offence. But presently, no law in Canada allows prosecution of somebody who, after having been deported, comes back to Canada without the minister's consent. That is a control, that is an addition to the deportation orders which, as we commonly say, have no teeth at present. The minister issues a deportation order. The deportee crosses the border, but he can come back again five minutes later and he cannot be prosecuted. When he is arrested later, he is not arrested under a specific section of the act providing for summary conviction. He can be deported again, and then he has every right of appeal. He still has the whole legal process available to him, and he can continue his illicit activities in Canada for many more months before being deported a second time, and this can go on for months and years. And that is exactly what we want to put an end to. I believe it justifies the purpose of the bill now before us.

Now, to come back to the Haitians, yesterday my honourable friend introduced a parenthesis, and I feel obliged to make a few remarks on that digression.

All we know about the Haitians is what we have read in the newspapers. All kinds of figures were given: I read that there were 2,000 Haitians involved. I also heard 1,550 and 1,200 mentioned, but what is the actual figure? Only those who took part in the demonstrations in their favour really know. I doubt that there are any reliable statistics.

But, whatever their number, I agreed with the honourable senator when he suggested, as he did to the minister yesterday, that he use his humanitarian discretion with respect to these people. It seems—and here again, according to the newspapers, there is nothing official about it—that these people came to Canada with visitors' permits. Once the visas had expired they decided to stay in Canada and applied for what is known as landed immigrant status; they wanted that status but their request was denied because they did not meet the criteria of the Immigration Act. Some of them have not yet used up all means of recourse to appeal, but if their appeal is turned down it may be that they will have to be deported. That is unfortunate; on the other hand, I am happy, as Senator Asselin noted, that two days ago the Minister of Immigration announced officially that each case will be dealt with on its own merits and with humanitarian consideration. I doubt that the minister can do more. I am rather confident with regard to those people, especially in view of the statement made, here again according to the newspapers, by an Haitian government official to the effect that they are undesirables in their own country; he has even claimed that they are communists.

I do not have to elaborate further on the situation in Haiti, since everybody, I think, knows about it. I recall—according to newspapers again—that this official is alleged to have added, "We do not want them here." If they do not let them go back home, there is no danger, in my opinion, of their being ill-treated. But I know that some of them, one or two, are in Spain. They each got a visitor's visa, while on holiday. Are they going to stay there?

I am very surprised by something else. The French government who had this country under its protection, under its wings, for such a long time, does not seem to be concerned with the lot of the Haitians. Yet, I am persuaded that the former mother country realizes the situation as well as we do. I would add this: I agree with the honourable senator; these people have all my sympathy. I hope they will be treated with justice and humanity.

Now, I come back to the text of my honourable friend's speech. He asked, "Do we need the present bill?" When answering this question in the negative, Senator Asselin added that under the Criminal Code, particularly under section 115, we have provisions to meet the aim of the bill before us. Let me quote section 115, from my copy of the Debates of the Senate, as read by Senator Asselin:

Every one who, without lawful excuse, contravenes an Act of the Parliament of Canada—

And this is important.

—contravenes an Act of the Parliament of Canada by wilfully doing anything that it forbids or by wilfully omitting to do anything that it requires to be done is, unless some penalty or punishment is expressly provided by law, guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

But it seems that he has completely forgotten that this section takes for granted the existence of an offence under an act.

It is quite clear.

Senator Asselin: The Immigration Act.

Senator Langlois: I shall come back to the Immigration Act. Don't go too fast. I shall come back later to sections 46 and 48. This legislation presumes that there must be an offence so that the penalty provided may be imposed.

● (1530)

Therefore, if one act or another does not provide for any offence, section 115 of the Criminal Code does not apply at all. I believe the nod my learned colleague is giving me confirms what I am saying. But probably subject to sections 46 and 48 of the Immigration Act—and I shall deal with both of them in a moment—and referring to the official report of the Senate, I shall first quote section 46 of the Immigration Act as the honourable senator read it in this house:

—is guilty of an offence and is liable on summary conviction, for the first offence—

I point out those words "for the first offence"—for all that a first offence must have been committed—and I quote further:

—to a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars and not less than fifty dollars or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months and not less than one month or to both fine and imprisonment, and, for the second offence to—

Again the second offence.

—to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars and not less than one hundred dollars or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve months and not less than three months or to both fine and imprisonment, and, for the third or a subsequent offence to imprisonment for a term not exceeding eighteen months and not less than six months.

I believe the senator, and rightly so, skipped voluntarily sub-paragraph (a) which is not important.

Every person who

(b) comes into Canada or remains therein by force—

Senator Asselin: By stealth.

Senator Langlois:

—or stealth or, knowing it to be false, misleading or improper, by reason of a false or improperly issued passport, visa, medical certificate or other document pertaining to his admission or other false or misleading information or fraudulent means;

So, once again, it is a specific offence to return to Canada under false pretences. But the person who returns to Canada, gives his name, address, place of origin and makes no misleading statement, does not commit an offence even if he had been deported, and that is precisely the loophole the present legislation seeks to correct.

Senator Asselin: May I ask a question of my honourable friend? In sub-paragraph (b) "by force or stealth", is guilty of an offence; the person is guilty of an offence under the bill we are discussing. The person who leaves the country and returns without permission, in what manner does he enter the country? It is by force or stealth or in a fraudulent manner. Therefore, if that person enters the country in that manner, since it is covered in the present act, why have another bill to cover it?

Senator Langlois: My honourable friend rose on the pretence of asking a question, but he is refuting my argumentation. However, before putting forward his argument, he should read the clause, the wording of the legislation before us. It is not an offence today to return to Canada without the minister's permission after having been deported. It is not an offence. Therefore, a deportee does not enter by force or stealth and is not guilty of an offence, so long as the bill is not passed. In my opinion, the wording is clear. That is the case we want to cover. We are creating a new offence by saying that every deportee who enters the country without the minister's permission is guilty of an offence. That is what we want to cover in this bill. For me, it is quite clear. It is an offence that does not appear in any existing statute, even in the Immigration Act.

I go on now to the other argument, which is the same argument about the present Immigration Act which my honourable friend referred to when he quoted section 48 of the Immigration Act. I am referring to Hansard, and I quote:

Every person who violates any provision of this Act or the regulations or any order or direction—

—I emphasize these first words of the section: "Every person who violates any provision of this Act or the regulations or any order or direction". There must be a violation.

—lawfully made or given thereunder for which no punishment is elsewhere provided in this Act or the regulations is guilty of an offence and is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or to both.

But, there again, section 48 provides for some violation of the act. But so long as this legislation is not passed, our Immigration Act will not consider as an offence the fact that a deportee comes back to our country without the minister's consent, and it will be impossible to invoke either section 48 or section 46 of the Immigration Act any more than section 106 of the Criminal Code to have this individual traced and arrested.

Senator Asselin: They should have proceeded differently.

Senator Langlois: That is a question. I would not want to change places with the experts of the Department of Justice responsible for drafting legislation. I would not say they might have proceeded differently. I have enough faith in them. Besides, if the bill is referred to the committee, we can send for those people and ask them why they did not proceed in that manner. But I think my honourable friend with his last interjection has just proved my point when he said they should have proceeded differently. Therefore, he admits implicitly that there is no offence.

Senator Asselin: Wait a minute. I have said before and I say again that regardless of what my honourable friend said, I am convinced, and I have not yet been proved wrong, that the offence provided in this bill already exists under section 46(b). And on this, my honourable colleague did not give evidence to the contrary. He pretends there is no offence involved. For sure, anybody who comes into Canada by force or stealth commits the offence provided in the bill before us. Therefore, the honourable senator has not convinced me that this offence does not already exist. This is my contention.

Senator Langlois: I can only refer the honourable senator once more to sub-paragraph (b) of section 46 of the Immigration Act, the important part creating the offence:

(b) comes into Canada or remains therein by force or stealth or, knowing it to be false, misleading or improper, by reason of a false or improperly issued passport, visa, medical certificate or other document pertaining to his admission or other false or misleading information—

But coming into Canada after being deported is not coming by force or stealth. Perhaps my honourable colleague knows how things happen when somebody comes to the border post and says: I am so and so from Cleveland, and I want to come into Canada for such and such a reason. As long as what he says is true, he does not come by force or stealth no matter if he has been deported or not. That is precisely why the new offence is legislated into being. If the man is asked: Have you been deported, and he answers no, then he is lying. There will be no need to invoke this section to arrest him if he lies that way and misleads the new immigration officer.

Section 46 would be enough. But if this man comes to the border, accurately states his name, surname and address, and gives accurate answers to questions asked, he is not committing any offence although he has been deported the day before, or two days before, or a year before. This is the only thing achieved by way of the new act, the creating of a new offence in the very specific case of a tricky, undesirable person; the target in this instance, and there is no reason to hide it, is the so-called mafia; people that come to this country to carry on illegal activities. Those people are crafty. They will not, and it must not—

Senator Asselin: The word “mafia” should be defined.

Senator Langlois: Well, defining the word “mafia” would not be easily done. We would have legal battles before the courts, with counsel trying to get to the bottom of the meaning of the word “mafia”. It should not be forgotten that what is involved here is a secret organization, an organization that does not advertize in newspapers its means of recruiting, and how to go about being a member.

But that again is a question of wording, and if my honourable friend agrees that something should be done, then he must agree with the principle of the bill. Whether it be done by defining the word “mafia”, or by doing something else, if it is merely a question of form, that will be looked after in committee, or it can there be said that the wording is bad, that the bill should be amended, and that can only be done in committee. It is especially the best way of doing it and the best place to do it.

However, I still maintain that the clauses quoted by my honourable colleague—my learned colleague, I should add—do not create the offence provided for by this bill which therefore is a necessary piece of legislation to consider. That we should bring out its deficiencies, its terms, I agree. I agree but I do not think that we can suggest after seeing the points that were made in this house, that this bill is not necessary and that we are doing what Senator Asselin yesterday called—I do not remember the words he used and I would not want to put words in his mouth—he said that it displeased him enormously to see that our laws were being amended uselessly, that legislation was amended in such a way that an amending section ends up saying the opposite of what was originally intended. I agree. I agree with him in the sense that it is useless for us to complicate our statutes with frivolous amendments which are not worth the paper they are written on. But I do not think such is the case with this bill.

Now, I fully endorse the last suggestion made by the honourable Senator Asselin that this bill be deferred to the committee—he actually did not say which committee, but I think we all know which one he meant—the Committee on Foreign Affairs which, under our rules, must consider bills dealing with immigration. I agree with him and I congratulate him on that suggestion. I do urge the bill's sponsor to move that the bill be deferred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs where we will have the advantage of having the minister and his experts and, possibly, if some senators so desire, legal experts from the Department of Justice, to advise us on the procedures we followed in drafting this bill and tell us whether some amendments might not be made.

Besides, we have had a most interesting debate yesterday on the possibility of calling the minister to appear before us. Rule 18 was referred to. However, I know the minister, Mr. Andras. I trust him, but we should not call a minister who has no legal training to interpret for us section 115 of the Criminal Code, or sections 46 or 48 of the Immigration Act. Furthermore, I believe that it is when the matter is before the committee and when the minister appears there, that he will be able to explain his department's policy. But, when sophisticated legal issues, such as the wording of bills, will be considered, he will be accompanied by experts and possibly by expert draftsmen from the Department of Justice. Therefore, I believe it is the appropriate place where to further our examination.

I asked for and I did receive interesting information on the implementation up to this day of this famous rule 18. I am grateful to the Clerk of the Senate for the information he has provided me on this matter. I believe the Senate will be interested in getting statistics on the use that has been made up to now of rule 18 and on what has been done about it in the past.

With your permission, I shall continue in English, because this part of the debate was held mostly in the other official language of our country.

[English]

As I have just said in French, honourable senators, I have obtained through the Clerk of the house some valuable information on the application so far of rule 18 of the Rules of the Senate concerning the appearance on the floor of the house of a minister of the Crown to give information and explanation of any measure relative to his department. I have found that rule 18 is the continuation in a slightly different form of rule 18A which was adopted in 1947.

Since 1947 there have been seven instances in which ministers of the Crown came from the House of Commons and appeared before the Senate to participate in the debate on the motion for second reading of a bill. The first instance was in March 1948, in connection with a bill to amend the Canada Shipping Act, 1934, when the Honourable Lionel Chevrier, then Minister of Transport, appeared. After the minister spoke the debate was adjourned, and the bill was read a second time on a later day and referred to the Transport and Communications Committee.

The second instance was on March 28, 1949, in connection with a bill respecting Oil and Gas Pipelines. At that time the Honourable Lionel Chevrier, then Minister of Transport, came to the house and spoke to the bill. The bill was read a second time, and referred to the Transport and Communications Committee.

The third instance was on November 8, 1949, in connection with a bill respecting National Defence. The Honourable Brooke Claxton, then Minister of National Defence, spoke to the bill. The bill was read a second time, and referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee.

The fourth instance was on May 13, 1952, in connection with a bill respecting the Criminal Law. The then Minister of Justice, the Honourable Stuart Garson, spoke to the bill on second reading. The debate was adjourned, and the bill was read a second time on a later day and referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee.

The fifth instance was on June 10, 1952, in connection with a bill respecting Food, Drugs, Cosmetics and Therapeutic Devices. The Honourable Paul Martin, then Minister of National Health and Welfare, spoke to the bill on second reading. The bill was read a second time, and referred to the Public Health and Welfare Committee.

The sixth instance was on June 17, 1952, in connection with a bill relating to Trade Marks and Unfair Competition. The Honourable F. G. Bradley, then Secretary of State, appeared on the floor of this house and spoke to the bill, which was read a second time and referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee.

Lastly, on June 23, 1952, in connection with a bill to amend the Eastern Rocky Mountain Conservation Act, the Honourable R. H. Winters, then Minister of Resources and Development, spoke to the bill on second reading, after which the bill was read a second time and referred to the Banking and Commerce Committee.

In five of these precedents which I have mentioned the minister was escorted to his seat in the Senate chamber. The Honourable the Leader of the Government moved that the said bill be now read a second time, and the minister was the first speaker. The bill was then read a second time and referred to a Senate committee. In the other two cases the debate was adjourned, but the bill was later referred to committee.

In no case was the Senate in Committee of the Whole on those various occasions. Therefore in no case was the minister accompanied by departmental officials. The question of departmental officials arose in our discussion yesterday, and inquiry was made as to any precedents to be found in this respect. I should say that the research made uncovered no precedents or evidence, but for one exception, of officials of any department coming to the floor of the house and engaging in discussion of any matter relating to a department.

● (1550)

There was one instance where officials were on the floor of the house. I see Senator Molson nodding. He knows what I am about to refer to. It was in 1969, during the examination of the Report of the Special Committee on the Rules of the Senate in Committee of the Whole. The mace was not on the table at the time. The Law Clerk and special adviser to the committee sat in front of Senator Molson, chairman of the committee, during the study of the report by the committee. That is the only example of where a person, not being a minister of the Crown nor a member of the Senate, was allowed on the floor of the house to assist the sponsor of a measure.

Senator Grosart: It is a good precedent.

Senator Langlois: In the precedents I have mentioned, the minister was the first to speak on the motion for second reading. In the present debate, it is to be noted that already there have been several speakers but, of course, this does not preclude the minister's being invited.

I come now to my comment on this practice, established by rule 18, of inviting non-members of this house to appear on the floor of the Senate. I quote the following from the book The Modern Senate of Canada by F. A. Kunz, at page 196:

The reason for the discontinuance of the practice may perhaps be partly traced back to the violent protests of the late Senator Nicol, who repeatedly stated that there was no minister who presented legislation half as well as did members of the Senate. Indeed, it should be remembered that the falling into desuetude of Rule 18/A coincided with the decentralization of the legislative functions of the Senate leader among an ever widening circle of senators. Rule 18/A was essentially an aggressive device trying to enforce a practice which did not fit in the "new look" of Senate leadership. It belonged to the era that ended in 1942 and was out of line with the constitutional and political realities of the post-war period. The diffusion of Senate leadership, the minimization of the role of second reading debates, and the revitalization of the standing committee system, where ministers could be invited and cross-examined, in brief, the completion of the process of transforming the Senate from a theatre into a workshop provided no appropriate environment for the operation of Rule 18/A. Although himself responsible for the adoption of the rule, Senator Robertson soon realized that it conflicted with his concepts of the Senate and Senate leadership, and, as he later recalled, "took the cue and I do not think I ever invited a Minister to come here afterwards." On April 2, 1957, it was suggested that Mr. Pearson, then Secretary of State for External Affairs, should be invited under Rule 18/A to come to the Senate and address the House on Canada's policies towards the Middle East, Hungary, and aid to underdeveloped countries. However, the suggestion was dropped as a result of Senator Haig's objection that the Senate ought not "to allow any Minister or other individual from the House of Commons to discuss on the floor of this House a subject that is of general interest to the whole Government..." There were some attempts in 1960 to revive the old rule, but Senator Aseltine, Leader of the Senate, frankly told the House that he was "not very much in favour of that system." Like the late Senator Nicol, he believed that under Rule 18/A, even if it worked out, the Senate "would not get any more information from ministers, and perhaps not as much as we get by following our regular practice." Thus, the rule, for all practical purposes, can now be considered dead.

As I noted, that quotation was from the book by F. A. Kunz.

Senator Grosart: Celebrated for the nonsense he wrote in that book.

Senator Langlois: He quoted many honourable senators who do not have the reputation that the honourable senator just described.

Senator Croll: Who wrote that letter?

Senator Langlois: It is not a letter; it is a report that I received from the Clerk of this house.

Honourable senators, should we decide to take advantage of rule 18 and invite the minister to appear before us, it would have to be done by way of a motion. So far no motion has been made. Should it be the desire of the minister to have officials on the floor to advise him, that would have to be after second reading in Committee of the Whole, when the mace is not on the table. A motion could then be made to that effect.

I do not propose to quote any further from the report that I have in my hand, but in my opinion this might require unanimous consent, because such a motion would have the effect of suspending one of our rules, to wit, rule 17.

Finally, I should draw the attention of the house to the fact that since it is the practice for honourable senators, not members of a particular committee, to attend and participate in the deliberations of the committee, the presence of the minister on the floor of the Senate is no longer warranted. Each member of the Senate has the opportunity of attending committee meetings and of participating in the discussions. The only thing he cannot do is vote. The information provided in committee by the minister, accompanied by his experts or legal advisers, is available to all honourable senators who wish to participate in the deliberations of the particular committee. For that reason, I reiterate that I support Senator Asselin's suggestion that the bill be referred to committee. I hope in closing the debate the sponsor will make a motion to that effect.

Senator Bélisle: I move the adjournment of the debate until the next sitting.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, before the debate is adjourned I should like to ask my honourable friend, the Deputy Leader of the Government, if he thinks he is right in saying that unanimous consent would be required?

Senator Grosart: Of course not.

Senator Molson: I think the Senate would be required only to suspend the rule without notice. If notice were given and a motion placed before the chamber, it would then be permissible for the house to do as it so found.

Senator Croll: There is a motion to adjourn.

Senator Molson: I asked my question before the motion was put.

Senator Langlois: I gave my opinion freely and under reservation. I said it was my own opinion. I did not want to give the impression that the Table was in accord with me on this point. I would refer honourable senators to rule 3, which states as follows:

Any rule or part thereof may be suspended without notice by leave of the Senate, the rule or part thereof proposed to be suspended, and the reason for the proposed suspension, being distinctly stated.

If we have a motion which has the effect of suspending any of our rules, leave would be required to proceed with that motion, or notice given. That is what I meant. Perhaps I was not clear in my explanation.

ALBERTA-BRITISH COLUMBIA BOUNDARY BILL, 1974

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. J. Harper Prowse moved the second reading of Bill S-13, respecting the boundary between the Provinces of Alberta and British Columbia.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is necessary to complement certain acts passed by the legislatures of British Columbia and Alberta, those acts being in practically the same terms as the bill before us. The purpose of this bill is to establish a boundary commission consisting of three commissioners, one from each of the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia, and one representing Canada. The purpose of the commission is to carry out a resurvey of the sinuous boundary line between the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia, which is presently described as being a height of land extending from the point where the Rocky Mountains intersect the 49th parallel up to the point where the Rocky Mountains intersect the 120th meridian of west longitude, which is the western point of Alberta and the eastern point of British Columbia.

It has become necessary now to redefine and resurvey this sinuous line, primarily because of the interest in the search of minerals. In addition, in the southern part of British Columbia and Alberta, strip-mining operations are being carried out which are changing the actual location of the highest point of land. Therefore, it has been determined by agreement between the two provinces and the federal government that it is in the interests of everyone concerned, before disputes break out as to where the boundary is, that there should be a resurvey carried out to replace the present, and rather hard to find, high point, and to establish and maintain survey monuments and other physical evidence of the boundary.

It is anticipated that the commission will be made up of the directors of surveys of the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia, and of Canada; and that the costs of the resurvey will be borne by the provinces themselves, but the federal government is expected to be responsible for the costs in respect of the inspections, the monuments, the mapping and the meetings of the commission.

If honourable senators have any questions. I shall endeavour to answer them. I should add that the passage of this legislation is rather urgent, in order that the commission be established before some damage is done which may result in difficulties for all concerned.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator O'Leary, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the names of Messrs. Loisel (Chambly) and Lachance have been substituted for those of Messrs. Marceau and MacGuigan on the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Report on operations under the Regional Development Incentives Act for the month of August 1974, pursuant to section 16 of the said Act, Chapter R-3, R.S.C., 1970.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, November 5, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Senator Flynn: Explain.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, before the question is put I should like to give the usual brief outline of what we can anticipate in the way of work for the next week. There are five bills presently before Senate committees. The Committee on Agriculture met this morning and heard a number of witnesses with respect to Bill S-6, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, but the committee is not yet in a position to report the bill. I understand that the committee wishes to hear from the minister. Bill S-10, to amend the Feeds Act, is also before the committee on Agriculture, and I am informed by the chairman that the committee will examine that bill next week.

The Committee on Health, Welfare and Science will continue its consideration of Bill S-9, to repeal the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act and to amend the Trade Marks Act, and hopes to be in a position to report next week also. The Committee on Transport and Communications will meet again to consider Bill S-5, to enable Canada to comply with a Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft. The Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce will meet on Wednesday to hear witnesses on its combines investigation study.

If Bills S-12 and S-13 are referred to committee today or early next week, the Standing Senate Committees on Foreign Affairs and Legal and Constitutional Affairs respectively will meet to deal with them. In addition, honourable senators, it is expected that we will receive at least one bill from the House of Commons and further legislation for introduction in the Senate in the first instance.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I listened with considerable interest to the explanation of this motion, and I must say that in making the explanation Senator Langlois did give an imposing list of legislation that is before the Senate for consideration. Of necessity he did not go into the fact that when we meet on Tuesday night through Thursday it inevitably means that committee meetings are bunched on Tuesday afternoon occasionally, but mainly on Wednesday, when there are other activities that some senators might wish to participate in—I refer to the party caucuses—and on Thursday morning.

With the greatest of deference, I cannot be taken to concur in the proposition that we can deal with this amount of important legislation in a three-day or a two and a half-day week, efficient as the Senate is—and I must say I am an admirer of the efficiency of our work and the conduct of our business in this chamber. I say that having had some experience in another part of Parliament. However, I do want to place on record my protest at the concept that we can properly do our business in Tuesday night to Thursday afternoon sittings. It seems to me, with the greatest respect to those who have other problems and who wish it otherwise, that we should consider meeting on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday afternoons, and Friday morning if necessary.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, perhaps I might be allowed to comment briefly on those remarks, if only for the sake of not acquiring the reputation of a slave driver. Earlier in the session I mentioned that logistically speaking we cannot have more than two, or at most three, committees sitting at the same time, and we will follow this rule next week.

Senator Molson: Explain. Why not more than two committees?

Senator Langlois: We do not have the staff for it. We cannot staff more than three committees at the same time. I think that applies also to the membership of the committees as well as their staffing. I think this is generally agreed among honourable senators. When we have three committees sitting at the same time it takes all our resources to man those committees as far as membership participation is concerned, and the staffing of the committee with clerks, reporters and interpreters. For this reason, we will continue the practice we have been following. Due to the heavy workload that we have next week it might be necessary to sit on Friday to consider any legislation we get from the other place or legislation that might be initiated in this house. Perhaps if I had said that earlier it might have set my honourable friend's mind at ease.

• (1410)

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, I quite agree with what has been said about the number of committees that can meet at one time for reasons of the adequacy of the staff; but nothing was said about why a committee must sit only on Wednesday or Thursday mornings. I see nothing wrong with committees sitting on Monday afternoons and Tuesday forenoons, as well as on Wednesday and Thursday mornings.

Senator Langlois: I am ready to give consideration to that suggestion to see if it is possible.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I merely wish to draw attention to the fact that the proposal of Senator McIlraith is that we should have committees sitting on Tuesday rather than on Friday. Personally, I think we should start earlier in the week, and, if we are through by Thursday, that is all to the good. If we have to sit on Friday, I don't mind, but it seems to me that Tuesday is much better than Friday. I think that is the point Senator McIlraith was making.

I hope the Leader of the Government will not mind my saying that we had some general discussions as to the organization of our work, and I would suggest that such discussions should continue. Possibly, we should have an inter-party committee dealing with this in order to create as few problems as possible for members of the Senate. In any event, I doubt that it would be required of us that we sit five days a week. I realize there are other considerations that should be taken into account. Certainly, we could review this problem eventually, and I imagine that would be the wish of all sides.

Senator Langlois: Consideration shall be given to that suggestion as well. Another suggestion is, of course, that committees could sit on Wednesday evenings also.

Senator Flynn: Except that that idea has never been popular. There are good reasons for its unpopularity. Frankly, I think it would be better to have committees meeting on Tuesday afternoons rather than follow that last suggestion.

Senator Perrault: The honourable leader's observations will be given careful consideration by the government. I would tell the honourable members, however, that we anticipate that many other measures will be sent to us from the other place. We are looking at a very heavy workload in the next few weeks, and, if necessary hours are required to deal adequately and promptly with this legislation, I am sure that all of us are prepared to co-operate. However, I agree with the honourable leader that we must meet to discuss these things and to make sure that our meetings are properly scheduled.

Senator Flynn: I think the Honourable Leader of the Government made a Freudian slip when he said that these observations would be given careful consideration by the government. Surely he meant "by the Senate." That is why I suggested a committee of members from all sides.

Senator Perrault: Yes.

[Senator Langlois.]

Senator Langlois: It was simply a lapsus linguae.

Senator Flynn: Yes, that is right.

CUSTOMS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator Cook moved the third reading of Bill S-4, to amend the Customs Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

IMMIGRATION ACT

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, October 23, the debate on the motion of Senator Laird for the second reading of the Bill S-12, to amend the Immigration Act.

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, several days ago when I spoke on Bill S-4, to amend the Customs Act, I complimented the government sponsor for introducing consistency to our statutes. I said then:

It is refreshing to find, therefore, that the government, at long last, is now proposing amendments to bring one statute permanently into alignment with another.

Having listened intently to the debate on this bill, and the many interesting and perceptive questions raised by honourable senators, I must come to the conclusion that this piece of legislation is not up to the standard of its predecessors.

At first when I listened to the sponsor of this bill I was impressed by his openness and frankness, which slowly underwent a "quiet revolution" in the minds of the government supporters. It occurred to me that an iceberg was emerging and that so far we have only seen the tip. I rightly decided that those who questioned the sponsor were already afraid of the submerged two-thirds of the iceberg. I must agree with the very important and well presented observations made by Senator Asselin, that existing sections in the Immigration Act and the Criminal Code cover the provisions contained in the proposed amendments before us, unless there are some technicalities that we are not aware of. Having re-read the relevant sections in the aforementioned acts, I too question the necessity of this bill. Unless there are some hidden objectives and legalities, the amendments only duplicate what already exists in the act.

The able and learned Senator Croll is known in this place to be like a fisherman who never buys a can of worms unless he has counted them and is assured of their high quality. His intelligent approach to this piece of legislation has convinced me that the government knew how much of the iceberg was under water, and that his strong objections to the bill are necessary.

If we are going to support "housekeeping" measures, let us be made aware, first of all, what these measures are about. Let us not confuse existing legislation by adding frills and details that only complicate and overload our statutes, and which are difficult for our courts to interpret. Furthermore, this is another example of the untimely presentation of legislation in this chamber. At a time when our immigration policies are being subjected, to a thorough overhaul in the other place, here we are playing around with subordinate details which may very soon be changed radically. In any event, during my time in this chamber I have observed that every time we have taken the tortoise and the hare approach, we have ended up at the pace of the tortoise—making amendment after amendment.

When I rose the other day to suggest to the honourable Leader of the Government that patience is a great virtue even in dealing with legislation, he was much more convinced than convincing. May I say to my friend, the honourable Deputy Leader of the Government, that yesterday he performed one of those "tours de force" that the Honourable Paul Martin was accustomed to performing in this place. I am still at a loss to understand why the Honourable Hazen Argue is not participating in this debate. If he did, I am sure that he would present a different argument from that given us by the deputy leader yesterday. The learned and distinguished deputy leader probably knew that the ingredients of the cake were inedible, so he put lots of icing on in order to sell us something which very few in his audience seemed willing to buy. For these reasons, honourable senators, I oppose the second reading of this bill.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, may I at this point direct a question, and I think I do so appropriately, to the Deputy Leader of the Government? Perhaps I may preface my question by saying it is my understanding that the decision as to whom to call before a committee of the Senate is normally made, in effect, by the chairman of that committee. In the absence, therefore, of the chairman of the committee to which this bill will probably be referred, as we have been assured it will, I wonder if I might ask, since I happen to be deputy chairman of that committee, if it is the intention to ask the minister to be present when the committee is seized of this bill.

My reason for asking this question is that the debate has indicated quite clearly that the concern and consideration of honourable senators goes beyond the mere legalities discussed so thoroughly yesterday and is now into the realm of policy. Many of the questions asked were directed to the policy of the government in this whole matter of immigration, and particularly as to how this bill fits into that policy. I therefore ask, and I assure you that I do not do so in a critical way but rather, I hope, in a constructive way, if consideration has been given to requesting the minister to attend the meeting of that committee.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, although I would like to be able to give an affirmative answer to my honourable friend, I must refrain from doing so because I feel that I would be usurping the functions of the members of the committee. It is up to the committee members alone to decide who should be called.

Senator Grosart: Oh, no.

Senator Langlois: I am not even a member of that committee, so how can you ask me to determine in advance who is going to be called before it? I could not do so without usurping a power that is not mine.

Senator Grosart: Well, I certainly know of no case where a committee has met to determine who should be called as witnesses, and then adjourned. I think there must be some misunderstanding here. My understanding is that the chairman normally decides who the witnesses will be. That, to my knowledge, is certainly the practice. If that is not the case, then I have been very unobservant during the twelve years I have been here.

Senator Langlois: But the chairman is in the hands of the committee.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Yuzyk, debate adjourned.

ALBERTA-BRITISH COLUMBIA BOUNDARY BILL, 1974

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Prowse for the second reading of Bill S-13, respecting the boundary between the Provinces of Alberta and British Columbia.

Senator Macdonald: Honourable senators, I actually moved the adjournment of this debate for Senator O'Leary. I would therefore ask that he speak to it at this time.

Hon. M. Grattan O'Leary: Honourable senators, I am sure this house could engage itself much more usefully than in listening to me on this bill, because frankly I know nothing about it, and there is nothing in the bill itself to enlighten me. I must say, however, that Senator Prowse yesterday made comments concerning the bill which should have been contained in the bill itself.

I have always understood that the preamble to a bill should indicate, to some extent at least, what the bill is about, but this does not happen in this case. In fact, as a masterpiece of concealment, it almost equals the Speech from the Throne.

Let us consider, for example, the third paragraph of the preamble to the bill, which commences in these words: "And whereas it is desirable to establish a boundary commission . . ." Who said it was desirable, and why? What is the sense of using generalities such as that in a preamble to a bill? It is true that Senator Prowse yesterday did, to some extent, say what the bill should have said, and I am merely posing a few questions with respect to this bill.

I am very suspicious of commissions, because they have a talent for self-preservation and self-perpetuation. I remember years ago, when I was in the parliamentary press gallery, we had what was known as a boundary commission on the boundary between Canada and the United States. Year after year an estimate came before the house to pay for the cost of this commission, and invariably the Opposition would ask when the commission would finish its work. There was always the explanation that this would be the last vote; the commission was just on the eve of conclusion. Apparently, however, we were always to be, never blest, and the commission went on and on and on and, in fact, I am not sure that it does not still exist. Yesterday I checked to see if I could find where it is, but was unsuccessful. I referred to that regional directory—and what an astonishing book it is, with all the commissions and various organizations that exist. Do you know that the British Government ran the British Empire, which encircled the globe, and had not one-third of the floor space that we have in Ottawa today?

Senator Greene: That was back in your time.

Senator O'Leary: I do not know what the relevance of the question is, but I invite you when you return to your office, as a matter of curiosity, to take down this book and look at the number of people and organizations with resounding names. When a member of the public service is given a resounding title, a commission, a cubbyhole of an office and a filing cabinet, in no time at all he has an enormous staff and is engaged in empire building.

I should like to ask just why this boundary commission is necessary. I know what a sinuous boundary is, and I can understand it between Alberta and British Columbia. For instance, if an oil well were to be found at the base of Mount Cavell or Mount Eisenhower, whose oil well would it be? However, when a commission is established to determine this sort of question, how does it work, other than doing what is being done now? There are two members, one from British Columbia and one from Alberta, and now we are to have a Canadian commissioner. What is his position in relation to the other two? Is he to be a referee, or an arbitrator? Suppose these disputes, which we are told are anticipated, occur and the two commissioners from the provinces cannot agree. What happens then? Does the Canadian commissioner tell them what to do, and will they accept the telling?

I can see in the future tremendous black headlines in the Vancouver Sun, about British Columbia being imposed upon by a coalition of Alberta and Canada. I can see Mr. Bruce Hutchinson writing about another watershed of history, and I can hear the Premier of Alberta saying he is not going to roll up the map of the province of Alberta to concede something to British Columbia and Canada. Finally, I can just see Mr. Barrett descending on Alberta at the head of 50,000 words.

● (1430)

That is what we will have in this. I can see this commission perpetuating itself almost indefinitely. I will not be alive when this commission finishes its work.

I do not believe in these commissions. In my opinion, Parliament should decide these things, or let the two provinces decide. Surely there is some kind of boundary there now. A "sinuous boundary line" is mentioned. One can well imagine that applying to the Rockies. Surely there is some kind of boundary decided by someone—presumably Alberta or British Columbia. What has happened? Are the mountains moving?

I can understand that at the foot of one of those mountains there could be discovered mineral resources or oil, and I can understand the Premier of Alberta wanting that. But what are we doing? What is Canada doing? I did not know it was the business of Canada to tell the two provinces what their common boundary should be.

We had a dispute between Quebec and Newfoundland about boundaries, and also one between Quebec and Ontario, but those matters were not decided by act of Parliament; they were decided between the provinces concerned, which is the only satisfactory and safe way. I concede that these things can be determined, but we cannot have someone sitting in Ottawa, with the resounding title of chairman of the commission, telling these people who are in dispute what should be done. That does not seem to be either practical or sensible.

The bill does not have any answers to those questions. I congratulate Senator Prowse. He said that if honourable senators had any questions they should present them to him, and he would do his best to answer them. But, frankly, I do not think that even Senator Prowse can provide satisfactory answers to those questions.

These disputes will exist. If oil or minerals are discovered in this terrain—this sinuous terrain—there will be a dispute between the two provinces over ownership. That is understandable. Is the honourable senator telling me that a man sitting in Ottawa, with his filing cabinets and secretaries, is going to tell them what they should do? This bill does not seem sensible. Why is it introduced now? What has happened in the past five years to change the situation between Alberta and British Columbia?

Senator Côté: The price of oil.

Senator Prowse: No, it is not the price of oil.

Senator O'Leary: I am sure the honourable senator will be glad to reply. He is interjecting, but good naturedly and in good fun. However, his remarks are not relevant to this bill. It is a serious matter for the Senate of Canada to say, "We are going to set up a commission." If we do so, it will be for God knows how long. I cannot see how it can determine a real dispute between those two provinces.

Will the commission act as an arbitrator? What happens if the parties refuse to accept arbitration? Will there be a war between Alberta and British Columbia, with Canada declaring neutrality?

I see no sense in this bill. My inclination is to throw it into my waste basket, provided there is room there after today's mail.

Hon. Frederick William Rowe: Honourable senators, I had not intended to speak on this bill. However, I wish to make one minor point with reference to the eloquent remarks of Senator O'Leary. It has to do with the boundary dispute between Newfoundland and Quebec. That was not a dispute between two provinces, as I am sure the honourable senator knows. It was a dispute between two independent entities of the British Commonwealth.

Senator Flynn: No. I am sorry. One was independent; the other was very dependent.

Senator Rowe: I understand Senator Flynn's comment. However, it was recognized as a dispute between Canada and Newfoundland. Newfoundland at that time was an independent entity. By joint agreement, the matter was referred to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the early 1920s. Senator Goldenberg may recall the date. I think it was in 1926. The Privy Council brought down its decision, which delineated the boundary of that part of Labrador which belonged to Newfoundland. That boundary was accepted in the Terms of Union in 1949. There has been no dispute between Quebec and Newfoundland—

Senator Flynn: I do not think you should go into that.

Hon. J. Harper Prowse: If no other honourable senator wishes to speak to this bill, I shall answer the questions raised by Senator O'Leary and close the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator Prowse speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Senator Prowse: Honourable senators, this is not a commission such as other commissions that have been appointed, even though it is called a commission. The governments of Alberta, British Columbia and Canada have agreed that the commission shall consist of the surveyors general or the directors of surveys—whatever the titles may be—of the two provinces and the federal government.

At present, strip mining operations are taking place along the border of southern Alberta and southern British Columbia.

The sinuous boundary was established under the British North America Act which created British Columbia a province in 1871. That act defined the sinuous boundary as the height of land separating the waters which flow into the Pacific from those which flow elsewhere. It follows a zigzag course which from time to time can be changed by landslides or other natural events. There is no problem once we leave that area and get into the straight line of the 120th meridian, which has been determined by surveys.

Both provinces have passed legislation similar to this bill, which was declared by them to come into effect in June of this year. We were unable to pass the complementary federal legislation because of the intervening general election.

It was agreed that the three acts should read in precisely the same way, their purpose being to prevent the sort of thing to which Senator O'Leary referred. Before reaching a situation where someone finds an oil well on what looks like the present boundary line, and an argument follows as to whom it belongs, boundary points will be set up changing the sinuous line on the map to a series of straight lines. There will be a series of straight lines which, in a sense, will form a zigzag line, if I may put it that way. Survey monuments will be established. So there will be no dispute over where the boundary line is located. This should eliminate the possibility of arguments.

● (1440)

That is the intent of this bill. Whether it will work in practice, I would not undertake to guarantee.

Senator Macdonald: May I ask the sponsor of the bill a question? Under clause 6 of the bill is it not necessary that the Lieutenant Governors in Council of the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia approve the recommendations of the commission before the Governor in Council can declare the boundary line as being that which is recommended by the commission?

Senator Prowse: As I interpret it, there must be agreement between the two provinces. The provinces themselves will have to fight it out.

Originally, the eastern boundary of British Columbia was set by the British North America Act, and the western boundary of Alberta, as set by the Alberta Act in 1875, was said to be the eastern boundary of British Columbia. That is what is causing the difficulty at this juncture. This bill will give Alberta equal bargaining status with British Columbia.

The provincial governments will have to settle the matter, following which the federal government will enter into it. If the provinces cannot come to agreement, they might agree to the federal surveyor being the arbitrator to determine whose survey is correct. These people are not politicians, but technical people, and if they both conduct their surveys properly they will not disagree.

Senator Macdonald: I have one further question. In his remarks yesterday, Senator Prowse said:

—the costs of the resurvey will be borne by the provinces themselves, but the federal government is expected to be responsible for the costs in respect of the inspections, the monuments, the mapping and the meetings of the commission.

If the federal government is to be responsible for any of the costs, does that not make this a money bill which, under our rules, cannot be introduced in the Senate?

Senator Prowse: I was in error in stating that the cost of the monuments would be borne by the federal government. The federal government, as a general practice, does provide maps to the provinces, to which the provinces then add certain things which are of concern to them.

The provinces will bear the costs of the monuments, not the federal government. I was incorrect in making that statement. The federal government will only provide meeting places for the commission and pay the cost of sending the Canadian commissioner to the meetings.

The substantial costs involved, including the establishment and maintenance of survey monuments, and so forth, will be borne by the provinces. There will be minimal costs as far as the federal government is concerned.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Prowse: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that this bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

TELEVISION PROGRAM "LES BEAUX DIMANCHES"— TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE
AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE AND REPORT

Senator Langlois moved pursuant to notice:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to examine and report upon the matter of the program entitled "Les beaux dimanches", televised on 28th April, 1974, on the French network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

He said: Honourable senators, I first raised this matter on May 1, 1974, on a question of privilege, and on May 6, 1974 I moved a motion similar to the one I am moving today. That motion was agreed to, as reported at pages 390 and 391 of Hansard of May 6, 1974.

This motion deals with a program televised on the CBC French network on April 28, 1974. I, along with many other honourable senators, saw that program, and from the comments I have received from all quarters it would seem that there is general agreement that this program was aimed at casting ridicule on the heads of Her Majesty the Queen, the Governor General and our parliamentary system generally. The program depicted a so-called Opening of Parliament with Her Majesty the Queen in attendance, and then went on to depict the introduction to Rideau Hall of His Excellency the Governor General and Madam Léger. From beginning to end, this program cast ridicule on the high offices of the heads of government of our country.

In my opinion, this type of program should be banished from both the French and English networks. It is all well and good for the CBC to insist on Canadian content in its programming, but there is a provision in the Broadcasting Act whereby it has a prime duty to promote the interests of this country. Surely it is not for the CBC to help destroy our most cherished institutions, as did the message conveyed by the television program in question.

● (1450)

For these reasons, honourable senators, I wish the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to study this program, summon the heads of the CBC and CRTC to appear as witnesses, and view the videotape of this program, together with the sound track in French, and a translation of that sound track into English, so that everybody present will get the meaning of the message that was conveyed on our TV network on this occasion.

I know it has been the policy of the CBC to cut to a minimum programs of foreign origin, mainly programs coming from south of the border. However, as I said in this house last year, I would rather see westerns all year round without interruption than see another program of the kind that was presented that evening on the CBC French TV network.

I commend this motion to the favourable consideration of the Senate.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I, of course, support the motion. I merely want to point out that this is yet another illustration of a serious problem that has existed within the CBC from the very beginning. And that problem, I would say, has become much more serious in the last 15 years. I would hope that in dealing with this matter the committee will not be restricted to passing judgment on this program alone.

The object of the CBC should be to offer balanced coverage of public affairs. It should express the views of the public generally—of Canadians all across Canada. There is no doubt but that some people in the CBC have been able to create small empires enabling them to promote certain ideas rather than others, and that they have been more than lax in informing us of the opinions of all segments of the populace on various issues.

There is exaggeration in certain directions, as you very well know. For example—and I use this only as an example—the separatists in Quebec are given the opportunity to express themselves through the CBC to a degree out of all proportion to their importance, numerically or otherwise.

This has been an obvious difficulty with the CBC, and I do not know how, or if, they try to control it. I remember in 1959, when I was in the other place, a committee looked into this and other problems connected with the CBC. I recall very well asking Mr. Ouimet, who was then the head of the CBC, why because some commentators or producers in the CBC had more talent than others they should be given more opportunities than others to express their own political views. You can grasp from that the depth of the problem. At the time we asked Mr. Ouimet about Mr. René Lévesque, who was the commentator on a program called Point de Mire, and he replied, "He has talent." Of course he has talent. He still has talent. But because he has talent should he be allowed to use the CBC, and get paid by the Canadian taxpayers, to express his personal opinions against the wishes or convictions of the great majority in this country? There are other equally talented men who represent other points of view.

I merely wish to point out the complexity of the problem that we are placing before the committee, which I hope will not restrict itself to dealing with only this one incident.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I appreciate the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition. I would welcome the committee's expanding the investigation suggested in my motion, and examining the complete picture of the CBC's programming problems. Although my motion directs the attention of the Senate to one bad egg in the basket, I hope the committee will go to the very bottom of the basket and see what is underneath. I am sure that the chairman of the committee will ensure that this issue is fully considered.

Perhaps I might take this opportunity to suggest that the videotape be shown in the press building, because I am told they have the necessary facilities, including those for translation. Therefore, I suggest that that particular meeting of the committee be held in the press building, which is on Wellington Street facing the Parliament Buildings.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO EXAMINE AND REPORT ON CANADIAN RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES

Hon. George van Roggen, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to examine and report upon Canadian relations with the United States;

That the committee be empowered to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the purpose of the said examination, at such rates of remuneration and reimbursement as the committee may determine, and to compensate witnesses by reimbursement of travelling and living expenses, if required, in such amount as the committee may determine;

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject in the preceding session be referred to the committee; and

That the committee have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: Explain.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, before explaining the motion, I should like to take a moment of your time to pay tribute to the work of Senator John Aird in his capacity as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs for the last number of years. I think all honourable senators will agree that, with the able assistance of Senator Grosart as his deputy, Senator Aird has distinguished himself and brought distinction on the Senate in his role as chairman of that committee.

Senator Aird presided over the Foreign Affairs Committee during its study of Canada-Caribbean relations, on which subject the committee published a report. The committee then followed with a report on Canada's relations with countries of the Pacific region, and most recently it completed its report on Canada's relations with the European Community.

I had the privilege of serving on the committee during only the last of those three studies, but during that time I had ample opportunity to observe the distinguished manner in which Senator Aird chaired that committee, and to observe his work and the effort which he put into making the committee a success.

Although it is difficult to judge the impact and influence of Senate reports, it would seem that the report on the European Economic Community has contributed to the Canadian objective of stronger political and economic links with the European Community.

I can specify four particular aspects of that report as illustrations. First, the European parliament's decision to establish a regular link with the Canadian Parliament. You will recall that our committee made the initial move in requesting a meeting with the European parliamentary delegation when we were in Brussels approximately a year and a half ago. Because of that contact the European parliament made its first formal visit to Canada approximately one year ago on the joint invitation of our committee and the committee in the other place. At that meeting we again pressed for the establishment of a regular parliamentary link, which subsequently was acted upon by the European parliament. The Canadian delegation, of which I will be proud to be a member, will meet with the European parliament in Strasbourg next week as a return engagement.

Secondly, stemming indirectly from our report, which I feel sure had significant influence on it, was the establishment of a European Community office in Canada. You will appreciate that the European Community, as powerful economically as it may be, is not a sovereign state and cannot establish its own embassies, but it has established one or two offices abroad to perform the functions of the European Community's spokesmen in foreign countries. They are designated as "information offices," and one is established in the United States and one in Japan.

We have had a number of contacts with the European community since our first meeting in Brussels, pressing on every occasion this particular link. I am sure many senators noticed the announcement several weeks ago that the European parliament had approved the establishment of an office in Canada, the third industrialized nation in which such an office is to be established. You may have also observed in the remarks made by the Prime Minister on his return from Europe last week the specific reference that such an office would be opened in Canada.

Thirdly, it was recommended in the report of our committee that more research on the European Community be conducted in Canadian universities, and there are now some developments in this connection. A private Canadian foundation, being alerted by the committee's report to the scarcity of research on the European Community in Canadian universities, has decided to fund a study which would remedy this situation.

Fourthly, the report recommended that the Prime Minister should visit Brussels, not as a visit to Belgium but as a visit to the headquarters of the European Community. As you know, this visit took place only a week or two ago—following the Prime Minister's successful visit to France—with very satisfactory results for Canada. While the committee could not take full credit for these developments, I think it is still of significance that all four of those developments were included in the report of the committee on the European Community published in July of last year.

Honourable senators, I have digressed from my motion to deal with some of the work of the committee in its last report, partly to reinforce my remarks on the effectiveness of the work done by Senator Aird and partly to remind you of the work of this committee in the past, in the hope that you will agree that the work has been sufficiently effective that the committee should receive your support in the next task which it now plans to undertake.

This task was embarked upon last year and, of course, a study of Canada-U.S. relations is an enormous subject. Before the dissolution of Parliament in early May we had barely taken an introductory look at the whole relationship to see if we could grasp the optional directions for Canada's policies. This was to give us, first of all, an overview. We had just begun to look into the second aspect of this vast and complex problem, the ways in which our relationship with the United States is worked out—the machinery, the instruments for conducting relations, the institutions which exist for this purpose—when the election intervened.

I shall not take the time of honourable senators now to develop at length the areas in which we think this study should develop. They are numerous, and it is a study which will probably required not one but several reports on its various components. I would say only this, that these terms of reference which I have outlined are basically the same as those obtained from you by Senator Aird last March when it was first proposed that we should launch into this new study. Here I would quote from his remarks to the Senate on March 26 of this year, when he said in part:

Why do I think that the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs is capable of, and the appropriate forum for, such an inquiry? Honourable senators, I believe that the competence of the committee is now reasonably established. I believe that its previous reports on Canada's relations with the Caribbean, the Pacific Rim, and, most recently, the European Community, have had a positive public response—particularly in the press and the Canadian business community, which apparently have found these reports both timely and useful. I believe this to be particularly true of our recent report on the European Community. The European Community report has not only been well debated in this chamber, but used as a basic document by other institutions, conferences and seminars since its issue last July.

After further developing his motion, Senator Aird went on to say:

This brings me to my second question, of how your committee proposes to undertake such a formidable task—and I repeat these words—constructively and very carefully. I believe that the tentative program approved last week by your committee is a logical and careful plan.

Honourable senators, I would ask for your support of these terms of reference for the committee to continue its study of Canada-United States relations.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I agree generally with what the mover of this motion has said, but I think the motion is in a context that requires some thought, and I would therefore move the adjournment of the debate.

● (2020)

Senator Walker: In the meantime, has Senator Aird resigned from the chairmanship of the committee?

Senator van Roggen: Yes. I was elected chairman the week before last.

Senator Walker: You have been elected, have you?

Senator van Roggen: Yes.

Senator Walker: I was just wondering—and I say this with all humility—what qualifications you have to take over.

Senator Croll: He is a Liberal.

Senator Walker: He is a Liberal, is he?

Hon. George McIlraith: Honourable senators, before the motion for the adjournment of the debate is put, I should like to say a few words.

[Senator van Roggen.]

I am heartily in support of Senator van Roggen's motion, and I agree that the committee has a formidable task before it. It is not only a formidable task, but a task which has, in my view, some urgency about it. However, I wish to put forward another matter for possible consideration by that committee when it completes the task which is the subject of the motion now before the house.

This is something I raised on two occasions in 1973—once on January 11, 1973 in the debate on the Address in reply to the Throne Speech, and again on March 22, 1973 when I called the attention of the Senate to the Eighteenth General Conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, held at Blantyre, Malawi. It concerned the desirability at some point of having this committee—whose work in my opinion has won the respect of the Senate and of the outside community—examine into our relations, particularly, with South Africa and East Africa. It is my view that long-term attempts to secure universal peace require a thorough understanding of those countries. I am not satisfied that the United Nations has proposed adequate or reasonable solutions to some very difficult problems which affect that part of the world. In my opinion, our acceptance of the view put forward by the United Nations, in all its simplicity, is not adequate. It may well be that an initiative on our part will be required if we correctly foresee some of the problems that may develop out of what is a tense situation there. I suggest that the committee should consider examining this subject when it completes the task that will be before it when the present motion is adopted.

It is rather interesting to note that since I raised this question in the early part of 1973, news items concerning events in that part of the world have improved significantly. The media, instead of repeating all the propaganda that is published, are reporting the news in a more objective fashion. To my mind, an impartial study of Africa by the committee would be to the long-term benefit of us all. There is a tendency when discussing such things as race relations for emotions to rule and reason to depart. I am afraid that many news items critical of Africa still reflect the emotions of the writers, but I am happy to say that the information we are now getting is much more objective, and this indicates some progress.

Considerable change is taking place. I do not want to go into the subject in detail tonight, but wish merely to suggest that the committee consider undertaking this task when its study of Canada-United States relations is completed.

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, I had the honour and good fortune to be the member of this house chosen to participate in the deliberations of the Twenty-eighth General Assembly of the United Nations. I rise merely to say that I concur entirely with what Senator McIlraith has said concerning attitudes towards Africa, and the function or role of the United Nations there. I endorse his views completely.

This is a very difficult and delicate situation, and it is not being dealt with as though it were a difficult and delicate subject in the various bodies of the United Nations which have directed their attention to it. It would be a great thing if it were possible for a Senate committee to make some contribution.

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, it might be peculiarly appropriate just now because, judging from a couple of articles in the last issue of the Manchester Guardian Weekly, there are signs of some rapprochement between the Government of South Africa and the Government of Zambia in particular, which hold out some hopes of considerable change in the policy of the South African government and considerable willingness on the part of the Zambian government, and possibly some other black African governments, to get into some kind of fruitful discussion with the Government of South Africa.

A very notable speech, I think, which was made at the United Nations by the South African representative, Mr. Botha, has stirred up a considerable amount of speculation about the possibility of some very important changes in the internal policy as well as the foreign policy of the Government of South Africa.

Senator Flynn: May I remind the house that I had moved the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL CAPITAL REGION

PROPOSED STUDY BY JOINT COMMITTEE—QUESTION

Senator McIlraith: I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he can advise us as to when the motion to establish a joint committee of this house and the House of Commons to consider questions relating to the future of the National Capital Region, as set out in the Throne Speech, will be brought forward for consideration?

Senator Perrault: I can assure all honourable senators that the matter is now under active consideration by the government, and it is hoped that an announcement will be made in due course. In any case, I shall undertake appropriate inquiries, and make known any further information I am able to obtain.

Senator McIlraith: I would further ask the Leader of the Government if he can advise us whether or not the terms of reference for that committee have yet been settled, or are still open?

Senator Perrault: The terms of reference are also under consideration at the present time. As I say, hopefully this information can be made available very shortly.

● (2030)

Senator Croll: That is like the kind of answers you gave when you were minister, Senator McIlraith.

Senator Flynn: May I ask the Leader of the Government a question? Will Mr. Fullerton's report be included in the terms of reference?

Senator Croll: It will have to be.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not want to make any further statements at this time.

Senator Grosart: Very wise.

Senator Forsey: Let us hope it won't be Hamlet without the Prince of Denmark.

IMMIGRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, October 31, the debate on the motion of Senator Laird for the second reading of Bill S-12, to amend the Immigration Act.

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I am glad this bill has not been rushed, especially because it was initiated in this chamber.

Senator Grosart: Hear, hear!

Senator Yuzyk: The observations of Senators Flynn, Grosart, Croll, Molson, Greene, Buckwold, Thompson, Asselin and Bélisle should be carefully considered by the sponsor of the bill, Senator Laird, and the committee. The government is about to release a green paper on the proposed new Canadian immigration policy, portions of which have already leaked out revealing rather drastic changes, some of a highly controversial nature. I do not think it would be wise at this time for the Senate to proceed too hastily with what amounts to a minor amendment to the Immigration Act, bearing in mind that the government will soon be submitting a major overhaul of the act, or perhaps a new act. However, while we are considering the amendment proposed in Bill S-12 now before this chamber, I should like to touch on one aspect which has not been raised thus far, at least not from the viewpoint I shall endeavour to present.

This proposed amendment points up a discrepancy between the spirit of the law and the letter of the law. The spirit of the law indicates that once a person is deported, he must stay out of the country until the federal government, or rather the responsible minister, states that he may come back in. The letter of the law, however, does not give clear effect to the legislative intent.

Let us look at section 35 of the act, which is the heart of the problem. Section 35 says that once deported a person may not "be admitted" anew without the minister's permission. Let us note that it does not say that a deportee cannot turn up at a border crossing physically to test whether or not he will be re-admitted, or that he may, for example, wish to attend his brother's funeral. Also, the act does not make it binding upon a deportee to make it known to an immigration officer that he is a deportee. So, if the deported person gets back into the country without having to lie about who he is and whether or not he is a deportee, he cannot be prosecuted for offending against any part of the act. All that can be done is to deport him again.

The present amendment makes it an offence for the deportee to return to Canada, for whatever reason, without the consent of the minister. In this instance, "return" is the operative word. This would mean that the minute he sets foot in Canada without the minister's permission, he will be guilty of a punishable offence and liable to imprisonment for two years or to a fine of up to $500. Would this not be a very severe punishment for what could be regarded as good intentions? I wonder whether this could not be more simply done by making the actual deportation order more explicit. I have a copy of a deportation order, which reads:

On the basis of evidence adduced at the further examination/inquiry held . . . I have reached the decision that you may not come into or remain in Canada as of right . . . I hereby order you to be detained and to be deported.

The words "you may not come into" seem quite clear to me. But perhaps it would be clearer if the word "return" were used in the deportation order, to read thus: "You may not return to or remain in Canada." Would not the substitution of "return" for "come into" be more fair to non-criminal deportees who may later qualify for entry into Canada after seeing an immigration officer on Canadian soil? I am no lawyer, but I would not regard it as an offence for someone to see an immigration officer, which gesture then should not be judged as "returning." In such a case, if the deportation order is very clearly worded, the deportee would not be flaunting the law.

Granted, if such an order has to be clearly backed up by statute, section 35 of the act will have to be amended. As it stands now it is not clear, for it does allow for the situation already described. However, if the order can be used to further define the intent of that section of the act, then could not the deportation order be simply reworded and thus avoid unreasonable prosecutions? Should not some provision be made that a deportee must declare himself as such when he sees an immigration officer?

Those are the points I wanted to raise in connection with this bill and on which I should like to have explanations. It would be very useful to have the minister and departmental officials appear before the Committee on Foreign Affairs to explain the implications of this bill.

Hon. Keith Laird: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator Laird speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Senator Laird: This debate has been of unexpected length, but it has been instructive and enjoyable. The only thing that worries me at all is that I detect the groundswell of a movement to bar me from ever again sponsoring a simple bill.

Senator Walker: Tut, tut.

Senator Laird: Several interesting points have been raised, but it is not my intention to go into a great deal of detail at this time. It is perfectly clear that it is the wish of the Senate that this bill be referred to committee. However, as Senator Croll has said, the Senate is entitled to at least some sort of reply from the sponsor to the questions raised, and I propose to do just that.

● (2040)

For example, Senator Croll asked about various statistics. I had to admit, frankly, that there were not any, but it seems that Senator Croll's observation had the effect of getting the department to produce some. However, I am afraid those statistics are not all that helpful to us. They have to do with the overall number of deportations only and do not specify, for example, the number of persons who have been deported, have returned, and have been deported again. Moreover, the only figures available so far are for 1973—they have not yet been able to produce the 1972 figures—and for the first eight months of 1974. In 1973 there were 7,110 people deported; in the first eight months of 1974 there were 7,401 deportations. As I say, those are rather meagre statistics and are not of much help; but there they are for what they are worth.

Another point discussed in the course of this debate was that of alternative methods of proceeding under the proposed new section 35.1—that is, whether it should be by way of indictment or by way of summary conviction. I cannot add much to what I said when I introduced this measure, except to point out that in the legislation passed by Parliament there are literally hundreds of cases where there is a choice between proceeding by way of indictment, in which event the punishment is more severe, and by way of summary conviction, in which case, obviously, the penalty is less severe. It has been established through time that these alternative methods of proceeding are satisfactory. Someone has to take the responsibility of deciding which way to proceed and, consequently, what punishment is likely to be visited upon the offender.

Ancillary to that, the suggestion was made that the jail term, in the event of conviction by indictment, had to be two years. As I said at the time, and I believe others said it as well, there is no necessity for imposing a two-year sentence. That is a matter of discretion. The sentence may be as long as two years, but it may be as short as an hour, I suppose.

Senator Thompson raised a question with respect to section 35.1. He asked what would happen if a deportee were to put in an appeal which was allowed. He wanted to know what complications would arise out of that situation. Well, in the event of an application by way of appeal from a deportation order, normally, under section 31(1) of the Immigration Act, the filing of the appeal has the effect of staying the deportation order. Therefore, the person is allowed to remain in the country. However, there is a special provision in that section dealing with people who come from the United States, and from St. Pierre and Miquelon. They are returned to their country of origin. In all other cases the persons making the appeals are allowed to remain in the country. If such persons voluntarily depart from the country, however, they cannot then re-enter, as that would be an offence under section 35.1. Under section 16 of the Immigration Appeal Board Act, which is a different act, the Immigration Appeal Board may allow persons to return to Canada pending the hearing of their appeals.

Incidentally, section 11 of the Immigration Appeal Board Act restricts the right of appeal from a deportation order to a fairly narrow class. Not everybody has a right of appeal. Section 11 sets out the classes of persons who can appeal; it certainly does not include everybody. I do not know that that is particularly important to this debate, but there it is.

Perhaps the most pertinent criticism of this measure—a criticism made by Senator Asselin, and supplemented tonight by Senator Yuzyk—was that the present state of the law is such that there is no need to add to the act the proposed new section 35.1. Senator Asselin made a good case for the proposition that there are at least three sections—two in the Immigration Act and one in the Criminal Code—which enable the department to proceed in the event that such an offence as contemplated by section 35.1 were to take place.

In answer to that, let me say that the section in the Criminal Code is a catch-all section. The section in the Immigration Act—

Senator Asselin: Sections 35 and 46.

Senator Laird: No, I want to deal with section 46 later.

Senator Asselin: Section 48.

Senator Laird: Yes, section 48. That is also a catch-all section. Those catch-all sections, as any lawyer will tell you, are most difficult to prosecute under. Actually, if they had a choice, most lawyers—and that would include me—would much prefer to act for the defence in those circumstances, because there is always the difficulty for the prosecution of proving every detail in connection with the offence alleged, which is a general breach of some other statute.

What is far more important, however, is that the lawyers in the Department of Justice have considered those two sections—and, I may add, also section 46(b) of the Immigration Act—and they have come to the conclusion that it is too risky to proceed under them. They believe that the chances of a successful defence under them are far too good and that, therefore, those sections are not suitable for the purpose of this bill, which, as I said at the beginning, is to add to the punishment visited on a deportee who comes back into the country.

The difficulty with respect to section 46(b), which was mentioned by Senator Asselin, is in proving what is “stealth.” This is what I am told is concerning the lawyers in the Department of Justice. In other words, as Senator Yuzyk pointed out a few minutes ago, when a person comes to the border and asks to be admitted into Canada to attend his uncle’s funeral, or something like that, the chances of his being asked if he ever had a deportation order against him are almost nil.

• (2050)

I do not know what other senators have experienced, but I have crossed the border literally thousands of times, and never once have I been asked, “Is there a deportation order against you?” Section 35 of the act uses the word, “admitted,” and this is what is bothering the departmental lawyers. They are thinking, “Yes, admitted. But he didn’t lie; he said he was going to his uncle’s funeral.”

Senator Flynn: Have they ever tried to prosecute someone who comes into Canada after having been subject to a deportation order? He should know that he is coming against the will of the minister and the order made against him. Has there been any case of that kind?

Senator Laird: No. Naturally, like the good lawyer you are, you would be concerned. I inquired about it, and frankly the reason is that the Department of Justice lawyers are apprehensive that they could not get a conviction.

Senator Flynn: But they should try.

Senator Laird: Well should they? First of all, it would seem that everyone who has spoken in this debate feels there is a missing link, that there is nothing in the act which takes care of it. As I said when I introduced the bill last Wednesday, it is true that under section 35 as it stands, a person who comes back into the country after being deported can be deported again—

Senator Flynn: No, no. We are just suggesting that if the minister orders someone to get out, that person should know he is going against the order if he returns.

Senator Laird: Yes, of course, he should, but unfortunately, as you know only too well, you have to put sanctions on some things—

Senator Flynn: A presumption?

Senator Laird: —or some people ignore them. The departmental lawyers feel they are unable to secure a conviction under any of the sections mentioned by Senator Asselin, and therefore they want something specific in the act, and it is this proposed clause 35.1 of the bill, which enables a prosecution to take place and a punishment to be visited.

I am told—and here again I presume all honourable senators have had occasion to read about these cases—that in some of the larger cities like Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver, there have been many instances of very undesirable characters being deported, coming back into the country and engaging in criminal activities here, then simply being deported again and going through the cycle just about as many times as they feel like it. We want to stop this.

Senator Flynn: I object. You say, “engaging in criminal activities here.” If you can prove that they are engaging in criminal activities you can put them in jail for longer terms than are provided in this bill.

Senator Laird: That is correct. Sometimes it is well known, without being proven, that a person has engaged in criminal activity, and our legislation should provide for punishment when such a person returns to Canada in spite of a deportation order against him. I don't know if you agree with that proposition, but in the opinion of the Department of Justice lawyers—and I agree with them—the present legislation is certainly not enough to enable a conviction in those circumstances. But, if we pass this bill, enacting this section, there will be power to throw these people in jail—

Senator Flynn: Are you sure? Would you be more sure than you are now?

Senator Laird: Under this section, yes. It is very pertinent.

Honourable senators, I do not intend to add anything further tonight, for this bill will be going to committee and there will be ample opportunity to question witnesses in detail. However, I did feel that in closing this debate I should draw to your attention that this section is needed for the simple reason that the departmental lawyers feel that at the present time there is no legislative basis upon which to prosecute a person who having been deported, returns to this country. That is all I have to say, unless there are questions—or perhaps you would rather ask the experts in committee.

Senator Walker: You are doing very well.

Senator Bélisle: I should like to ask a question. If there are no records in the Department of Justice or in the Department of Manpower and Immigration to show that informations have been prepared and people brought to court, is it not because there has been no necessity for it?

[Senator Laird.]

Senator Laird: That would be a good point if it were valid. I cannot prove it by statistics, but all I know is that people are not discouraged from returning to Canada in the face of further deportation orders. Therefore, the act should provide for punishment by way of fine or imprisonment.

Senator Thompson: Would not this problem be overcome if the deportation order contained words to the effect, “It will be considered an act of stealth if you return to Canada without permission of the minister”? As I understand it, if there is stealth in the action, then the person who slipped in again would be subject to prosecution. Would that not meet this need?

Senator Laird: I think it might, but I don't know. It is much too difficult a question for me to answer tonight. We would not know whether it was effective until after the matter had been taken to court and a judgment rendered. I suggest that rather than complicating things by trying that method, we should try the direct method of enacting section 35.1.

● (2100)

Senator Grosart: Did the honourable senator say that no figures whatsoever are available as to the number of deportees in the year 1972, and that no figures whatsoever are available as to the number of deportees who may have sought or obtained re-entry into Canada after being deported. Did I understand that correctly?

Senator Laird: You understood quite correctly, senator. I too was amazed. To be quite honest, I think the figures should exist.

Senator Grosart: Then I wonder if I could ask the honourable sponsor if he would tell us at some time why these figures are not available. It seems utterly incomprehensible—indeed, incredible—that we should at this particular time not know the number of people deported from Canada in the year 1972. Why are these figures not available? Are we trying to hide something? There were just over 7,000 people deported in 1973, according to the figures given us, and in the first eight months of 1974 there were 7,401 people deported. We are now told that the Department of Justice and the Department of Immigration has no knowledge whatsoever of the number of people deported from Canada in 1972.

Secondly, we have no figures whatsoever as to the number of people who may be affected by the application of this amendment to the act. Surely we must be told whether there are five, 10, 20 or more people so affected.

Therefore, I would ask the honourable sponsor of this bill to ask those who will be appearing before the committee to let us have an explanation of this extraordinary situation whereby we do not know the dimension of the problem—the number of people concerned—that is to be met by this very important and controversial amendment.

I would further ask him if he has any knowledge—and I can only put it that way in view of the answer I had the other evening from the Deputy Leader of the Government—as to whether the chairman of the committee, or the committee itself, has decided to ask the minister to appear.

Senator Langlois: That is a different question from the one you asked the other night. Then you wanted an assurance.

Senator Laird: First of all, senator, in answer to your first question concerning statistics, I asked the departmental officials the very question you have now posed, and the answer I got was, "We should have them, but we have been delayed because we are in the process of changing system."

Senator Grosart: No, not that, please.

Senator Laird: That is the answer they gave me.

As to the minister's being a witness, frankly I would say that that is up to the chairman or the deputy chairman of the committee. I might mention that the Honourable Robert Andras, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, is not a lawyer, and this amendment is primarily a legal proposition, so I do not know whether he would be helpful.

Senator Flynn: Oh, oh!

Senator Grosart: Lest my question should be misunderstood, let me make it clear that I was not suggesting that he be called as a legal expert. I was suggesting that he be called as the minister responsible for the department, and for a bill amending an act administered by his department. This is a situation which automatically means that we are concerned with policy.

Senator Laird: On that very interesting point, I would suggest that the field of this bill is rather narrow. On the question of immigration policy, the situation is quite different because that is a widespread and extremely absorbing topic. Under the proper conditions, whether it is in connection with a bill resulting from the green paper or otherwise, and if I were the chairman or deputy chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, I would certainly want the minister to appear. In fact, if I can help at that stage I shall do so.

By the way, honourable senators, I forgot to mention, in connection with the point raised by Senator Yuzyk to the effect that the government would soon be bringing in a new bill, that, frankly, I do not think it will be soon. As I understand it, the whole purpose of the green paper, when it is finally tabled, is to enable a wide discussion to take place and then, after that discussion and the obtaining of diverse views, to introduce a bill. I think that is an event which is still some little distance in the future.

Senator Grosart: We will have a green paper, a white paper and then a red paper.

Senator Langlois: And lastly a blue one.

Senator Grosart: That will be a few years.

Senator Desruisseaux: Honourable senators, I should like to put a question to Senator Laird. Is it possible to find out what has been paid for the deportation of these people from Canada? I think in each case the deportation has to be paid for—it is not done for free—and surely there is a record of the money spent for deporting these people from Canada. Would not the department have such a record?

Senator Laird: I would say it does. As to the matter of payment of the costs of deportation, to be quite honest with you I do not know the answer to that. However, the question is now in Hansard, and I will see that it is brought to the attention of the appropriate departmental officials.

Senator Grosart: May I ask the honourable senator another question? If there is no list available of those deported in 1972, how are our immigration officers to know, in the case of somebody who was deported in 1972 and who now returns, that that person is subject to this new section? If they don't know who was deported in 1972, does that mean that everybody who was deported in that year can return to Canada?

Senator Laird: I would say that there are complete records of every person deported, but the one thing they have not done, apparently, is to reduce those records to the statistical form being sought.

Senator Grosart: It is too difficult to add them up.

Senator Flynn: Question.

Senator Walker: You did very well.

Senator Flynn: Blind answers.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Laird, seconded by the Honourable Senator Carter, that this bill be now read the second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Flynn: With reluctance.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Laird: I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs. If I might just add a word to that, I would merely express the hope that the committee will be able to proceed with this bill on Thursday.

Senator van Roggen: It is my hope, honourable senators, that we will be able to go ahead with it immediately.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE AND REPORT ON CANADIAN RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator van Roggen:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to examine and report upon Canadian relations with the United States;

That the committee be empowered to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the purpose of the said examination, at such rates of remuneration and reimbursement as the committee may determine, and to compensate witnesses by reimbursement of travelling and living expenses, if required, in such amount as the committee may determine;

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject in the preceding session be referred to the committee; and

That the committee have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I shall not detain you long. I merely wish to make a few remarks in answer to what Senator van Roggen had to say in support of this motion.

As I mentioned yesterday, I do not contest the substance of this motion. The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs has done an excellent job in recent years; in fact, it acquired a reputation for outstanding work quite some time ago. We passed a motion in the previous session to study the problem of Canada's relations with the United States, and the committee actually started hearing witnesses. It is therefore only logical that this motion be adopted now to enable the committee to resume its work. I wish it well.

Senator Croll: Best speech of the day!

Motion agreed to.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

SIXTY-FIRST ANNUAL CONFERENCE, TOKYO, JAPAN—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat rose pursuant to notice:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Sixty-first Annual Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union held in Tokyo, Japan, 2nd to 11th October, 1974, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Conference and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, it is my pleasure today to report on the recent trip to Tokyo of the Inter-Parliamentary Union group from Canada. At that particular conference there were three members of the Senate—Senator Robichaud, Senator Asselin and myself—who were selected for the group along with members from the other place representing three of the parties there.

I hope that my comments will not be in terms of a travelogue. I do have some rather general comments to make at the outset and then I should like to draw the attention of the Senate to some of the problems I see in the Inter-Parliamentary Union, and some of the actions that I think we ought to take as Canadians as we participate in that body.

At the outset I would like to express the thanks of our whole delegation to the staff members who were involved in the preparations for this conference. There were some problems this year because the election delayed the formation of the committee. Then there was the period before the opening of Parliament, during which time it was not easy to assemble people and get returns from those who might be interested. As a result, the time was somewhat short, but the Inter-Parliamentary Relations Branch, and Miss Jean Macpherson, who is particularly responsible for the IPU, responded marvellously and organized a fine agenda for us, preparing in advance a great deal of material.

I must express my thanks as well to Mr. Peter Dobell, Director of the Parliamentary Centre for Foreign Affairs and Foreign Trade. As honourable senators know, that is an independent non-profit organization, and it was invaluable in making the preparations for the trip.

This year the conference was held in Japan, and I think this was particularly fitting, from a Canadian standpoint, for a number of reasons. The first of these is our very close and important commercial relationship with that country. Our trade is growing every year with the Japanese, and our relationships with them are becoming ever closer. It was fortunate that just prior to the trip to Japan the Prime Minister of that country, Mr. Tanaka, was received here in Canada on his first visit. It was, I believe, a very successful visit. This permitted as well, from the standpoint of the IPU delegation, some useful contacts. For example, some other Japanese people and parliamentarians were here at that time. The IPU received, in particular, Mr. Kono, one of the parliamentarians. The Canadian Ambassador to Japan, His Excellency Ross Campbell, came here during the preparations for the visit. This provided an opportunity for the Canadian delegation to meet with His Excellency and get a very useful early briefing on the Japanese situation vis-à-vis Canada, and a great deal of background which we could not have obtained otherwise. This was combined with two days of briefing here in Ottawa during the recess and, in my opinion, the Department of External Affairs outdid themselves in assisting with the arrangements for our trip. As a result, we arrived in Japan very much better prepared than we otherwise would have been.

I must give particular credit and thanks to our ambassador and his staff, who assisted us in every possible way when we reached Japan. We arrived late on the Monday afternoon, and we received a thorough briefing from them at the embassy on the Tuesday morning.

There is one particular item I should like to point out, because it covers a procedure that we might consider useful to adopt in the future. Because we were dealing with Japan, and because of our commercial relationships with that country, we were able, through our ambassador and his staff, to organize meetings entirely apart from the IPU meeting itself. Members of the Canadian delegation were invited to indicate areas of particular interest in respect of which they would like to meet their opposite numbers in the government and the public service of Japan.

We were able to organize meetings on energy, a subject in which Japan has a particular interest and about which we share an equal concern; iron and steel, in which we complement each other in certain respects for commercial reasons; education, environment and pollution, which are obviously items of major concern in Japan; and management and labour. Some of our members were particularly interested in finding out how the Japanese aim to cope with the fantastic inflation they are experiencing, which now runs at the rate of 25 per cent per annum. This was of particular interest in so far as it related to labour-management matters.

The embassy had organized, for those members of our delegation interested in these fields, meetings with parliamentarians, civil servants and people in industry. These were useful contacts for us. In my own particular case, in company with my colleague, Senator Robichaud, we met with those responsible for matters related to the environment and pollution. As an aside, I might add that they have an interesting governmental structure. They have a deputy minister (administration), who is a civil servant, and a deputy minister (political), who is a member of the Japanese Diet. These two deputy ministers operate side by side within the department, thereby assuring a very close association between the elected members on the one hand and the civil servants on the other. I mention this because it is an interesting concept, particularly as one hears so often in Canada remarks about parliamentarians feeling that sometimes it appears that civil servants run the whole operation.

I mention these as examples of the type of meetings we had. They were extremely useful to Senator Robichaud and to me, because they enabled us to find out what they were doing. Because we have such close commercial relations with Japan, this was an ideal occasion for getting information. It might not be that for every trip or every visit of the IPU this type of program could be arranged, but it was extremely useful in this case, and I want to express my thanks to the Canadian ambassador and his staff for arranging these meetings for us.

The Canadian delegation was equally impressed with the reception given to it by the Japanese people. We found the Japanese extremely courteous, pleasant and helpful. There was no problem for any one of us in travelling anywhere we wished—in Tokyo or even on the odd occasion outside Tokyo. There was no concern about language or about how we would be received, because everywhere people came forward voluntarily if they saw we were in any difficulty. In any situation where a problem might arise, someone always came forward to assist. A surprising number of Japanese speak English, and all in all it was a most enjoyable experience.

The Japanese group who organized the whole conference equally deserve to be congratulated. The physical arrangements were beyond reproach, everything seemed to work in perfect order. When a bus was supposed to be there, it was there; whatever was supposed to happen, happened. On top of that, the whole social side was almost too much for us. There was reception after reception. We were received by the Prime Minister himself, by the Speakers of both houses, by the Japanese IPU group and by the Governor of Tokyo. As a very special recognition of the IPU, there was a visit to the Imperial Palace and a reception by the Emperor himself. We could not have asked for a better reception on the part of the Japanese people.

I turn now to the specific resolutions which were under discussion at that meeting. As those honourable senators who have been involved previously with the IPU will know, there are basically two meetings per year. First is the spring meeting, which might be termed the drafting meeting. At that point the purpose is to draft resolutions to be discussed at the subsequent fall meeting. The resolutions that came before us, and that were finally adopted, I have here in both languages. I had originally considered asking to have them included as an appendix to Hansard, until I looked at the cost; that being what it is, I will not ask. However, I shall be happy to make copies available for any honourable senators who may be interested in particular resolutions.

The first subject discussed was the limitation and cessation of the armaments race, and the disarmament question. The second was the situation in the Middle East. In connection with that resolution, the Canadian representative, who was my colleague Senator Asselin, was a member of the drafting committee. The third was the problem of torture in the world. The fourth was the energy crisis.

The fifth subject was termed "Population Trends and Economic and Social Development." That is a change in title, and I refer to this specifically because of Her Honour the Speaker. The previous title for that resolution was

"Economic and Social Consequences of the World Population Explosion." That particular title was adopted at the spring meeting, in Bucharest, when our present Speaker was a Canadian delegate. She was specifically responsible at that stage on the Canadian side for putting forward this matter of the world population explosion. She certainly has great knowledge in this particular field, judging by the reaction I observed on the part of the delegates we met in Tokyo. Many of them asked about her on this occasion, having been impressed by the presentation she had made at the Bucharest meeting and by her participation at that time. I explained to them that she had risen to a higher position, and then they accepted the fact that she was not representing Canada at the Tokyo meeting, and my presence instead.

The IPU met in Bucharest in April. Subsequently, the United Nations Conference on World Population was held in that same city. As a result of that conference, there is a new approach and attitude toward the problem of world population. The term "explosion" does not adequately present the problem in terms of each country. Certain countries may be faced with bursting populations, while others may not. It was the view of the conference that it is more a matter of national responsibility, that there are great variations of population growth within nations. The title, in its original form, was not considered suitable, hence the change. Here again the Canadian delegation played an active part, as the Canadian delegate was a member of the drafting committee on that resolution.

● (1420)

This was one of the two resolutions for which there were drafting committees, and Canada was represented on both. The other resolutions did not need drafting committees.

The sixth resolution was on the education of youth, with a view to international understanding, cooperation and peace.

The seventh resolution suggested a study of principles and measures to eliminate racial discrimination, particularly apartheid.

Those seven resolutions were discussed at the April meeting in Bucharest, and had come forward as formal resolutions at the Tokyo conference. In Tokyo, there was a request from two countries to include further resolutions. Bulgaria presented a draft resolution, and a request for discussion, on the situation in Chile. Mexico presented a draft resolution on the interference by government agencies in the affairs of other countries.

It was agreed that those two resolutions be included. The Canadian delegation was in agreement, although it had certain reservations about the inclusion, at the last moment, of further items. This is something which should be considered by the Canadian group, namely, the position that Canada should take on such matters of procedure. Obviously we do not wish to prevent discussion of some immediate subject, but the inclusion at the last moment of new subjects frequently means, as it did on this occasion, that discussion on others has to be cut down, evening meetings have to be set up, and so on. There is no problem in having extra work. In fact, we had extra work. There were evening meetings. But delegates who came prepared to speak on certain subjects subsequently found that the time allocated to those subjects had been greatly reduced.

However, the addition of those two resolutions was agreed upon. There was a drafting committee in connection with one of them, but the Canadian delegation was not represented on it. Of the total of nine resolutions presented, three had drafting committees, the Canadian delegation participating in two of them. It is fair to say that the Canadian delegation did its work at the Tokyo meeting. Members of the delegation had responsibilities connected with specific subjects. If honourable senators have any questions with regard to the resolutions, I shall be happy to respond. As I mentioned, I have copies available.

I wish now to turn to some of the problems in the IPU, and to those points which we as Canadian participants should consider. I was disturbed by a tendency, on the part of special interest groups and of particular countries, to use each resolution as an excuse to push forward a particular point of view. This is a disquieting tendency, and its implications should be discussed by all parliamentarians. For example, in dealing with any of the resolutions before us, we seemed to be unable to get away from the Arab-Israeli question. Regardless of the subject under discussion, whether it was education of youth or apartheid, someone would bring up the question of the Arab-Israeli conflict. The tendency to do this took away from the effective discussions of the basic resolutions, making them simply a mechanism, a mode, for someone to voice a particular grievance. That is not a good thing for the IPU.

The Arab-Israeli question is not a new one; it has been around for some time. A new subject being injected into the discussions is that of the conflict between North Korea and South Korea. Perhaps because of the geographical location of Japan in relation to Korea, there were large delegations from both north and south, and those delegations seemed to be able to inject their dispute into the discussions. Assuming the conflict between North Korea and South Korea to be a serious one—and I am quite prepared to admit that it is—that question should have formed part of a specific resolution. It should not have been injected into other discussions, such as those on the education of youth or apartheid. The practice of bringing up extraneous questions might very well, in the long run, hurt this parliamentary body. People may take the view that if its only purpose is to allow someone to set forth a certain political opinion, it is not a meaningful group.

Another matter that disturbs me is the tendency on the part of certain groups to vote as a bloc. It seems to me that on virtually every issue the communist group voted as one unit, and very often, through the use of some basic items in the resolution, were able to gain the support of many of the African states, as well as the delegations from the Arab nations. On the other hand, the states which I choose to call the free democratic states, ended up by being all over the place, as it were, with delegations voting separately, or perhaps one delegation voting partially in favour of a resolution and partially against. Consequently, the communist bloc can pass virtually any resolution it wishes. That is a danger for the IPU. If this practice continues, more and more of the free democratic states will question the value of this parliamentary body.

I am not suggesting that the free democratic states ought to get together and have a fixed position. On the contrary, I feel the approach taken by these states is the right approach. There were 11 official delegates from Canada, representing various political parties, and each one of those individuals spoke as an individual. He or she spoke as a Canadian parliamentarian, not as someone sent by his or her country or party to represent a certain point of view.

If the IPU is to fulfil its proper role as a meeting of parliamentarians, it is important that that concept continue. I deplore the fact that the communist bloc countries do not operate in that fashion. It is important for us, as Canadian parliamentarians in this world body, to make our views known in this respect. I do not suppose it will change their method of operation, but if we make it known that that is how they operate, at least there will be some recognition of the different positions in which the two groups find themselves when voting on various issues. Some action is required on our part, as members of this world body, to bring this point into the open.

It is important, if we are to play our proper role in this, that we pay more attention to the IPU. If we are serious about being a member of that organization, about sending parliamentarians twice a year to a world meeting, we ought to pay more attention to the content, to the material, that we put forward. This means that we ought to be thinking about the kinds of resolution we believe should be discussed by that body. This means more homework. Having decided what is a proper subject for study, we must find out who is interested in the subject and get working so that they will be properly briefed.

Briefing is another aspect we should consider. It seems to me that the people sent by the communist bloc countries are highly briefed. Admittedly they have a different system. I do not imagine that their parliaments sit for very long periods of the year, as ours does. I suspect they sit for a very short time, so the parliamentarians have ample time to go on world trips, to conferences of this sort. It is different in our case. Our two houses sit virtually year in and year out, and detaching people to serve on these delegations means that some work that is required to be done here is not being done. Yet, if we are to present an effective voice at these meetings we must make sure that properly qualified and properly briefed people go to them, people who have had a chance to look at the subjects in advance and who do not arrive unprepared. The communist countries are sending to these meetings some very highly qualified and trained people—ministers in their governments, people who have special knowledge and expertise in the subjects to be discussed.

The selection of candidates for these meetings is something that we must look at. There must be early selection of people who have knowledge in the subjects to be discussed, people who after being briefed can speak with authority. There is nothing worse than sending a Canadian delegate who is not knowledgeable in the subject for which he is responsible. That would hurt the Canadian position and it would be better if such a delegate did not speak or get involved. Please do not misunderstand me. I am not being critical. I was a member of the delegation, so I am not criticizing anyone else. I am merely indicating the general need.

Honourable senators, those are my observations as a result of attending this meeting, which was very useful for the delegates. It was obviously useful from a general broadening standpoint. I again emphasize the particular value of the meetings that were held privately with members of the Japanese Government and leaders of industry on specific subjects. This is something we should consider for the future. We can usefully do more of this, but it means diligent preparation. The overall approach should be: How can we do the best job for Canada; how can a Canadian delegation best do its job at this type of international meeting, so that we can be proud of our accomplishment?

Senator Walker: May I ask the honourable senator a question arising from his excellent speech? One of the world's greatest problems is that of the population explosion. Did the IPU conference outline any means for slowing the growth of world population? I am sure it must have been discussed. It was when I attended such a meeting years ago.

Senator Molgat: Yes, that was discussed. I indicated that it was one of the subjects to be discussed. However, there has been a change in the thinking, largely as a result of the United Nations meeting in Bucharest. For example, Canada obviously does not at this stage have a population growth problem. The reaction of some of the countries with very large population growths is to say that, although their numbers may be growing rapidly, they do not regard it as a problem for themselves right now. They feel some resentment towards outsiders who tell them what is good for their country.

The matter was not quite as clear as it had been as a result of the April meeting of the IPU in Bucharest, when Senator Lapointe was a member of the group. Birth control methods, including provision of such information, are not necessarily working out satisfactorily to control growth. The emphasis now is more on assisting various countries to develop their production of goods and services. This may lead to a natural self-control of their population growth. That is happening, but we cannot take the overall picture and say that because the population of a country like India is growing very rapidly the simple solution is to provide more information on birth control. Apparently that attitude has not worked. The approach now is more along the lines of helping India to develop itself and to raise its standard of living, so that by natural reaction, as has happened in the developed countries, the population growth rate will decrease. I suppose there is more realization now that birth control recommendations, methods and information have not succeeded in those countries where the problem is greatest.

Senator Rowe: I should like to ask a question, which perhaps Senator Molgat has already answered in the course of his remarks. I understood him to say that there were three representatives of the Senate on the Canadian delegation.

Senator Molgat: That is right.

Senator Rowe: Does the honourable senator recall how many delegates there were from the other place?

Senator Molgat: There were eleven Canadian delegates to this conference. On a population basis we are allowed fourteen delegates drawn from the two houses, so we actually have fourteen votes. One of the problems of these meetings is the cost, and when the conference is held in a place as far away as Japan the budget only allows for a lesser number. Therefore, the total delegation this time was eleven members. Of those eleven, two were chosen automatically because they were the Canadian representatives on the IPU Council—one from each of the main parties. They were Mr. Gordon Fairweather, the chairman of the delegation, and Mr. Rosaire Gendron. The three main parties in the other place were represented by four Liberals, three Conservatives and one NPD member. Geographically the representation, taking into account both houses, extended from my colleague Senator Robichaud from New Brunswick in the east, to Mr. Balfour from Saskatchewan in the west.

I might add that five wives accompanied the delegation, and I express particular thanks to our Japanese hosts for providing a wonderful program for the ladies. They had all sorts of opportunities to see Japanese culture, Japanese life and the Japanese countryside.

On motion of Senator Flynn, for Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

PROPRIETARY OR PATENT MEDICINE ACT TRADE MARKS ACT

BILL TO REPEAL AND TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Senator Carter, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-9, to repeal the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act and to amend the Trade Marks Act, and had directed that the bill be reported with the following amendment:

Page 1: Strike out clause 3 and substitute therefor the following:

"3. This Act shall come into force on the first day of July, 1976."

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Carter moved that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, November 12, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before the question is put, I should like to give a brief outline of the work program for next week. Bill S-10, to amend the Feeds Act, is presently before the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and will likely be reported back to this chamber on Thursday. Bill S-6, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, is also before that committee. It will sit on Wednesday afternoon to hear the minister, and it will likely report this bill back to us on Thursday also. Bill S-12, to amend the Immigration Act, was reported today without amendment and will likely receive third reading on Tuesday evening.

● (1410)

Bill S-9, to repeal the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act and to amend the Trade Marks Act, was reported today and will be presented for third reading on Tuesday evening. Bill S-3, the Statute Revision Act, will probably be reported also on Tuesday evening. Bill S-2, to amend the Supreme Court Act and to make related amendments to the Federal Court Act, is presently before the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, which will meet Tuesday morning and probably report the bill in the evening. Bill S-5, the Aircraft Registry Act, is before our Committee on Transport and Communications, which is awaiting certain advice from the attorneys general of the provinces. The bill will not be reported back to this house next week.

Additional legislation is likely to be received from the other place during the week, particularly amendments to the Canada Pension Plan. I am informed that the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce would like to sit all day Wednesday to deal with the important problem of competition in Canada.

In view of the workload facing our committees next week, we have in mind reserving the whole of Wednesday for committee meetings. Therefore, the house will sit Tuesday evening and adjourn until Thursday afternoon to consider whatever committee reports we have before us at that time. I am presently endeavouring to arrange, through the chairman of the Committee on Transport and Communications, for that committee to consider my motion, passed by this house last week, in regard to the program entitled "Les Beaux Dimanches." In all probability this will not be considered until the following week.

This is our workload for next week. We will be dealing with legislation apart from the two bills which have been reported to this house and placed on the Order Paper for third reading next week. At this stage I cannot inform the house of the sequence in which other bills will be considered, but they will be taken in the order in which they are reported from our committees.

Senator Grosart: Is the deputy leader satisfied that this revised program of sittings next week will not in any way retard the passage of legislation?

Senator Langlois: I do not think so. In fact, I believe it will expedite the disposal of any legislation. That is why we wish to have our committees working at full strength on Wednesday.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE REQUESTED FOR BEEF PRODUCERS— QUESTION

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, in view of the absence of the government leader, I should like to put a question to his deputy.

Last Monday, the Quebec premier announced that, in order to solve the problem facing farmers and beef producers, which as everyone knows is very serious at the present time, federal assistance would be absolutely necessary to pay a subsidy guaranteeing a minimum price per pound of meat.

Could the Deputy Leader of the Government ask the federal authorities concerned to comply with the request of the Quebec premier for a contribution towards a subsidy, so that the Quebec government can solve that very serious problem? In addition, could we have an answer in the near future?

[The Clerk Assistant.]

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, in answer to that question I should like to point out, first of all, that I was given no notice of it. I am not upbraiding my honourable friend about it, but I must say that the government is always very receptive to the requests of the provincial governments, especially within the context of what is known as "co-operative federalism".

I am sure that the request for assistance which we got from the province of Quebec is now under active consideration by the government. I shall look into the matter, as my colleague has asked me to do, and give him an answer as soon as I have had the opportunity of getting the required information.

SUPREME COURT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Goldenberg, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-2, to amend the Supreme Court Act and to make related amendments to the Federal Court Act and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

STATUTE REVISION BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Goldenberg, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-3, to provide for a continuing revision and consolidation of the statutes and regulations of Canada and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

AGRICULTURE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Senator Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Wednesday, November 13, 1974, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Senator Flynn: Explain.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, before the question is put, I should like to add a word of explanation, particularly in view of what I said last Thursday with respect to our program for this week. We had in mind at that time not to sit tomorrow in order to facilitate the work of our committees. However, because there will be two bills before the Senate tomorrow for third reading, it is felt that the Senate should sit for a short time in order to give consideration to the third reading of those bills, so as not to delay the messages to be sent to the House of Commons in connection thereto. The Agriculture Committee is scheduled to sit at 3.30 tomorrow afternoon, and this motion is to authorize it to do so in the event that the Senate sits beyond that time. It is unlikely that the motion is necessary, but it is being moved in the event that the Senate is still sitting at 3:30 p.m.

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, if I may add a further word of explanation, tomorrow the committee will consider Bill S-6, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, and the minister can be present at that time.

Motion agreed to.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN SENATE MEMBERSHIP

Senator Macdonald, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

That the name of the Honourable Senator Asselin be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Flynn on the list of senators serving on the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments; and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator Laird moved the third reading of Bill S-12, to amend the Immigration Act.

● (2020)

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, before this bill receives third reading I have something to say about it. Normally before we consider a government bill there has been a debate in the other place; sometimes we have the benefit of committee hearings. The result is that we know something about the bill, which, added to whatever information is given to us by the sponsor, makes the record complete.

This bill was introduced in the Senate. We welcome this procedure, and encourage it more and more. We have from time to time indicated that we can thoroughly study such bills. Instead of giving them sober second thought, we give them sober first thought. However, bills that come before us are not all of the same kind. A bill dealing with a boundary dispute is one thing; a bill amending the Immigration Act is another. We give them whatever is required in the way of scrutiny, and we study their implications.

It will be remembered that Senator Laird, the sponsor, said this was a simple bill. I think what should be said now is that there is no such thing as a simple immigration bill. All immigration bills are sensitive—sensitive and emotional. Anyone who does not appreciate—I am not suggesting the sponsor does not, because he knows immigration—the difference between a bill involving people and a bill dealing with boundaries between two provinces is not with it.

In this instance we had introduced a bill dealing with immigration, not directly in the sense of policy but having slightly to do with it, at a time when we are awaiting the green paper. We do not quite understand what is bothering the government on immigration. We all have our own views on it, and because immigration has, in the main, been handled by the Cabinet and bureaucrats we are suspicious, so when this sort of bill is hurried along it gets our backs up.

Moreover, when a bill is introduced in this house we do not read its title and then, in addition, a few clauses of it. We have to deal with the bill in depth. In order that we may fully understand and do it justice, we must know the meaning of the bill, the purpose of the bill and what it will do. When somebody says, "We will deal with this in committee," that is not the answer. That is not the purpose of committees.

Senator Molson: Oh?

Senator Croll: A certain amount of information can be made available in committee, but not dealing with principle. The committees are there to hear outsiders who want or need to be heard. The committees are there for the purpose of hearing elaborations of what has already been given to us here.

[Senator Macdonald.]

It is quite clear that we were informed here that there have been some 7,000 deportations. It would have been highly unfair to ask the sponsor, for example, how many deportations there were in the first month of 1974 or 1973, but if that information is important we can certainly get it in committee. We do not expect that sort of information here, but we do expect the full and complete story.

However, we must realize that the business of the Senate is done on the floor of the Senate, where it is open to the public and where the public sometimes covers it. It is not done in committee. If business is done in committee then it is reported back here. The main work must be done here, open and above board.

What was our problem? We were dealing with what are called "country crashers," people who had been deported and who make their way back into the country. That is not an unusual situation, but it is the problem we were dealing with. The first question asked in respect of that problem was very simple: Is there not something in the Criminal Code, which says that if you are in the country illegally you are subject to arrest, deportation or whatever other sanction the law applies? The answer was: Yes, there is a law. The next question was: Well, did you take a case before the courts to find out whether it would stand up? and the answer: No, we did not take a case before the courts because the Justice Department told us we would not likely win.

The law has been on the statute books for a long time, and perhaps the Department of Justice is perfectly right. We have to hold the Justice Department in high regard, and they may be absolutely right in what they say. On the other hand, some of us who disagree, although we are not here to practise law, do bring expertise to this chamber. Nevertheless, if the department wants it that way, well, one cannot argue with them too long about it. Perhaps there is some good reason for doing it the way they want, but the question remains: What is the problem? When we ask how many people have been deported, why is it that we can only get figures for 1973 and part of 1974? Why is it that the sponsor must admit that he has no information for 1972? Why is it, when we are in committee, that the minister has to admit that the person who was responsible for compiling that information just did not do it? He sort of "goofed" with it. Well, we can understand that. That is not that dangerous.

But then another question comes up: How many people come into the country after being deported? What is the problem? Between the time that question was asked on the floor of the Senate and the time we arrived in committee they had obtained a sample which indicated that the figure was about 20 per month. Well, 20 per month is a problem, and it should be dealt with. They said that that figure was for the year 1974, but, when we asked them about 1973, they simply said they had no record for 1973. They said, "We don't keep records." They did not have statistics for either 1973 or 1972 and they said, "We don't know the extent of the problem for 1974. We went out and got a sample."

Although the difficulties with respect to this bill have been somewhat cleared up, nevertheless we are asked to pass a new measure when presently available laws have not even been tested. We are asked to put into effect a new law despite the fact that no statistics are available—indeed, have not even been kept—and one can only assume that we are supposed to guess whether the law is necessary or not. Of course, I do think in the end the bill has shown itself to be necessary, but the point I am making here today is that we in this place are entitled to full and complete information before we give a bill our endorsement on second reading, whether it originates here or comes to us from the other house, and until such time as we have that full and complete information we cannot be expected to pass any of these bills very quickly.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

SIXTY-FIRST ANNUAL CONFERENCE, TOKYO, JAPAN—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, November 6, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Molgat calling the attention of the Senate to the Sixty-first Annual Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union held in Tokyo, Japan, 2nd to 11th October, 1974, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Conference and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I read with deep interest the report of Senator Molgat on the trip to Japan of the parliamentarians who took part in the IPU Conference.

As Senator Molgat pointed out, the Senate was represented by three of its members. We greatly deplored the absence of Madam Speaker. She was supposed to join us, but she had to stay in Canada because of the responsibilities of the very important position that she fills with great judgment. I wish to congratulate her, as I did not have the opportunity to do so before.

I would also like to congratulate the members of the Canadian delegation on their earnest participation in that conference. I can say with pride that our Canadian delegates were well prepared and played a leading part in every committee of that meeting. Our advice was sought on many occasions on various questions discussed by the general assembly or in various committees. The Canadian senators were quite proud of the achievements of our delegates in Japan.

As everyone knows, the Inter-Parliamentary Union is an organization which represents Parliaments from all over the world. Although it has no binding executive power, it is a fact that when those parliamentarians express their views on matters of world-wide interest, such as disarmament, the Middle East crisis, the problem of over-population, those resolutions adopted by the general assembly do influence to a great extent the decisions of Parliaments and governments concerned.

I must say our meeting adopted some extremely important resolutions. I am sure that the governments and Parliaments concerned will readily accept those resolutions.

I also wish, like Senator Molgat, to thank the Canadian ambassador to Japan for his collaboration and the help provided by all his political, technical and legal advisors. They were of invaluable help to our delegation. They made comments on the various problems that exist between Canada and Japan. It was also thanks to them, as Senator Molgat pointed out, that the meetings were organized between our representatives, businessmen and civil servants and even ministers of the Japanese government to discuss some of the problems between our two countries.

Obviously, honourable senators, our Canadian delegation was especially interested in discussing our economic and trade relations with the Japanese government representatives, and rightly so. If we look at some of the statistics published by the Department of External Affairs, we find that the bilateral trade grew from $132.2 million in 1953 to $2.8 billion in 1973. In addition we know that the goods exported by Canada to Japan are mainly metals, minerals, cereals and forest products. Canada also wants to increase its exports of manufactured goods to Japan.

As you know, Japan exports to Canada, automobiles, motorcycles, television and radio sets, tape recorders, communications material, toys, sewing machines and textiles of all kinds. That is why Canadian delegates wanted to know whether the Japanese government and parliamentarians were interested in increasing, in some way or other, the trade between Canada and Japan.

Of course when the Japanese Prime Minister came to Canada, we learned the Japanese government was interested in investing money in the Athabaska oils and development. For our part we were mainly interested, the member for Manicouagan and I, to know whether Japan, a purchaser of millions of tons of ore from Quebec Cartier Mining and Iron Ore Company, could not invest money to get the materials processed here, rather than sending raw materials to Brazil, have it processed there and then sent back to Japan.

Such were the questions we asked ourselves, because we should know whether the Japanese government is interested in investing in plants that would process materials here and employ our labour.

The answer we got every time was that the Japanese government fear our labour unions. They fear the general spreading of strikes here in Canada, and especially in Quebec.

There is also the view that with increased strikes the cost of labour rises in proportion. Therefore, the profitability of plants to be built here would shrink. We know that Japan is now ready to invest in such plants, to process raw materials bought in various countries. Such was of course the objection when we asked the government if they were interested in locating such plants here to process our raw materials.

● (2040)

They undoubtedly fear labour unions, and rightly so. It is my opinion that the labour movement has not been reasonable in its demands in the last few years, especially in the province of Quebec. We see strikes breaking in every direction. Almost every day, whenever you turn on the radio or the television set, you learn that a union has gone on strike in such and such sector. There are a great many strikes in the province of Quebec at the present time, which certainly does not contribute much to improving the Canadian economy. The first to suffer are the workers themselves, who are often forced to go on strike because their union leaders do not seem to me to really assume their responsibilities in respect of the rank and file. Such is not the case in Japan. Of course, we are aware that unions exist in Japan. Workers there also get together and organize in order to better vindicate their rights. However, there exists something in Japan which we are lacking here in Canada: the will to succeed as a nation. Each and every individual there is working for his country, and there are very few strikes.

In fact, there exists between the government and the labour unions a continuing and permanent on-going bargaining process, so that the latter must give the former very long advance notice of its intention to strike—up to four months, I think. In the meantime, the bargaining mechanisms get under way. Large scale strikes are rare in Japan. On occasions, of course, workers may show their support. During our stay in Japan, we saw a large crowd of workers marching down the street in front of the Canadian embassy. Our ambassador told us, while 30,000 workers were demonstrating and demanding their rights, that if these workers had decided to go on strike for one day, as they did last year, the population would have wanted to lynch them because they were not doing any good to the economy of the country.

Senator Langlois: May I interrupt the honourable senator? When he refers to these preliminary negotiations, does he not mean negotiations for the whole of the industry rather than for one plant in particular?

Senator Asselin: Of course, they apply to the whole of the industry, but there is a continuing system or mechanism for negotiation with the government.

[Senator Asselin.]

Senator Flynn: But there are not very many illegal strikes.

Senator Langlois: No, but these negotiations are carried out mostly at the industry level.

Senator Asselin: I think so. But, of course, what impressed me was what they call the national will of every Japanese to contribute to the progress of his country.

It is not easy for us to meet the same objectives since Canada is divided, in my opinion, into five different regions and not many westerners have continuous contacts with easterners. It is therefore obvious that we are not too well informed, as we have very different problems.

● (2050)

These people live on an island. Their objective, their main goal, is to see that Japan progresses as much as possible in all political and economical spheres. This national determination to work for their country was brought to my attention in many ways. As you know, Japan is developing very rapidly and this is their current problem. This expansion has been going much too fast. To date, of course, no formula has been found to solve this problem. Sites can no longer be found in Japan to locate factories, and even if they want to build a factory there is a sort of national conscience that is urging the Japanese, on account of a high degree of pollution, to increase their green spaces. That is why Japan is at present trying to locate industries in other countries. That is why Japan can be seen trying to set up an industrial and economical empire in Asia. If you have read news reports coming in from Japan, you will see that Japan is now establishing very large industrial complexes in Korea and other Asian countries. We have been told that their problem is expansion and that is why Japan will be making considerable capital investments in the future to try to increase its industrial developments in other countries. That is why I think Canada should make considerable efforts to invite Japan to come over here and establish these industries which could partly solve the surplus manpower problem.

Of course, the problem of inflation in Japan is much worse than in this country.

Senator Flynn: That is putting it mildly.

Senator Lamontagne: 40 per cent.

Senator Asselin: Inflation is now at 32 per cent. I do not know whether it has changed since last month. Senator Lamontagne tells me that it is 40 per cent; that is quite possible. Even though the unemployment problem is practically nil over there, for one reason or another, maybe it will come up. But, when we were there, it was less than 1 per cent of the working population. Of course, there is a phenomenon in Japan that they call the "lifetime job". When you hire a worker, he must be kept on until he reaches the age of 55. Before dismissing a worker, it is absolutely necessary to make serious complaints against him and prove that he could be prejudicial to industry and production. Normally a man hired by an industry remains there up to about 55 years of age. So there are more people, more younger ones joining the labour force, because employees retire earlier than they do here. On the other hand, they also have a problem from that point of view. When there is a scarcity or a slackening of production, those workers must be kept. The companies must make up huge reserve funds which they freeze to pay and keep those employees even if they do not require their services.

Senator Goldenberg: Would the senator allow me a question?

Senator Asselin: I am not an expert, as you know.

Senator Goldenberg: No, I wanted to ask you if it is not true that the conditions you have just described explain why there are not so many strikes in Japan?

Senator Asselin: I would perhaps accept that point of view. It seems to me that labour leaders over there were more reasonable than ours, that they were more concerned about the community and would not try to take advantage in order to justify their wages, contrary to ours who often call illegal strikes. I noticed, over there, that people have a sense of responsibility.

Senator Goldenberg: People are guaranteed a job until about 55 years of age.

Senator Asselin: That is not necessarily the impression I got. People are guaranteed a job until 55. However, if they had to insist on their basic rights, even if they were to go on strike, they could not be laid off from one day to the next; I feel that that point of view must also be considered.

Another thing struck me: the help the Japanese government gives some near-public industries.

This may interest Senator Langlois. I have already discussed the matter with him. In Japan, shipbuilding industries are highly subsidized, to the extent of 80 to 85 per cent. In addition, Japan's shipbuilding industry is extremely successful for it took the trouble of inviting our Prime Minister's wife to christen a ship in Japan; and we congratulate the Japanese on their gesture.

Senator Langlois: It will bear a Canadian name.

Senator Asselin: Yes indeed. But we learned over there that the shipbuilding industry has achieved a high degree of efficiency, to the extent where it is now competing with many other countries that are following their example in the same field.

I should like to speak briefly about the committee to which I was assigned during this conference.

It was called the committee on the Middle East. It was not an easy one. As Senator Molgat reported here last week, all delegates, whether we were discussing disarmament, the future of youth, the population crisis, all delegates tried to connect the Middle East crisis with all the problems under discussion. As I said, this was not an easy committee.

In the general assembly, Canada introduced a resolution which was supported by Belgium, Luxembourg and the Netherlands. This resolution was in very broad terms. It called for the belligerents to stop quarrelling and to meet as soon as possible in Geneva, with a view to trying to find the means to settle once and for all the Middle East crisis.

There were four or five other resolutions introduced at the same time as ours, one of them by Pakistan. Following the debate in the general assembly, we set up a drafting committee. The delegates from various countries prepared a draft resolution to submit to the general assembly. This committee included delegates from France, Belgium, Israel, of course, Luxembourg, The Netherlands, Canada, Zaire, Egypt, Pakistan, Iraq and Lebanon.

At the very beginning, when I took the floor at the general assembly, I made it clear that Canada would by no means question the existence of the State of Israel. It is there to stay. Nor did Canada intend to voice its opinion on the boundaries of occupied territories. It was up to the parties involved to find a formula and get to a solution. But what came somehow as a surprise to the delegates at the general assembly was that I questioned the United Nations peacekeeping force in which Canada has an extremely important share.

I said our people were wondering about the efficiency of those forces. This was in effect witnessed during the last electoral campaign, and the matter has been discussed in the other place. The Senate talked about it too, especially as Canadian taxpayers pay for that United Nations peace keeping force out of their own taxes whereas other countries get their money back from the United Nations.

I also said that, in my opinion, to ensure the credibility of the United Nations peacekeeping force, other nations would have to participate in it. Besides, if we look back at the history of that United Nations force, and the contribution of Canada, we discover that we have been there since 1964. We sent soldiers almost everywhere the United Nations had peace troops. Many times, unfortunately, the efforts of our troops did not get the credit they deserved from the countries which were getting our aid and where we were trying to restore peace. Therefore, I urged the assembly to devise a new formula for the participation in that United Nations peacekeeping force. And also that the period during which countries are asked to contribute be limited in order to alleviate the burden of countries which already have to pay for that peace keeping force.

This may be a valuable contribution in that we contribute to creating a worldwide peace. However, I think we should question that UN peacekeeping force and redraft its statute and ask the countries which have the power and the means to do so, to do their own share for the United Nations peacekeeping force.

We discussed the matter for eight hours in committee. I was very pessimistic when I came out. I have never heard such dialogues of the deaf as those between Israel and the Arab countries. We fought over words. I again emphasize that it took us eight and a half hours to write a draft resolution to be submitted to the general assembly. For almost an hour, the Arabs wanted to change—you may remember the United Nations resolution 242 which ordered Israel to withdraw its troops from territories occupied since 1967—they wanted to add these words to the resolution: "to a complete withdrawal of the troops". The drafting committee rejected the amendment. At the general assembly, countries of the communist bloc succeeded in having those words added: "to withdraw all Israeli armed forces from the territories occupied since 1967".

I entirely agree with what Senator Molgat said last week. It seems to those who attend such international meetings that there is some sort of control between the socialist countries and their satellites; they have a tremendous sympathy for Third World countries and they form a bloc. Unfortunately, the other countries, friends of Canada, do not stand together enough to put their views forward. I think perhaps the formula should be changed.

At the general session, as the resolution appears in the conference report, the Canadian delegation voted as follows: five in favour, two against and seven abstentions. We were entitled to 14 votes.

Coming back to the Middle East, after witnessing in camera, so to speak, talks between the Arab countries and Israel, I would not say peace is forthcoming in those parts. There are too many accusations between the countries involved, too many conflicting interests preventing easy and early development of a formula for the settlement of the Middle East situation.

I believe I have said enough about that conference. In conclusion, I would in turn extend my most sincere thanks to the Japanese parliamentarians who were extremely kind to the Canadian delegation as well as to all other delegations. In their usual and extremely civilized way, they acted in a most courteous way. They are good organizers. They arranged for our delegation and those from other countries a splendid historical trip to Kyoto. I must say that my trip to Japan on the occasion of the IPU Conference taught me a great deal. I am grateful for having had the opportunity to attend.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, as a delegate to the Sixty-first Annual Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, I should like to give my own version of what I saw and heard at that conference. Unlike my two colleagues, Senator Molgat and Senator Asselin, I shall not refer to the technical aspects of the conference. Both senators certainly did their homework and gave an accurate report of what I consider to have been an extremely successful conference.

I should like to express my personal thanks to the Speaker of the Senate for giving me the opportunity of making my first trip to Tokyo. Had she not accepted the position which she now occupies with such dignity, I would not have had the opportunity of making that trip. I thank her very much. Having been invited to attend the conference at the last moment, I was not as well prepared, perhaps, as some of my colleagues to discuss the various important topics on the agenda.

I was impressed by the calibre of those attending the conference, which might well be called a parliament. Although it has no absolute jurisdiction, the semi-annual conference is representative of many countries and its influence has been felt throughout the world. The reports of its deliberations in plenary sessions and in its various committees have been given wide publicity and have been favourably received in many countries.

The Canadian delegation owes a debt of gratitude to those who made it possible for us to acquire that degree of experience. I should mention specifically Miss Jean Macpherson who, as coordinator, was tremendously helpful. She certainly knew how to ensure that everyone was in the right place at the right time. Mr. Peter Dobell was also most helpful. I should mention also the warm hospitality shown to us by our ambassador, His Excellency Ross

[Senator Asselin.]

Campbell, and his staff. We were kept busy at work each day, and in the evenings we were invited to attend several receptions, for which we were grateful to the ambassador and his staff.

The Canadian delegation has no reason to feel ashamed of its performance at the conference. Canadians are highly regarded wherever they travel throughout the world. I have said this in private and I will say it in this chamber, that as soon as a person is recognized in Europe, Asia, or elsewhere, as being a Canadian, he is immediately shown genuine respect. This is true of any country I have visited over a period of years, and it was certainly true of Japan during my recent trip. This is due, I am sure, to a variety of circumstances.

This Canada of ours has its problems of regionalism; of religion, because we do not all practise the same religion; and of language, because officially we are a bilingual country, but other countries have their own particular problems. While in Japan I recalled a trip I made to Russia with Team Canada in 1972, when I visited many stores and other establishments and found it impossible to extract a smile from any clerk, waiter, servant, bus driver, taxi driver, or anyone else. They are an oppressed people. On returning from Russia we kissed the soil at Montreal. We were delighted to be back in Canada. After ten days' absence, we appreciated the beauties of our country and what it holds in store for the future.

The situation is not quite the same in Japan. The Japanese people are, generally speaking, much happier. However, they are faced with the problem of inflation. Inflation is a serious problem; it is an universal problem. We in Canada suffer from inflation, but inflation in Canada is not nearly as serious a problem as it is in Japan. Mrs. Roy, the wife of the member for Timmins, Ontario, Jean Roy, told me one day that she went to a grocery store to buy apples to find that they cost $5 each—not $5 a dozen or $5 a half-dozen, but $5 for one apple, such as we grow in the Annapolis Valley, along the Saint John River and in certain parts of Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia. Gasoline costs $2 per gallon. I was told that in Tokyo, which has a population of approximately 11 million, it is impossible for any individual to buy a residence for anything less than $100,000, which means, of course, that only the aristocracy are in a position to own their own homes. When we become aware of situations such as I have related, we realize how fortunate we are to be Canadians, in spite of our problems.

I agree with Senator Asselin's comments with respect to unions. In Japan there is discipline. The unions are not all that powerful. They are not in a position to run the economy or the government, and I think that is all to the good. I am all in favour of unions, but I am not in favour of their controlling the economy, the government and the people, and using all ways and means at their disposal to make sure that their demands are met. I am not at all in favour of such tactics. I much prefer the Japanese system.

I recall visiting a manufacturing plant in Germany some years ago where they manufactured motors of all sizes. There were some 90,000 people working at that particular plant and there was never any question of a strike. All employees of that plant, from the president down, had lunch in the same cafeteria, thereby giving everyone an opportunity to exchange views and opinions. Everyone rubbed shoulders, whether he was the president of the company or the most recent employee. That was the philosophy.

There is a lesson to be learned from the way in which both unions and management operate in these countries. However, despite the fact that I see unions and management existing in harmony in these countries, I cannot help but feel sad that the malaises we suffer in Canada are trivial as compared to those of other nations.

I recall his Excellency Shinyichi Kondo, Japan's ambassador to Canada in 1971, remarking to me how fortunate we in Canada were to have such a vast land, pollution free. He told me that the waterways of Japan were badly polluted, as were the land and air—and we witnessed that. They are spending hundreds of millions of dollars to combat pollution. It is an almost insurmountable task. Hopefully, they will eventually clean up all the pollution, but it will be at a cost of billions of dollars.

We are fortunate to be living in a country such as Canada. Despite the fact that this was an extremely informative conference, revealing a number of things to me, I was very happy to return to Canada, my home, my country, the best country in the world. I do not say that because I want to be on the side of the angels, or because I want to preach motherhood. I think any Canadian who has travelled abroad extensively can appreciate my feelings. It is unfortunate that some of the critics we have in Canada are not given an opportunity to see for themselves the situations in other countries. Only then would they be in a position to say, "Canada, my home and native land."

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other senator wishes to participate in the debate, the inquiry is considered debated.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Chesley W. Carter moved the second reading of Bill C-22, to amend the Canada Pension Plan.

He said: Honourable senators, as you can see, Bill C-22 is not a simple bill, like the one introduced by my friend and deskmate, Senator Laird, a couple of weeks ago. On the contrary, it is a fairly voluminous bill, occupying some 46 pages and consisting of 56 clauses. However, it is not quite as complicated as it may appear on the surface, but it does constitute a fairly extensive revision of the Canada Pension Act.

Honourable senators will recall that the Canada Pension Plan, and the identical Quebec Pension Plan, became law in 1966, thereby initiating a program whereby people could make some financial provision for their retirement, and at the same time protect themselves and their dependants in the event of severe disability or death.

In accordance with its underlying philosophy, the plan was originally conceived and structured as an important segment of a broad income maintenance system involving both the public and private sectors. It was based on the assumption that the needs of the retired generally would continue to be met by the old age security program, and that this would continue to apply universally to wage earners and non-wage earners alike.

It was also assumed that private pensions and insurance holdings would continue to exist and provide income protection for large numbers of Canadians who could afford to buy this protection and chose to do so. At the same time, however, it was concluded that there was a need for a public, universal contributory plan related to the amount of earnings to provide a basic level of income protection in the event of retirement, disability or death.

The basic orientation of the Canada Pension Plan has been to the wage earner, and as a consequence the determination of the key factors of the plan—that is, coverage, contributions and benefits—has been tied to the earnings of the participant. This close tie to earnings has provided a fair and equitable basis for allocating costs between employees and employers. It has also facilitated the administration of the plan through such mechanisms as payroll deductions and the tax collection process of the Department of National Revenue. Also, this orientation to earnings has facilitated the integration of the Canada Pension Plan with private pension plans.

The compulsory character of the Canada Pension Plan results in the participation of the large majority of wage earners and self-employed persons in Canada. This makes the Canada Pension Plan the largest group pension and insurance plan in Canada. The automatic participation of such large numbers makes it possible for the plan to provide relatively low cost protection and to incorporate a number of desirable features which might not otherwise be feasible, including a basic exemption, a "drop-out" feature and short minimum contributory periods.

The year's basic exemption is a provision which relieves contributors of the obligation to pay contributions on the lowest portion of their annual earnings, but at the same time allows them to include such earnings in the calculation of their benefits under the plan.

The "drop-out" provision allows contributors to ignore years of low or zero earnings when their benefits are calculated and, in this way, enables them to increase the size of their benefits.

The short minimum contributory periods required before benefits can be paid—that is, three years for survivor benefits and five years for disability benefits—mean that such protection is available relatively early in the contributory period of the wage earner. If the plan were not mandatory in nature it would be difficult to retain these features, as it would become possible for individuals to arrange their participation in such a way that they could draw substantial benefits for a minimal contribution.

The benefits provided by the Canada Pension Plan for contributors and their dependants include a retirement pension, a widow's pension, a disability pension, a death benefit, and a benefit for the children of deceased or disabled contributors. Because the plan as designed has a 10-year maturation period for retirement pension, the maximum retirement pension will be payable in 1976 when, if the amendments in Bill C-22 become law, it will be $154.85 per month.

Originally the Quebec Pension Plan and the Canada Pension Plan were identical. However, some substantial changes in the Quebec Pension Plan, effective January 1, 1973, provided higher benefits, but the effect of the proposed amendments will be to make the retirement pensions the same under both plans.

In 1970, the government felt that the Canada Pension Plan should be amended to bring the benefits more in line with the economy in which it was operating. Accordingly, in that year the federal government initiated action in that direction by publishing a document entitled: "The White Paper on Income Security for Canadians," which contained several proposals for improving the Canada Pension Plan, including a suggested increase in the maximum pensionable earnings for contributions and benefit purposes for the years 1973, 1974 and 1975—the last three years of the maturation period. All these proposals were discussed with the provinces, which indicated at that time that firm decisions on specific proposals should wait until an appreciation could be made of the whole direction of national social security programs.

In April 1973 the government published another document, entitled: "The Working Paper on Social Security in Canada." This provided a launching pad for the joint federal-provincial review of the total social security system, which was followed at the end of that month by a meeting of federal and provincial ministers of welfare. At this meeting the proposals for changes in the plan set forth in the working paper were considered, and there were indications that a consensus was developing on some of the more significant items that were discussed. A further meeting was held in October 1973, and another meeting in February of this year. As a result of the consensus resulting from these meetings, we have before us Bill C-22 to enact into law the major changes that have been agreed upon, and at the same time ensure compatibility with the Quebec Pension Plan.

One very important feature of Bill C-22 stands in a category by itself. It is the provision in clause 7 for the return of contributions to contributors who are certified members of a religious sect or a division of a religious sect who have elected not to make contributions.

This amendment honours a commitment made jointly by the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of National Revenue in December 1971. This commitment was the result of representations made to the Government of Canada by the Hutterites and the Old Order Amish Mennonites in which it became clear that the Canada Pension Plan in its current form places an unintended penalty on these groups for the practice of their own particular religious beliefs.

The communal nature of the Hutterite colonies was recognized in 1969 when it was agreed that members of the colonies were to be considered as partners in the business of farming for purposes of the Income Tax Act. In accordance with the teachings of their religion, the colony members live in small self-contained communities in various parts of Canada. According to their beliefs, members of the colonies should not acquire interest or rights to property of any kind, and they feel that the Canada Pension Plan gives contributors such rights.

[Senator Carter]

Although shunning Canada Pension Plan benefits, the Hutterite colonies make their own provisions for dependant members when they are no longer capable of physically contributing to the welfare of the community as a whole. This provision is such that dependant members are maintained for the rest of their lives at the expense of the whole community in a manner to which they are accustomed.

The Old Order Amish Mennonite sects hold similar beliefs and, although members do not live in colonies, they have consistently stated that their religious convictions are such that they may not in good conscience accept benefits under the Canada Pension Plan. The United States government recognized their special status in 1966 by amending its social security legislation to exempt them from coverage.

Despite the fact that the members of these religious groups are prevented by conscience from accepting any benefits, they are nevertheless required by the present law to contribute to the Canada Pension Plan, and the Department of National Revenue is required by law to collect those contributions. Under the legislation now in force, liabilities for contributions have been generated in the accounts of self-employed members of the sects and many returns have been automatically set aside for collection. The purpose of the amendment in clause 7, therefore, is to correct this situation and to allow these religious groups the freedom to practise their religion without at the same time being forced to break the law.

Most of the other important changes can be grouped under the headings of extension of eligibility for benefits and improvement in the benefits themselves and the conditions under which they are paid.

One of the most significant of these are the amendments proposed in clauses 23 and 25, which embody the principle of equal treatment for male and female contributors and beneficiaries under the act.

These clauses amend the present provisions of the Canada Pension Plan so that the surviving spouse and children of a deceased or disabled female contributor will qualify for benefits under the same conditions as the surviving spouse and children of a male contributor. The amounts of the benefits that would be paid upon application will be determined by the same factors—age, health and dependent children—that now apply to widows. This objective is obtained by deleting all references to widowers and widows in the present act and by substituting the term "survivor's pension" for the term "widow's pension."

These changes have been drafted to provide retroactive entitlement, but not retroactive payment. That is, the widower, orphans or dependent children of a female contributor who died or became disabled prior to the effective date of the amendments would be entitled to benefits, but those benefits would not be paid in respect of any period prior to the effective date of the amending act.

Another important extension of coverage is the provision to include, as pensionable employment, employment in Canada by the government of another country or by an international organization. For example, Canadian civilian employees of the United States army base in Goose Bay who were not covered previously will be included by the amendment in clause 22 of this bill.

Another significant change is the repeal of the earnings and retirement test that now applies to CPP retirement pensions. Under the act at the present time contributors between the ages of 65 and 69 must retire from regular employment before they can qualify for a CPP retirement pension, and recipients of these pensions who are aged 65 to 69 face the prospect of having their pensions reduced or eliminated if their post-retirement earnings exceed amounts stipulated by the legislation.

The amendment in clause 35 does away with these requirements so that, once this bill becomes law, these tests will no longer apply and persons aged 65 or older may draw their Canada Pension Plan retirement benefits even though they may continue to work and receive wages.

A further extension of coverage is embodied in clause 6, which repeals section 10(2) of the present act. Section 10(2) is a special provision which has applied to self-employed persons, requiring them to earn one and one-third times the year's basic exemption for that year in order to qualify as a contributor. I will explain this a little more fully in a moment, but the point I wish to make is that this change will provide greater opportunity for people at lower income levels to participate in the Canada Pension Plan. In particular, increased numbers of farmers, fishermen and other self-employed persons will be enabled to improve their protection under the plan.

The year's basic exemption is the amount on which contributions do not have to be made. The present law establishes the basic exemptions at 12½ per cent of the year's maximum pensionable earnings. During the first session of the last Parliament, in accordance with an agreement reached with the provinces at the October 1973 meeting, Bill C-224 was passed, which sets the yearly maximum pensionable earnings at $6,600 for 1974 and $7,400 for 1975. This is the maximum proportion of a person's earnings on which he can make contributions for benefits under the Canada Pension Plan. It can be seen, therefore, that the effect of the amendments in clauses 6 and 13 is to reduce the year's basic exemption for 1975 from $800 to $700, and for self-employed people from $1,000 to $700.

● (2140)

Under the present law, the amount of the year's maximum pensionable earnings is calculated in accordance with a formula based on the earnings index for that year, the earnings index for any given year being the ratio that the employee's average earnings for that year bear to the employee's average earnings for the base period. Clause 11 repeals this formula and establishes a new formula based on the industrial composite, which is a term used by Statistics Canada to denote the average of weekly wages and salaries of workers in Canadian industry.

I mentioned earlier that the Canada Pension Plan comes into maturity in 1976, and clause 11 provides that for 1976 and subsequent years, the amount of the year's maximum pensionable earnings will be increased by 12½ per cent per year until it catches up with the industrial composite.

After this transitional period, the year's maximum pensionable earnings will be kept parallel with the average earnings by equating it with a projection of the industrial composite data. This change should play a vital role in substantially increasing Canada Pension Plan benefits in the future. It is estimated that as a result of this change, over the next decade maximum Canada Pension Plan retirement pensions could increase by about 250 per cent; that is, up to $350 a month, and disability and survivor pensions will increase by up to 180 per cent. In addition, Bill C-22 contains a number of amendments designed to bring the Canada Pension Plan in line with the Unemployment Insurance Act and the National Revenue Act.

Senator Asselin: A good thing.

Senator Carter: For example, clauses 17 and 18 broaden the appeal procedures and provide for the right of appeal to be extended to the legal representative of either the employer or the employee. It also provides for payment of legal expenses incurred by a respondent on an appeal by the minister to the Pension Appeals Board. Another amendment provides for interest to be paid at the prescribed rate for overpayments, and there is a provision for payment to a province of welfare benefits which had been paid to a person who subsequently becomes eligible for benefits under the act, and provision also for amounts required but failed to be deducted on account of federal Crown employees' contributions, and for payments to provincial authorities, pursuant to agreement, of amounts which were required but failed to be deducted on account of federal crown employees' contributions in employment designated in the agreement.

Of the remaining clauses, many of them are consequential on the amendments to which I have already referred. Others have to do with technical changes, technical clarifications, removal of anomalies and ambiguities and for improved administrative procedures.

Generally speaking, technical changes are necessary in order to rectify inequities not foreseen at the conception of the plan, and also to change certain conditions which have lost some of their original relevance and to provide the flexibility which experience has proved essential. For example, the act now provides that when recipients of disability pensions reach 65, payment of their disability pensions cease and they start receiving retirement pensions. It was intended that this change would occur the month after the beneficiary reaches age 65, but the wording of the act is such that this change is delayed by one month. There is a similar one-month lag under existing law for the payment of a widow's (survivor's) pension to a woman upon her reaching age 65. These flaws are taken care of in clause 1 (6).

The act now provides that wages earned by a contributor before his death but paid after his death cannot be taken into account for pension plan purposes. This is taken care of in clause 8.

The present act also provides that the earnings of a self-employed person in the year of his death must be prorated, while those of an employee are not. That is, if a self-employed contributor dies in the month of January, he can only be credited with one-twelfth of his actual January earnings. Clause 9 puts the self-employed on the same basis as the employee contributor, with effect from January 1, 1975.

Also, a contributor may hold two jobs simultaneously and, being assigned two yearly basic exemptions in the year, may not have contributed on his total eligible earnings. Clauses 1 and 9 clarify the wording of the act and enable such a person to elect to contribute on any such extra earnings.

At the present time, if a trustee continues to operate the business of a bankruptcy, the trustee becomes a new employer for CPP purposes. To deal with this situation, clause 16 contains a provision like one found in the Income Tax Act which treats the trustee as an agent of the bankrupt.

Because the year's maximum pensionable earnings level is not known until very close to the end of the preceding calendar year, National Revenue has a problem in ensuring the enactment of the necessary contributions rate tables for employers. Clause 22 provides for the retroactivity of contribution tables passed subsequent to January 1 of the given year and the legality of their application throughout the whole of that year.

The wording of the present act prevents contributors from securing maximum disability pensions, because to receive a maximum pension the contributor is required by the act to make contributions for a month in which he is not allowed to make a contribution. Clause 27 removes this anomaly.

Under present legislation, a survivor's benefit which becomes payable in January cannot be escalated in accordance with the cost-of-living index of the previous year. However, a survivor's benefit which becomes payable in December can be so escalated. This anomalous situation is remedied by clause 29.

Under the existing law, it is possible for a surviving spouse to receive two concurrent pensions, one as a common-law spouse and another as a legal spouse of another contributor. There are also situations arising when a contributor dies within a year of his marriage. Clauses 30 and 31 clarify the application of the law in such situations.

Under the present law, a person can be denied his Canada Pension Plan benefits if he does not have a social insurance number. Clause 47 removes this penalty and authorizes the minister to cause social insurance numbers to be assigned to contributors and beneficiaries.

The Canada Pension Plan now provides that the federal government must give a minimum two-year notice of intent to introduce amendments affecting the general level of benefits or rates of contributions. The provincial Ministers of Welfare have agreed that this time lag would not be observed for the amendments contained in this bill and so this requirement is suspended for this bill. This requirement was also suspended in the case of the plan changes enacted last year by Bill C-224.

The plan also sets out the categories of changes which cannot become effective without the consent of two-thirds of the provinces having two-thirds of the population. There are a number of such changes in the amending act and the last clause confirms that this requirement will be observed.

Honourable senators, Bill C-22 is a substantial improvement on the original act and I strongly recommend it for your favourable consideration.

On motion of Senator Bélisle, for Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

BRITISH TRADE MISSION

INQUIRY ANSWERED

Senator Forsey inquired of the government, pursuant to notice:

1. Is it true that the British Trade Mission in Montreal has been transformed into "the British Consulate"?
2. If so, why?
3. If the Montreal office of the Mission has been so transformed, have the offices of the Mission elsewhere in Canada suffered the same sea-change?

Senator Perrault: Answered.

1. Yes; the British Trade Commission in Montreal was redesignated as the British Consulate General with effect from August 1, 1974.

2. The decision to change the designation of the office was made by the British Government, and was accepted by the Government of Canada. The British action follows a decision taken at the 1972 Commonwealth meeting on Consular Relations to the effect that Commonwealth Countries could appoint Consular officers in other Commonwealth Countries.

3. All British Government Posts in Canada outside of Ottawa have been redesignated as consular posts.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

PERMISSION REQUESTED TO TAKE PHOTOGRAPHS OF PRECINCTS AND SENATORS FOR DISTRIBUTION TO CANADIAN EMBASSIES

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the Clerk of the Senate has received a letter from Miss Robbin Frazer, who is under contract with the Department of External Affairs, to prepare a photo-story on the Senate. Only still photographs will be taken. These photographs will be distributed to various Canadian embassies throughout the world and will be used by the embassies for exhibits, publication in local newspapers, and for distribution in libraries and schools.

Permission is requested to photograph a number of senators, who will be contacted individually by Miss Frazer. Miss Frazer also requests that the photographer, Mr. Ted Grant, be permitted to work without a flash from both balconies when the Senate is in session, and also from the ante-chamber, taking photographs from there at ground level while the Senate is sitting. He would also like to photograph the Senate ceiling and the murals surrounding the chamber. This, of course, would be done while the Senate is not sitting.

Is it agreeable to honourable senators that these still photographs be taken of the Senate while the Senate is sitting, and that the Senate ceiling and murals be photographed at another time?

Senator Flynn: I suggest that this be considered at the next sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

AGRICULTURE

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE REQUESTED FOR BEEF PRODUCERS— SUPPLEMENTARY QUESTION

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, last week I asked a question of Senator Langlois with respect to beef producers in Quebec. I know that the Government of Quebec has settled the matter and granted an amount of $150 million to the beef producers. I should like to know if the federal government will contribute with the Government of Quebec and give the promised assistance.

Senator Langlois: I am making the necessary inquiries, and hope to have the information to enable me to reply very soon.

SUPREME COURT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator Connolly moved the third reading of Bill S-2, to amend the Supreme Court Act and to make related amendments to the Federal Court Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I should say that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs met yesterday morning to consider this legislation. I am not a member of the committee, but I attended the meeting, which I found very enlightening. The bill was explained by Mr. T. B. Smith, of the Department of Justice. Also present were Mr. E. Neil McKelvey, Q.C., of Saint John, New Brunswick, Immediate Past President of the Canadian Bar Association, and Professor W. R. Lederman, Q.C., formerly of Queen's University, and now of the University of Montreal. Professor Lederman did the research for the Canadian Bar Association committee that reported to the government on the problem dealt with by the bill.

All of us were pleased with the evidence tendered. The committee sat in the morning and again in the afternoon. Full information was given the committee, and we are grateful to the witnesses who appeared and performed so well.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time, and passed.

STATUTE REVISION BILL

THIRD READING

Senator Stanbury moved the third reading of Bill S-3, to provide for a continuing revision and consolidation of the statutes and regulations of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time, and passed.

PROPRIETARY OR PATENT MEDICINE ACT TRADE MARKS ACT

BILL TO REPEAL AND TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator Bonnell moved the third reading of Bill S-9, to repeal the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act and to amend the Trade Marks Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time, and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, before I move the adjournment of the house I should mention that the reason for the short sitting this afternoon is the extensive committee work being undertaken by the Senate this week. Our committee activity began yesterday morning, continued today, and two important committee meetings are to be held this afternoon. Further committee meetings will probably be held later this week.

● (1410)

As was announced by the Deputy Leader of the Government on Thursday last, it was proposed to reserve the whole of today for committee meetings. Thus, it is moved that the Senate adjourn now so that the work of our committees can continue.

THE SENATE

PERMISSION REQUESTED TO TAKE PHOTOGRAPHS OF PRECINCTS AND SENATORS FOR DISTRIBUTION TO CANADIAN EMBASSIES

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, yesterday I informed the Senate that the Clerk of the Senate had received a request for permission to take photographs from both galleries of the chamber for the purpose of a photo-story on the Senate which is being prepared for the Department of External Affairs. It was then the wish of the Senate that this request be considered at the next sitting. As honourable senators have had an opportunity to read my statement of yesterday, may I ask if the house is ready to make a decision regarding such request? Is it agreed, honourable senators, that permission be granted to take the photographs in question?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Perrault: May I suggest to honourable senators that we on this side would like to stand this matter pending consultation with our colleagues and associates in the other place. For that reason I would ask that it stand.

The Hon. the Speaker: Stand.

BUDGET SPEECH

ACCOMMODATION FOR SENATORS IN COMMONS GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as previously announced, the Minister of Finance will deliver his budget speech in the other place on Monday, November 18, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

May I be permitted to remind honourable senators that none but senators will be admitted to the Senate Gallery of the House of Commons on that occasion. This step is being taken for the purpose of providing accommodation in the gallery for as many senators as possible. In this manner, senators will not be excluded from the gallery on account of many of the places being occupied by relatives and friends of senators.

May I add that such instructions were first issued in 1931 by the then Speaker of the Senate, the Honourable P. E. Blondin, and that this practice has been followed ever since by succeeding Speakers.

EMPLOYER-EMPLOYEE RELATIONS IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Senator Neiman, on behalf of Senator Buckwold, Joint Chairman of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service, presented the committee's first report, as follows:

Your committee recommends that its quorum be fixed at eleven (11) members, provided that both Houses are represented, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings and receive evidence so long as five (5) members are present, provided that both Houses are represented; and

That the committee have power to engage the services of such expert staff, and such stenographic and clerical staff as may be required during the present session.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

● (1410)

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I move that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate, unless there is unanimous consent to deal with it now. I see Senator Asselin is signifying that this might be done.

Senator Asselin: Yes, I would have no objection to that at all.

Senator Buckwold: If there is unanimous consent, I would move that the report be adopted now.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Senator Argue, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, reported that the committee had considered Bill S-6, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Buckwold moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1) (g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, November 19, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Before the question is put, I should like to give a brief outline of what is anticipated in the way of work for the Senate next week. In moving that we adjourn until 2 o'clock Tuesday afternoon, I am taking into consideration the number of bills now before the Senate. There are five bills presently on the Order Paper for second reading, and one on which the debate on second reading was adjourned. Bill S-10, to amend the Feeds Act, is now in committee stage. The Senate will continue its work with respect to these bills next week and, hopefully, will get all or most of them into the committee stage.

There are already three committee meetings scheduled for next week. The Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee is scheduled to meet on Wednesday at 9:30 a.m. to continue its advance study of proposed legislation respecting the Combines Investigation Act. The Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will meet Thursday at 9:30 a.m. to consider certain statutory orders and regulations. The Foreign Affairs Committee is scheduled to meet at 9 a.m. Thursday to study Canada's relations with the United States. It is expected that the Agriculture Committee will hold a further meeting with respect to Bill S-10, to amend the Feeds Act, and that at least one further bill will be introduced in the Senate next week.

Senator Manning: May I ask the Leader of the Government whether it is the intention to sit both Tuesday afternoon and evening?

Senator Perrault: Yes, that is the intention. There is considerable business before the Senate, and it is felt that this should be expedited. For that reason, the Senate will be sitting both Tuesday afternoon and evening.

STATUTE LAW (VETERANS AND CIVILIAN WAR ALLOWANCES) AMENDMENT BILL, 1974

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Daniel A. Lang moved the second reading of Bill C-4, to amend the War Veterans Allowances Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act.

He said: Honourable senators, it is not an entirely inappropriate time of the year to have a bill such as Bill C-4 before us. We are just three days beyond Remembrance Day, and I know that last Monday many of us were involved in services in various parts of the country. I had the advantage of watching several on television, including the one at the cenotaph in Ottawa, and later I read the newspaper editorials covering the events of last Monday.

● (1420)

I do not often find occasion to pay tribute to the CBC, but I feel I must do so now about a Remembrance Day program they produced. I refer particularly to the use they made of film taken last June on the Normandy beaches and environs, showing many of the veterans who attended the ceremonies commemorating the thirtieth anniversary of D-Day. I thought the coverage was excellent, and that the observances portrayed were genuine and very profound. I was struck by the realization that many of these Remembrance Day programs, both on television and on radio, as well as newspaper articles, were the work of men and women who were born since World War II. My impression, and I hope it is correct, is that with the effluxion of time our young people are attaining a deeper understanding of what two World Wars meant to this country. I feel that this understanding may be more so now than in the 1960s.

Honourable senators, this bill, dealing with war veterans, is liberalizing legislation which will confer greater benefits on the veterans than exist in the present law. The bill has been endorsed by all parties in the other place and I feel certain it will receive the endorsement of all honourable senators. There are those who say, on every such occasion, that the bill does not go far enough or that the amounts involved are not large enough, but within those parameters I am sure it will receive favourable consideration.

Honourable senators, it is rather startling to think today, 56 years after World War I and some 30 years after World War II, we are still concerned with improving the lot of our veterans. I know we are all proud of our veterans, and this legislation springs from a general awareness by the people of Canada of the debt they owe to those who gave their lives or their health in the service of their country and in defence of freedom.

Honourable senators, turning to the specifics of the bill, you will note it amends two acts, namely, the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act. I think I will do justice in explaining the bill if I point out the five major areas affected by its clauses and the results that will be brought about by its passage.

Under the acts I have mentioned, as they now stand, benefits are provided at one rate to veterans who are single and at another rate, a higher rate, to veterans who are married. However, there are no additional allowances provided for married veterans who have dependent children or for widows of veterans with two or more children. I should add that under the law as it now stands, a widow or widower with one child is treated in the same manner, so far as the allowance is concerned, as a married veteran.

Although it is probably slightly belated, this bill does recognize now that it is only fair to provide additional support for those veterans who have dependent children. Accordingly, the amendment makes allowance for payment of $50 per month for each dependent child, less the amount of family allowance received for that child. Widows and widowers will continue to receive the married rate for the first child, without any deduction being made in respect of the family allowance for that child. They will also, as I have said, receive the additional $50 each month for each additional child, less the family allowance amount. I think the reasons for the broadening of the base here are self-evident and that the amendment will be most welcome.

The second important aspect of the bill is that it deals with the current, persisting and obdurate problem of inflation. Honourable senators will recall that in 1972 this house passed a bill which recognized for the first time the adverse effect which inflation had been having on war veterans with respect to the benefits they receive. That bill provided an annual escalation which was to be matched from year to year with the increases in the consumer price index. The effect of Bill C-4 is to improve considerably the reality of that escalation. It does so in a number of ways: first, by making the escalation quarterly instead of annually—and, bearing in mind the rate of inflation we are experiencing these days, I would not be surprised to see it made monthly.

Senator Flynn: Or daily.

Senator Lang: The second way in which the bill improves the reality of this escalation is by computing the amount of escalation on the income ceiling permitted under the act rather than on the rate, and then applying that amount to the rate. If I may say so, that is not nearly as complicated as it first sounds. Indeed, it can be quickly appreciated that what we are doing here is simply applying the factor to a much larger base—that of the permissible limits of outside income. Those limits would rise by the amount thus computed, and the rate of the pension itself would likewise increase by that amount. For some reason with which I am not too familiar, the allowances to orphans will continue to be escalated, as under the 1972 legislation, annually, and not quarterly, as for others. However, I will come back in a moment and refer to the status of persons in that category.

● (1430)

To gauge the extent of these changes to which I have referred, I might give you a few examples with a minimal number of figures. Today an unmarried veteran who has no outside assessable income which would adversely affect the amount of his pension, receives $151.14 per month. This base was effective up to October 1, 1973. If the bill is passed, the amount will go up by $10.13 to $161.27 for October, November and December of 1973. It will go up again by $5.43 to $166.70 per month for January, February and March of 1974; by $3.72 to $170.42 for April, May and June of 1974; by $5.47 to $175.89 for July, August and September of this year, and up again by $7.77 to $183.66 for October, November and December of this year.

You will understand from what I have said here that this bill will have retroactive effects in terms of the benefits available to our veterans. From the examples I gave, you can see that the pension for a single veteran, with no other assessable income, will go up from $151.14 to $183.66. That, of course, is a very substantial increase, percentagewise, but I suggest in all fairness it recognizes the facts of life.

As I mentioned, the treatment of orphans is to be improved. The payments now are $91.95 for one orphan, $161.27 for two, and $217.24 for three or more. This bill provides for a flat rate of $125 per month for each orphan, no matter how many there are in the family. Family allowances received for those orphans are applied as a deduction against the amounts referred to.

Senator Connolly (Ottawa West): Will the honourable senator permit a question at this stage? He used the word "orphan," which appears in the schedules to the bill. He also used the words "dependent children." Is there an age limitation with respect to the use of those words; in other words, for the purposes of this legislation what is an orphan and what is a dependent child?

Senator Lang: That will be my next point. The next major provision of this bill changes the definition of dependent and orphan. As the law now stands, those persons are within those categories only until they are 21 years of age. Under this bill they will remain in that category for the purpose of payment of pensions and allowances until they are 25 years of age. The reason for this is quite obvious. The length of time that our young people are spending in school today is considerably beyond what could have been imagined some 25 years ago, with a consequent increase in the economic burden on the supporting family.

Finally, honourable senators—and I think Senator Neiman should be very pleased about this—women veterans are being given complete equality of status with male veterans. I have not yet tried to divine what the effect of this bill will be when both spouses are veterans. That might be considered when the bill goes to committee.

Senator Benidickson: That is a problem under the Veterans Land Act.

Senator Hicks: Will Senator Lang permit me to ask a question? Is it not true that women veterans and spouses are given an advantage over their male counterparts in this legislation, in that payments may be made to them when they have attained the age of 55 years, whereas in the case of males the pension becomes payable only at age 60?

Senator Lang: That may well be, but if that is the case then that is a difference that I would "vive."

Senator Flynn: Vive la différence. I thought the amendment might provide pensions for husbands or widowers of veterans which would mean that there would be an advantage for men as well as for women.

Senator Lang: That is the main thrust of the amendment.

Honourable senators, I have no hesitation in recommending the principles of this bill to you. I know you would like to examine it in detail with experts in committee. Its ramifications are quite extensive and, to some extent, quite complicated.

When John McCrae wrote in the words of In Flanders Fields, "If ye break faith with us who die..." I wonder what he meant by "break faith"? I think that at times it is worthwhile to bring some thought to bear on this. This is particularly the case when you see—and it is almost trite to comment on world conditions at the present time—the United Nations welcoming as it has into its forum, and giving almost de facto recognition to, a terrorist leader and at the same time expelling a member country for the rest of the session. It certainly cannot give one any great sense of security about the world's condition at the present time. But I think, perhaps, that McCrae was referring also to the very real concern which is abroad in Canada today about the role, strength, adequacy and, indeed, the morale of our armed forces. I hope the Minister of National Defence will heed this concern. But I know that by keeping faith McCrae would also mean having a concern for our veterans and their continued welfare, and updating our remunerative measures to keep pace with the times. I know that was inherent in the faith, and I think Bill C-4 certainly conforms to that intention.

Senator Norrie: May I ask Senator Lang a question? Is there any provision for the education of the children of these veterans, especially those who were not disabled during the war?

Senator Lang: Not under these two acts. There may be other legislation, with which I am not too familiar, that deals with that aspect of the matter. I think this question might be directed to the witnesses in committee. They would have a thorough knowledge of the entire supportive system which would include those specific matters.

● (1440)

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: I congratulate the sponsor of the bill, Senator Lang, on the manner in which he has presented this very important bill.

Before turning to Bill C-4, I would like to digress for a moment, as he did, to a subject which concerns veterans, but in a different manner. I refer to Canada's participation in the 30th anniversary, which took place between June 5 and 7 of this year, of the Allied landings in Normandy. Under sponsorship of the Government of France, the Comité du Débarquement and the City of Caen organized a three-day series of events to mark this 30th anniversary, which I was most privileged to attend, of the D-Day landings. Canada was represented by a 160-man delegation headed by our ambassador to France, the Honourable Léo Cadieux, and our Minister of Veterans Affairs, the Honourable Daniel MacDonald. The names of all who attended, either as members of the official party or as honoured guests, cannot be given, but I would be remiss if I did not mention Senator Léopold Langlois, the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate, and Mr. G. A. Smith, M.P., from the other place. It was indeed a unique honour to assist the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Senator Langlois, General Dextraze, the Chief of the Defence Staff, Mr. J. S. Hodgson, Deputy Minister of Veterans Affairs, and Mr. Jean-E. Haché, Mr. MacDonald's executive assistant, to lay wreaths on behalf of the Canadian people.

Among the honoured guests stood many surviving commanders who led the formations which stormed the Normandy beaches and protected the landings from the sea and air. Rear Admiral Piers was there as senior Royal Canadian Navy officer; General Cunningham as senior representative of the infantry; Brigadier General Todd for the artillery, and Air Marshal Slemon as senior officer of the Royal Canadian Air Force. Last, but far from least, stood Judge Redmond Roche representing the Royal Canadian Legion, and the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Commons, Lieutenant-Colonel David Vivian Currie, who is one of that very small and diminishing band of Canadians who wear the Victoria Cross—they belong to the most exclusive club on earth, certainly the most difficult to gain admittance to.

As I stood beside these men at the ceremonies at Bénysur-Mer, Banville, Bayeux and Caen, I reflected on the Norman farmers and villagers whose homes were liberated so many years before, and yet who still spoke with voices of faltering emotion when recalling the agonies of 1944. In this modern age, when terrible events take place almost daily and are just as quickly forgotten, I wondered why these simple men and women of Normandy continue to dedicate the streets of their towns and villages and to erect monuments to Canadians. To be sure, our fighting men were given the formidable task of clearing the suburbs of Caen and of crossing the River Orne. By completing that task we gave those people back their freedom. It was all so long ago, and one would think 30 years have clouded their memories and watered down their gratitude, but this is not the case. Eventually, I realized that the affinity and historical ties that have linked Normandy and England for over 900 years, and Normandy and Canada for almost four centuries, were deeper and stronger than I had imagined. We had not come as strangers in 1944, but as cousins of a bygone day. We were accepted as kinsmen of William the Conqueror, of the men who first peopled Acadia and of the Englishmen who, having once been Norman subjects, then conquered New France.

In closing this all too brief outline of an occasion that deeply impressed me, I would like to note an inscription which is written in Latin on the frieze of the Bayeux Tapestry. I shall not attempt the Latin, but in the English translation it reads: "We, who were once conquered by William, now liberate the Conqueror's land." No inscription could better embody the essence of the ties that now link French-Normandy with Anglo-Saxon Britain and, hence, with English- and French-speaking Canada. In effect, it epitomizes the relationship of the two main-streams of our people and helps explain the continuing warmth and gratitude which is so freely given to us by the people of Normandy.

May I be permitted to say a few words regarding the graves of our Dead, and the neatness of the Canadian war cemeteries. They are so well kept and so impressive in appearance that it creates in one the feeling that their sacrifice was not in vain. Their peaceful rest leaves us with the belief that they have found the eternal happiness. It was my privilege to visit the Arlington National Cemetery in the United States of America, where some 160,000 American soldiers are buried, including two former Presidents, and the Honolulu Cemetery in Hawaii, where the victims of Pearl Harbour are buried. I was informed that those two main cemeteries are the best kept in the United States, but our cemeteries in France are as well kept, if not better. I offer my appreciation and thanks to those responsible.

Turning now to the business at hand, I should like to begin by providing some background to Bill C-4. The War Veterans Allowance Act first became law in 1930, three years after the Old Age Pension Act came into force. Based on the assumption that a man who had endured front-line service in the First World War had had his life span shortened by 10 years, the act provided essentially an old age pension for veterans. Whereas the civilian was obliged to wait until age 70, the war veteran now became eligible for benefits 10 years earlier, or at 60 years of age.

• (1450)

Since 1930 the act has been broadened to include not only veterans, plus their widows and orphans, of the First World War, but also those of the Northwest Field Force, the South African War, the Second World War and the Korean conflict.

Before looking at the proposed amendments, it is worthwhile summarizing the general terms under which Canadian Armed Forces personnel are eligible for benefits today. Such persons are:

1. All those who saw action in any of the four conflicts mentioned;
2. All those who are in receipt of a disability pension for wartime service, but who did not necessarily see front-line service;
3. Those who served in both the First and Second World Wars and were honourably discharged, but who were not necessarily in a theatre of war. Many men who enlisted in the Veterans' Guard during the Second World War are in this category;
4. Those who served a minimum of one year in England during the First World War, prior to the Armistice in 1918;
5. Veterans of the South African War (1899-1902); and
6. All those who served in the United Nations' Forces in Korea.

It must also be noted that veterans of other Commonwealth and Allied forces are eligible, provided they were domiciled in Canada when they enlisted in such forces, or, alternatively, resided in Canada for at least ten years prior to applying for benefits. The eligibility of widows, dependent children and orphans is determined by the eligibility of the veteran—the guiding principle by which the War Veterans Allowance Act has operated over the years.

During the First World War, some 626,000 young Canadians enlisted in our expeditionary forces out of a population of roughly seven and a half million. Of that number, more than 61,000 were killed and 173,000 wounded. In the call to arms for the Second World War—our population having increased to 12 million—over one million men and women joined the colours. Of that number, 42,000 died and some 54,500 were wounded. Again, between 1950 and 1954, 25,500 of our young saw service in Korea, of whom 424 were killed and 1,200 wounded.

It can thus be seen that over the 40-year period spanning the years 1914 to 1954, roughly 1,650,000 of our youth enlisted in Canada's Armed Forces to fight for freedom's cause, of whom some 104,000 were killed and nearly 230,000 wounded.

Taking these figures at face value, one might think that the War Veterans Allowance Act provides financial assistance for a very large number of our population. What must be remembered, however, is that the great majority of those who would otherwise be eligible are financially better off than the ceilings provided under the act. Again, many men and women who saw service only in Canada, and who were not disabled, are not eligible for benefits. Finally, time has accomplished what the war did not, as many veterans—particularly those of the First World War—have passed away.

To place things in perspective, the act, as Senator Lang explained a while ago, serves a “diminishing community” of 86,265 men and women. This figure includes 52,996 single men and women, 32,899 married veterans, and 370 orphans.

With the passage of this bill, the current ceilings will be raised and a few more veterans will likely become eligible to partake of the benefits, although their numbers are not expected to be large. This may momentarily increase the “diminishing community.”

The main impetus of Bill C-4 is to increase the allowance payable to veterans, their wives and dependent children, and to align those increases on a quarterly basis with the consumer price index as published by Statistics Canada.

Under the present act, a married veteran residing with his spouse can receive a monthly allowance of $257.21 if he has no other source of income. However, no consideration is given to his dependent children, as relief was always felt to have been provided for under the Family Allowances Act.

Under Bill C-4, the married veteran living with his spouse will receive an increased monthly rate of $312.90 and, as we shall see later on, if he has two dependent children he will receive an additional $60 toward their support, giving him a total of approximately $375 per month.

There can be no argument with the general thrust of this legislation, and most of the particular objectives of the bill cannot be faulted. There are one or two proposals that cause concern, but, before I refer to them, let us examine a few of the more significant proposals. They are:

1. Provision of a new allowance for dependent children, commencing October 1, 1974, and an allowance for each orphan of a veteran rather than the lump sum payment for three or more orphans which is now paid. This new allowance provides $50 per month for each dependent child, less any amount payable under the Family Allowances Act. In a family with two children, in receipt of monthly family allowance cheques of $20 each, this will mean an additional income of $60 per month. Hitherto, if a veteran left three or more orphans, the maximum monthly rate was a lump sum payment of $203.60, but now each orphan will receive $125 per month less any amount payable under the Family Allowances Act.

2. Provision for changes in the determination of allowances payable to veterans married to each other. This amendment deletes the restriction on the amount of combined personal property and real property that can be held by veterans married to each other. For example, a couple will no longer be ineligible for benefits should they own a $50,000 house or home, it being appreciated they must live somewhere and that taxes, upkeep and repair will still be required on such a holding. This is a sound proposal.

3. Provision of an allowance for a widow who was maintaining a veteran. The War Veterans Allowance Act has been very progressive in dealing with situations where a woman has been living common-law with a veteran. In most cases, such couples have been prevented from marrying by reason of a previous marriage, where a costly divorce has not been possible. The act's humane treatment and understanding in such cases is laudable.

The amendment in this case removes the requirement that the woman must establish that she was maintaining, as well as living with, the veteran for a set period of time prior to his death. Either residence with the veteran or maintenance of or by him for a period of three years—rather than the seven years under the present act—is enough to make the woman eligible to be deemed the widow of the veteran.

● (1500)

4. Provision to increase from 21 to 25 years the age until which a child may receive an allowance while following an approved course of instruction. This amendment removes an old anachronism in that the expenses required to maintain a dependent child at a college or university are probably highest at the age of 21 years. Those honourable senators who have families will realize how true that is. By increasing the eligibility to age 25, the only stipulation is that the boy or girl make satisfactory progress in the studies which he or she is undertaking, and that the course of instruction meets with the approval of the authorities of the War Veterans Allowance Board.

This amendment also deletes the discrepancy between the ages of a male child and a female child who do not pursue a course of higher learning. As the act now stands, no allowance can be paid to a male child over 16 years or to a female child over 17 years, unless enrolled in a course of higher learning. In both cases, under the proposed amendment, benefits would be cut off at the age of 17 years.

I have no argument with the four proposals I have just reviewed, but I should like to turn to two amendments which give me cause for some concern. The intent of these two proposals appears to be very liberal and fair-minded, but one is not quite what it appears to be and the other makes way for a situation which, surely, was not envisaged originally.

The first amendment would provide equality of status for both male and female recipients, which is all very well, and the various clauses and subclauses of the bill reflect this new equality in all instances, save one, that being the minimum ages at which a female veteran and a male veteran are entitled to receive benefits. That deals with the question put to Senator Lang by Senator Hicks a few moments ago. The male veteran must still wait until age 60 to receive an allowance, whereas a female veteran or the widow of a veteran can begin receiving benefits on reaching the age of 55. This inequality is all the more glaring when it is remembered that veterans who had been in action in the First World War were once considered as having forfeited ten years of their lives. When the Old Age Pension Act reduced the age limit from age 70 to age 65, why was the age for male veterans not automatically reduced to age 55? Also, why is it today that the equalities propounded by this bill appear to be more in favour of the female by five years?

Honourable senators, may I be permitted at this point to make a side comment with respect to this legislation? I have noticed with great interest that the Department of Veterans Affairs—and this is also true of the Department of National Health and Welfare in respect of Bill C-22, which Senator Carter introduced on Tuesday last—has enlarged its morality in that it now accepts a common-law wife after three years of so living as being eligible for benefits, and the children of such a common-law union as being eligible for at least $50 a month after deducting family allowance. So that a common-law wife—or, in the case of a female veteran, a common-law husband—or a veteran who served at least one year overseas will now be recognized as being eligible for benefits, and will be the recipient of a monthly allowance of $312.90. In addition, if there are two children of such a union, the monthly benefit will be $375.

I am a war veteran, having served three years, in Canada only, with the Military College of Inquiry. I am also a veteran of some 30 years of politics, comprising one year as councillor, two years as clerk controller, eight consecutive years as mayor, eight consecutive years as a member of the Ontario Legislature, and now some 12 years as a member of the Senate. I am informed by the Senate authorities that should I die tomorrow my widow would be the recipient of one-third of $8,000, which is $2,666.66, per year, or $222.22 per month, with no benefit accruing to any of my eight children. My question is this: After 34 years of happy marriage—with, I might add, only one bride—am I being penalized for serving my country at the municipal, provincial and federal levels in that I am not able to qualify on the same footing as a veteran qualifying under the War Veterans Allowance Act? In other words, am I to understand, bearing in mind the new morality the government exhibits in this bill and Bill C-22, to amend the Canada Pension Plan, that it would have been better for me to have had five children by my present wife and two or three by a common-law wife, so that, one way or the other, my family could qualify for a larger pension? I bring this fact to the attention of honourable senators to show that the Senate is not the gravy train the media would have people believe it is.

If we are required to continue serving with the same sincerity as we have in the past and if our indemnity is not increased, and if the pension benefits which accrue to our widows and children are not readjusted, I say to you, honourable senators, I will have to look for a job that will bring my family more in the event of my demise.

The second amendment that deserves attention deals with the creation of a new entitlement to an allowance for veterans' widowers who have attained the age of 60, the same age at which male veterans are now entitled to receive an allowance. In effect, this amendment means that a man who was never associated with the armed forces could, by virtue of having married a female veteran, receive benefits under this act. This amendment is in keeping with the already mentioned principle that, "all benefits flow from the veteran." But what if the widower in question had been a conscientious objector or a pacifist, and had refused to fight for his country? Should he then be receiving benefits under an act established for an entirely different purpose? The example I give is perhaps rare but, nevertheless, this proposal does open the door to such unwarranted recipients.

The second part of this bill amends the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, which was established to provide benefits to former merchant seamen, firefighters, ferry pilots, welfare workers and others who performed meritorious service during either of the two World Wars or the Korean conflict. The objectives in relation to this act are similar to those proposed for the War Veterans Allowance Act, and they can be briefly stated as follows:

● (1510)

1. To provide equality of status for males and females;
2. To provide a new benefit for the former widow, of a civilian, who has remarried;
3. To create a new entitlement to an allowance for civilians' widowers who have attained the age of 60 years;
4. To provide for allowances to be based on the amounts set out in the schedule to the War Veterans Allowance Act; and
5. To provide entitlement to an allowance for a widow who had lived common-law with a civilian, and had maintained him.

There are two groups that Bill C-4 does not consider, but which are deserving of future attention. The first is the men and women who are in the armed forces today, but who were too young to have served in Korea of the Second World War. Many have been sent to remote and dangerous places such as the Congo, Cyprus, the Middle East and the India-Pakistan frontier under the auspices of the United Nations, while others have served with the international truce supervisory commission in Vietnam. While those who suffered injury and disease are provided with some protection under the Pension Act, the majority, who endured the same privations but returned whole in body and spirit, have no protection under the War Veterans Allowance Act. They are perhaps too young to qualify for financial assistance at this time, but for those who may be without means in the years to come the act should provide access to the same benefits enjoyed by older veterans of today.

In respect of the second group my observation concerns the omission of an equalization clause from the bill. Because of the minimum income laws of some of the richer provinces, those in receipt of a veteran's allowance do better in those provinces than in others. For example, in British Columbia the minimum income level is $220 per month, whereas the monthly ceiling for a man on war veterans allowance is presently $201, which, as Senator Lang just mentioned, will go to $211. This means that the veteran residing in Vancouver receives an additional $19 a month from his province to bring him up to the minimum income level, while the veteran in Sydney, Nova Scotia, whose war experiences may have been just the same, can receive no more than the act's maximum ceiling of $201. In the same way, Ontario's guaranteed annual income system provides resident veterans with a higher income than their compatriots in Quebec and other provinces.

While these disparities have been brought about through provincial legislation, the War Veterans Allowance Act should nevertheless aim at treating all recipients of its benefits on a national scale. In this regard, future legislation might be considered to allow for the automatic adjustment of the ceiling under the act to equate with the highest provincial minimum income legislation. In this way, all veterans, wherever they may reside in their country, would receive exactly the same allowances.

Bill C-4 is a progressive piece of legislation and its passage should not be delayed at this time. Many recipients are in need of the additional allowances provided and, though certain retroactivity clauses ensure the new benefits from the summer of 1974, in my opinion it would be beneficial if royal assent could be granted before January 1, 1975, on which date the quarterly increases in respect of the consumer price index have been planned to take effect.

On motion of Senator Carter, debate adjourned.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

DELEGATION OF PARLIAMENTARIANS AND THEIR WIVES FROM THE PROVINCE OF SASKATCHEWAN

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I note with pleasure the presence in the gallery of a delegation of distinguished parliamentarians and their wives from the province of Saskatchewan.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. W. M. Benidickson moved the second reading of Bill C-27, to amend the Customs Tariff.

He said: Honourable senators, in view of the announcement made at the opening of this sitting by Madam Speaker that there will be a new budget on Monday next, interest in this financial bill and my remarks may be less than usual. In other words, anticipatory interest may exceed post-mortem interest, because the bill deals in part with some tidying up necessary after the defeat of the budget in May last—for the first time in Canadian history.

Honourable senators will remember that in his budget of February 19, 1973, the Minister of Finance temporarily reduced or eliminated the customs duties on a broad range of consumer goods. This, in conjunction with other commodity tax reductions, was designed to moderate upward pressures on prices directly by reducing the cost of imported products, and indirectly by increasing competition for Canadian producers, to ensure that they exercised moderation in their pricing in response to the increased demand. Those reductions were approved by the Senate, and given royal assent in July, 1973. The legislation provided that those reductions would remain in effect for only a one-year period, the minister having undertaken to carry out a thorough review before they expired in February of this year.

Relatively few complaints, I am informed, were received, and not all of them were well-founded. In some cases difficulties were resolved by reducing the duties on imported parts and materials. There were some complaints about the unilateral nature of those reductions. However, because the reductions were made for domestic reasons, and because they were temporary in nature, it was considered that they would not affect our bargaining position in multilateral trade negotiations.

In January 1974 the Minister of Finance proposed that most of those reductions be extended until June 30, 1974, and in the case of sugar, and sprinkler irrigation systems for farm and greenhouse use, until June 30, 1976. These proposals are covered in the present bill by Schedules I and II. These extensions apply to imports valued at $1.6 billion in 1973.

• (1520)

A few products such as some fresh fruits and vegetables, canned fruits and citrus fruit juices, were omitted from the extension. The proposed extension with respect to sugar is for a longer period, since the reductions in this case are based on recommendations made by the Tariff Board. The full reductions as recommended by the Tariff Board are not incorporated in this bill because of contractual obligations to maintain margins of preference on raw sugar for Commonwealth sugar producers.

Those proposals set out in Schedules I and II were still before the House of Commons when Parliament was dissolved. Also before the house was the proposal to eliminate the duty on petroleum products originally contained in a notice of Ways and Means motion tabled in the other house on October 23, 1973. These proposals are covered by Schedules III and IV of the present bill.

The duty rates in effect before October 23, 1973 varied between one-third of a cent and one cent per gallon. Considering current prices and the current supply-demand situation, the maintenance of tariffs on these products serves no useful purpose. Heavy fuel oils used by industry were already free, under a provision in the Customs Tariff which would have expired on June 30, 1974. This explains why it is being dealt with in a separate clause and schedule of this bill.

In summary, the tariff reductions set out in Schedule I of the bill expire on June 30 of this year. The reductions in Schedule II, which cover raw and refined sugar and related products, are to remain in effect until June 30, 1976. The reductions for petroleum products in Schedules III and IV are to remain in effect until October 23, 1975.

Honourable senators, to keep the record clear, and for those interested in the very large number of items referred to in the schedules, in my personal research I found that in House of Commons Debates of November 7, 1974, at page 1176, there seems to be an error in a reference to one of the Ways and Means resolutions tabled under rules that now apply there. Reference is made to a Ways and Means resolution tabled "on October 3, 1973." The House of Commons, I find, was not sitting on October 3, 1973. The reference probably should be to Ways and Means Motions noted in Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons on October 1 and October 2, 1974.

I also want to point out that while in the other place this bill was not referred to a standing committee but was dealt with, also on November 7 last, in Committee of the Whole, I assume it will be our usual practice to refer a financial bill of this kind to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, before which officials of the Department of Finance will appear. In due course, I will move that this bill be so referred.

Hon. John J. Connolly (Ottawa West): Honourable senators, before the adjournment of this debate, may I draw the attention of the sponsor of the bill, and of the Senate, to a matter that has arisen several times in the case of bills like this. I think it is fairly good practice for us to draw attention to instances where procedures that we advocated in other years have not been followed.

When Senator Benidickson was referring to the schedules, he indicated that in the Votes and Proceedings of the other place of October 1, 1974 the schedules were reproduced. Those schedules are much more helpful to the Senate than the schedules in the bill, because they give not only the proposed new rates for all of the items but also the rates which were in existence before this bill came to Parliament. For purposes of comparison, therefore, it is more convenient for senators and members of the committee to have both rates readily available. In that light, perhaps the sponsor would consider either circulating to the members of the committee that part of the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons containing the schedules, or having it printed in today's record so that the comparison will be available to all senators.

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, I shall take note of the comments of my experienced colleague. It will be remembered that I have complained in recent sessions that we frequently receive on our desks the text of bills as passed on third reading in the House of Commons. These copies of the bills frequently come without explanatory notes; they frequently come without having in the text on the left-hand side of the page the underlining which indicates the new phraseology which was passed in the other place. On the other hand, in the first reading edition of a bill there are usually both explanatory notes and these helpful, black underlinings indicating proposed changes.

I raised this matter with our own law clerk and with the Department of Justice last year but, despite some attempt at co-operation between the law clerks of the two houses and the printers, there was the requirement of speed in getting the legislation here, and no improvement has resulted, to my knowledge.

At any rate, perhaps Senator Connolly's remarks can be directed to Senator Hayden, the chairman of the committee, which I understand is meeting on Wednesday next. Copies of the original document in the other place, referred to by Senator Connolly, can be on the desks of members of the committee at that meeting.

Senator Flynn: If the bill passes second reading.

Senator Benidickson: If the bill passes second reading, yes, and if it is referred.

On motion of Senator Bélisle, debate adjourned.

EXPLOSIVES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Augustus Irvine Barrow moved the second reading of Bill S-17, to amend the Explosives Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill S-17, of which I have the honour to move second reading today, has two purposes: first, to update the act with respect to the rapid technological changes in the industry; second, to extend greater control over explosives, especially in the areas of purchase and possession of explosives.

The high rate of accidents in the explosives industry in the early 1900s, many of them involving considerable numbers of fatalities, emphasized the need for control. As a result, the first Explosives Act was drafted and introduced into the House of Commons in 1911, although it was not passed until three years later. Proclamation was delayed owing to the First World War and it was not until 1919, when the Explosives Division of the Department of Mines came into being, that a department was vested with the responsibility of administering the Explosives Act.

This statute is primarily an act of public safety designed to control the manufacture, testing, storage, sale and importation of explosives, and their transportation. In the 50 years following the proclamation of the act numerous changes were made to the regulations by Order in Council. The act itself was amended in 1926, in 1946 and again in 1954. The amendment of 1946 brought the sale of explosives under the control of the act, and allowed the seizure of unauthorized explosives and of all explosives used to commit offences under the act. That amendment also authorized the minister to order the destruction of abandoned or deteriorated explosives.

The amendment of 1954 revised the whole act into the second consolidation of statutory orders and regulations. The same year an Order in Council revised the regulations dealing with the transportation of explosives. The major significance of this change was that it increased the amount of explosives that could be transported by road to a maximum of 10,000 pounds.

The value of the legislation has been clearly demonstrated during the last 50 years by a significant reduction in the number of accidents. For example, during the four years immediately prior to the introduction of the Explosives Act in 1911 there were 42 fatalities in the manufacture of an estimated 40,000 tons of explosives. By comparison, during the past four years there has been only one fatal accident in the manufacture of approximately 900,000 tons of commercial blasting explosives. The industry ranks among the top ten safest industries in Canada.

In addition, there has been a significant reduction in the number of accidents associated with the use of explosives in construction and mining due mainly to the power under the act to control the testing and authorization of explosives. In effect, all explosives, either manufactured or imported for use in Canada, undergo stringent authorization tests to ensure that only the safest possible explosives are available to the Canadian user.

At the present time there are some 68 factories licensed under the act to manufacture explosives. These fall into five major categories: those which manufacture commercial blasting explosives; those which manufacture blasting accessories; those which manufacture ammunition; those which manufacture fireworks; and those which manufacture military explosives and pyrotechnics.

In 1972, Bill C-7, to amend the Explosives Act, was introduced in the other place but received only first reading before Parliament was dissolved. As a result nothing further was done.

The bill before us today not only seeks to modernize the legislation, but also proposes certain changes to control more effectively the distribution of explosives. The bill proposes to regulate the purchase and possession of blasting explosives, and to make the purchaser responsible for the explosives in his possession. This control will not apply, however, to the purchase of sporting ammunition, propellant powders and components, or other industrial explosives. The bill will also make it an offence to be in possession of explosives which were not legally manufactured, purchased or imported. It will make it an offence to abandon explosives. This year there have been at least 150 incidents of abandoned or deteriorated explosives, involving approximately 9,000 pounds of dynamite and 40,000 detonators, which it has been necessary to recover and destroy. All of these incidents have been the direct result of carelessness by some individual or company.

● (1540)

The bill also provides for the introduction of a uniform national standard for magazines in order to improve security against theft. In 1973 there were 27 incidents of theft from magazines of minimum security.

The bill proposes the introduction of regulations detailing methods and tests for the authorization of explosives, and for publishing a list of authorized explosives for the information of the public.

Finally, the bill seeks authority to regulate the use of fireworks and explosives in areas within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada, which will make possible the introduction of a uniform national "use" code for both fireworks and explosives.

Honourable senators, if the bill receives second reading, I shall move that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

THIRD REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the third report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

Hon. Eugene A. Forsey moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, the reason why I have not proceeded with this earlier is that certain difficulties arose about the translation of the criteria which the committee proposed to use in its consideration of the regulations and statutory instruments submitted to it. Those difficulties have now been overcome, and I should like to ask that the revised French version of the criteria might be printed as an appendix to the French edition of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day, and the Debates of the Senate of this day. The changes are very small, I think, and quite technical matters. I do not think they involve any difference of principle, but when literary and legal experts get together, or rather, when they sometimes fail to get together, on these matters, you can have a certain amount of difficulty of a technical nature.

Senator Flynn: Agreed.

Senator Forsey: The other thing I want to mention at this time is simply a matter of a misprint—a small misprint—in the English version of the criteria at page 80 of our Minutes of the Proceedings of November 7, where criterion 5 (a) says, "tend directly," and it should be "tends," because there is a singular subject for all these. This is, therefore, a small misprint to which I thought I should draw attention.

I think that is all that it is necessary to say about this. I do not think there is any need to take up the time of the Senate further, unless someone has a question to ask about what is involved.

I should have added, perhaps, that I have the document here for the purposes of the Table.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, November 19, at 2 p.m.

ERSKINE CHILDERS

DEATH OF PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC OF IRELAND—QUESTION

Senator O'Leary: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. Can he tell the house why the flag was not half-masted on this building out of respect for the President of the Republic of Ireland, who died last Saturday and is being given a state funeral in Dublin today? I ask this question because we have been half-masting our flag from time to time, quite properly so, for the heads of state, including any "banana republic" in the world, but apparently we are not doing it now for the head of a nation with which we have had a long association and which actually gave one of her sons, Thomas D'Arcy McGee, as a martyr to make this nation possible.

Senator Perrault: I thank the honourable senator for his question. I want to assure him that, as is the custom on sad occasions of this kind, the flag will be at half-mast on the day of the funeral, which I understand will be Thursday, Canadian time.

Senator O'Leary: Thank you.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator Langlois moved the third reading of Bill S-6, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I should like to make a few remarks on this bill on third reading. The bill came before the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, and we were delighted to have in attendance at one meeting the Honourable Otto Lang, who discussed the advantages of the bill. It is really a non-controversial bill. It received unanimous consent by our committee, and I am sure it will pass unanimously today.

As honourable senators will recall, it merely provides for an amendment to the Canadian Wheat Board Act so that a final payment on any one-year pool will always be made after January 1 in the year following the closing of that pool. In other words, it will not again be possible for the government and the Wheat Board to make two final payments in one calendar year. Because this bill was before our committee, we were able to have as witnesses representatives of the Malting Institute, who brought the attention of the committee to an important point to them, and recommended a change in the Canadian Wheat Board Act to provide for a separate grade for malting barley.

Senator McNamara: In the pool.

Senator Argue: In the pool. As the grading system and the pooling system by the Canadian Wheat Board operate at the present time, there is no separate accounting for the returns from malting barley so far as the producer is concerned. Malting barley carries a premium, but the producer will not get the whole premium; he will get a part of it, since it is paid into the total barley pool, in which most of the barley is not malting grade.

The producers of malting barley are not receiving the full price in today's market. They are losing about $1 per bushel because there is not a separate malting barley grade in the Canadian Wheat Board accounts. The premium on malting barley is paid into the Canadian Wheat Board pools and distributed to all barley producers. That is not the way to encourage the production of malting barley. The producer has a high-value quality product which is in continuous and growing demand both in Canada and in the export market. Indeed, it is in very short supply in today's market, and yet the farmer receives for it the same return from the Canadian Wheat Board pool accounts as he would have if it were sold as feed barley. This is unfair to the producers. It is also an unwise policy because it effectively discourages the production of malting barley.

The maltsters have for many years attempted to encourage the production and sale of malting barley by paying directly to the producers 15 cents a bushel over and above the price they pay to the Wheat Board. This was an incentive in the past when prices for barley for feed or malt were low and the markets were restricted. But now when feed barley on the open market is providing a cash price of around $2.50 a bushel, the extra 15 cents a bushel over the initial Canadian Wheat Board price of $1.65 is not that competitive, and it is certainly not an adequate incentive for producers to take the extra care required in producing and marketing malting barley.

Something has to be done. The Brewing and Malting Barley Research Institute, the spokesmen for the maltsters in Canada, appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture on October 31 while we were considering this bill. They wanted to make this problem known to us—it is a problem for both the malting barley producers and the malting barley industry—and they wanted our help in solving this problem. I think that we wanted to help both the producers and the industry. I am personally convinced that it is necessary now to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act to establish a separate grade for malting barley. I am further convinced that there is substantial and growing support for such action, and that our Committee on Agriculture can play a constructive role in helping to bring this about.

When the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, the Honourable Otto Lang, appeared before the committee on Wednesday last, we impressed upon him the need to do something and that, in the opinion of some of us, a malting barley grade should be established. I expect that our committee will be looking into this problem very seriously, hearing representations from the Canadian Wheat Board, the wheat pools and other farm organizations. I think it is good news for barley producers, for the malting industry, and for beer drinkers, that this problem has been raised before the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and that the committee is optimistic it can assist in helping to achieve a better grading system for malting barley, a just return to producers, and security of supply to maltsters and beer drinkers. I think that more and more organizations and individuals are supporting this position.

Honourable senators, before I conclude I should like to say a word about a somewhat companion bill to this legislation. Introduced in the other place, it provides for an increase in the total amount of the interest-free cash advances that can be made on farm-stored grain. Cash advances have been with us by law for about 17 years. The maximum a farmer can obtain now by way of cash advances in the fall is $6,000.

● (1420)

Senator Grosart: On a point of order, honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Argue would give us the designation of the bill to which he is referring and let us know if it is before us.

Senator Argue: No, it is not. It is Bill C-10.

Senator Grosart: Otherwise, I suggest that it cannot be discussed in this context.

Senator Argue: I quite admit that I was going somewhat beyond the scope of Bill S-6, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, but one thing I have found about the Senate, except for perhaps a few senators, is that it is not quite as rigid as the other place in the application of the rules. If Senator Flynn were in his seat I think he would say that when bills dealing with the principle of an amendment to the Canadian Wheat Board Act were before the other place it was the custom—perhaps not a good custom, but at any rate the custom—to let the debate be somewhat far-ranging.

Senator Grosart: I must say in reply that the honourable senator is quite out of order in suggesting that another senator might take a position different from the one I have taken.

Senator Argue: That is not what I said.

Senator Grosart: Secondly, there is a good reason for the rule. Our rules are not put in the rule book merely for the fun of it. There are good reasons for these rules, and I might suggest to honourable senators that there is an excellent reason for having the rule that we do not discuss a bill which is in the Commons and has not yet come to us. I am not raising the point merely for the purpose of sticking to the rules. I am raising it for the purpose of sticking to a most important principle.

Senator Argue: The reason I referred to Senator Flynn was that he was a Deputy Speaker in the other place and, as a consequence of that, would certainly be aware that that was a practice.

At any rate, we have before us a particular amendment to the Canadian Wheat Board Act. Perhaps I went beyond the scope of this bill in discussing the question of malting barley and the special malting barley grade, but I submit that good service has been done to date and that raising this problem is the right thing to do, even though technically it may be beyond the rather limited provisions of the bill before us. I say this because I think we are performing a service if we say that this bill to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act does certain commendable things, but perhaps certain other things should be done at the same time to amend the act.

If Senator Grosart will just bear with me, I can conclude what I want to say in a couple of sentences. With respect to the matter of cash advances, it is proposed to increase the total amount available from $6,000 to $15,000 a year. That is commendable in my opinion, but what has been overlooked to date—and I raise this now with the full intention of raising it in the Senate again if the other place continues to overlook it—is that in that measure there is no provision to increase the amount of cash advance per bushel. The bill merely provides that if a farmer has a large number of bushels he can get a large cash advance, but a small farmer cannot get more than $1.50 a bushel by way of a cash advance, even though the initial price for wheat is soon to go to $3.50 a bushel. I suggest that a small, niggardly cash advance of $1.50 a bushel is inadequate in this context.

I make these remarks hoping that somebody in the other place will be reading Senate Hansard and might get a good idea. I do suggest that it is a good idea and that, since it comes from us, instead of being just a place of sober second thought, the Senate might be a place which gives some effective leadership once in a while. I recommend this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

STATUTE LAW (VETERANS AND CIVILIAN WAR ALLOWANCES) AMENDMENT BILL, 1974

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, November 14, the debate on the motion of Senator Lang for the second reading of Bill C-4, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators, this is an excellent bill, and I do not want to delay its passage. I do, however, wish to make a few brief remarks on second reading.

We have come a long way since the War Veterans Allowance Act was introduced in 1930. At that time it was based on the assumption that veterans who served in the theatre of war, by reason of their battle experience, had pre-aged by a period of ten years. At that time old age pensions were available at age 70, and with that as a bench mark it was decided that war veterans' allowances would automatically be paid to war veterans at age 60, in accordance with a means test. Time has proved that that theory of aging was wrong. We veterans have fooled them on that one. The average age now of World War I veterans is around 79, while the average age of World War I pensioners is nearly 81. So the theory has proved wrong. The justification now, however, rests on a sounder basis. It rests on the basis of the invisible scars of battle, which, though not affecting the longevity of the group as a whole, have left marks on many individuals and have affected the course of their lives.

Over the years the War Veterans Allowance Act has been given many refinements and improvements. Supplementary benefits have been made available through the special assistance fund. Casual earnings have been introduced, and there has been a modification of the means test. Then came the cost-of-living escalation and the introduction of the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, which made pensions available to civilians who served in a theatre of war—merchant seamen, foresters, fire fighters, Red Cross workers, auxiliary service workers, and the air crews of the Ferry Command.

Now we have a bill before us which extend these improvements still further by providing allowances for children, an escalation of payments based on the maximum permissible ceiling instead of on the maximum permissible allowance, as in the present legislation. Another escalation is to be calculated quarterly, based on the consumer price index instead of being calculated yearly, as at present.

The bill provides for the equality of status of women, putting the male and female veterans on an equal basis, and it recognizes up to the age of 25 a widow's or a widower's children who are attending school.

These are all tremendous benefits. Of these four benefits, in my opinion, the allowances for children are really the most important. Perhaps these allowances for children will not be of great interest to the majority of veterans, because the veterans of World War II now have reached the average age of 58.8 years, which is nearly 59 years, and most of their children have grown up and gone, and are making lives for themselves. But this provision will be a godsend to a certain group of veterans who, because they are under the age of 60, could not qualify for benefits under war veterans' allowances legislation unless they could provide a medical certificate to the effect that they were totally and permanently unemployable and incapable of supporting themselves. A person in that condition is incapable of making any casual earnings whatever, and consequently is limited totally to the income he receives as war veterans' allowance, with a possible supplement from the special assistance fund.

● (1430)

These younger veterans, and here I am referring to those under 60, are the ones most likely to have children attending school. But up until now they have received the smallest amount of benefit from this legislation, because heretofore the War Veterans Allowance Act has never made any provision for children. This is something that I personally have advocated for many years, not only here in the Senate but in the other place, and it makes me very happy to see that at long last such a provision has been included.

The method adopted to provide for escalation is worthy of note because it reverses the process which has been in effect and which will continue in effect until the passage of this legislation. In the past we have always escalated the war veterans allowance which is much smaller than the maximum permissible ceiling, in fact it is several hundred dollars smaller. Now, by escalating the larger figure and by adding that to the war veterans allowance we are providing a much greater benefit to the veteran. Furthermore, the quarterly escalation in accordance with the consumer price index will enable the veteran to benefit from this legislation much more frequently. Now he will receive the benefits of this provision every three months rather than having to wait until the end of the calendar year. It is also to be noted with respect to the escalation that this bill provides these particular benefits retroactively to October, 1973. I should like to point out here that there may be instances of veterans who have applied and have been disqualified under the act as it existed up to now but who will qualify when this bill becomes law. I hope that those applications already made will not be lost sight of and that action will be taken to ensure that all applications received, and dating back to October, 1973, will be reviewed.

Unfortunately there still remains some discrimination in the existing act which has not been removed by this bill. This discrimination affects mainly people under the age of 65. The reason is that veterans over 65 who are in receipt of the old age pension and the guaranteed annual income have had the old age security pensions escalated by the amount of the increase in the cost-of-living index over a period of years, by 5 per cent or 6 per cent as the case may be, and these escalations by legislation or by regulation have been made exempt. This means that while we are improving the legislation in some ways, there still will be circumstances where different payments will be made to veterans in similar circumstances. Veterans over 65 years of age, because of that exemption, will be subject to a total maximum permissible ceiling considerably greater than those veterans who are under 65 years of age. Although the circumstances may be the same. I see no easy manner in which to correct this situation, except to overhaul the system completely. The suggestion on behalf of the Royal Canadian Legion is that this be done, and I support that recommendation.

I also had a hope that this new legislation would abolish the means test. This is another recommendation of the Royal Canadian Legion that I am very happy to support.

The veterans receiving the benefits provided in this legislation are now getting along in years. The oldest veterans of World War I are reaching 80 years of age and over, and those of World War II are now around the 60-year mark, and some are older. The application of the means test is still somewhat degrading and humiliating, and I hope that the time will soon come when we abolish it.

I have two other disappointments with respect to this bill. One is that it does not remove the 365-day qualification for veterans of World War I. Veterans who served overseas for 364 days cannot qualify for benefits, but those who served 365 days can. Veterans, members of the Merchant Navy and Foresters can qualify by having served overseas for six months during World War II. In view of the few old-timers who remain from World War I, it is time to remove this disqualification provision of 365 days.

My other disappointment is in relation to the residence requirements. Many Canadians living overseas need the benefits that would be available to them under this legislation if they resided in Canada. If they wish to qualify for these benefits they must return to Canada and take up residence here for one year. Then they can return to where they were living overseas and draw the benefits. It seems to me that the time has come when this residential requirement should be removed and we should recognize that all Canadian veterans are entitled to be treated equally. Since this legislation is intended to take care of need in the case of veterans, we should provide for needy Canadians whether they live in Canada or elsewhere. However, apart from those deficiencies to which I have drawn attention, this bill is excellent and will be a blessing to all recipients of war veterans' allowances and civilian war allowances. I give it my very strong support.

● (1440)

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, after hearing the fine speeches given by Senators Lang, Bélisle and Carter, there is no point in discussing the bill at any length. Those honourable senators explained fully the effect of the proposed amendments. I merely wish to say that I agree with everything they said.

The bill is a good one and will overcome, at least to some extent, the inequities which have existed until now in the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act. Its provisions will enable veterans to overcome to some extent the ever-increasing cost of living.

The 12 amendments contained in the bill will affect a great many people. It is interesting to note that the 1971 census indicated there were nearly one million veterans living in Canada, of whom more than 80 per cent were married, a great many with dependent children.

The Department of Veterans Affairs estimates that there are nearly two million Canadians who are potentially entitled to one or more benefits under veterans' legislation. I noticed that as of March 31 last the department had more than 300,000 active clients, if that is the proper term—including disability pensioners, War Veterans Allowance recipients, patients in veterans' hospitals, widows, orphans, children receiving education assistance, and persons holding contracts under the Veterans Land Act.

It is also of interest to note that the Veterans Affairs portfolio includes four important agencies, which, while autonomous, report to Parliament through the minister. They are the Canadian Pension Commission, the War Veterans Allowance Board, the Pension Review Board, and the Bureau of Pensions Advocates. So this is actually a very important department. I should like to pay tribute to the present minister. He not only understands and appreciates the problems of veterans, he has their trust and confidence. In my opinion, he is the right man in the right place. I do not say that simply because his name happens to be "MacDonald" or because he served with the Cape Breton Highlanders during World War II.

Senator Argue: It all helps.

Senator Macdonald: Of course. When Senator Lang sponsored an amendment to the War Veterans Allowance Act in March 1973, he made an observation which bears repeating. He said:

The country's debt to these veterans can only be most inadequately recognized whatever may be the money's worth of these allowances.

So may I express the hope that some day the government may completely overhaul this legislation, for the sake of simplicity, adequacy and generosity.

Honourable senators, I borrow that statement, and, indeed, make it my own. I believe it would be most beneficial if all legislation pertaining to veterans were combined under one act, and that the one piece of legislation should be so drafted that it could easily be understood by the ordinary veteran.

I do not think anyone would be bold enough to claim that the amendments contained in Bill C-4 are easily followed or understood. In it we find long, involved sentences, impossible to comprehend unless one has before him the explanatory notes. I have long been an advocate of having legislation drafted in a simpler, more easily understood manner. Surely there could be a better definition of a dependent child than the one given on page 2 of the bill. The explanatory note reads:

The proposed definition of dependent child is for purposes of clarification and is consequential on the amendments contained in subclause 4(4) and clauses 5 and 12.

In order to clarify the term, the following is the definition in subsection 2 of clause 3:

"dependent child" means a child described in paragraph 12(1)(a), (b) or (c) and a child to whom an allowance may be paid under subsection 12(2);

Honourable senators, I have grave doubts whether many veterans will be enlightened by that clarification. It would be well if all legislation for veterans were completely overhauled for the sake of "simplicity, adequacy, and generosity."

I should like to have seen the bill go further, particularly with regard to allowances. There should not be any qualifying time for service overseas in order to obtain an allowance. Indeed, I would go much further. I should like to see the act so amended that anyone who served in the armed forces anywhere would be eligible. I do not agree with the theory that the so-called "burnt-out" allowance should be considered as an early old age pension. My position is very clear. It is that the men and women who served in any of the wars in which Canada participated were called upon by the country to make an extraordinary sacrifice. Whether or not they returned to civilian life unharmed is beside the point. They were called upon to perform an extraordinary duty, an extraordinary task. They did so, and a grateful country should see to it that their wants are now taken care of. The country should be proud to do so.

Should there be any criticism of the way Canada treats its veterans—now long after the Second World War—such criticism should be because we are treating veterans too generously and not because we are not treating them generously enough. Those people deserve the best, and they should get it.

Honourable senators, there is one other matter that I should like to mention that is of concern to veterans, although it is not part of this bill. I understand the deadline for those holding qualification certificates under the Veterans Land Act is March 31, 1975. I believe this to be wholly wrong. The Veterans Land Act has been a beneficial piece of legislation. It has enabled thousands of veterans to build homes under very favourable conditions. It has worked well, and I cannot see why it should not be left in full force and effect until there are no longer any applications from those holding eligibility certificates.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macdonald: I know it has been stated that there will be new legislation with reference to veterans' housing. There may be new legislation, but I am doubtful if it will be as good as the present act from the point of view of the veteran.

I should like to say, in closing, that the action of the Minister of Veterans Affairs, in proposing to build a new veterans' hospital in Halifax, is most commendable and greatly appreciated. As I mentioned earlier, Bill C-4 is a good one, and we on this side of the house are happy to support it.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I had not intended to participate in this debate, and am unprepared. The papers before me are misleading. They relate to the next item on the Order Paper, the bill that I sponsored last week, which I believe will be further debated later today.

However, I am prompted to speak on Bill C-4 because, in my opinion, we have just had in this debate a rather beautiful demonstration of the generosity and objectivity of honourable senators.

● (1450)

Senator Lang, as he has done in sponsoring other veterans legislation in this chamber in the past, made an excellent speech in moving second reading of this bill. He quite properly pointed out that the Liberal government for which he spoke has not forgotten the veteran, and this bill represents a further improvement in the position of the veterans.

Senator Lang's speech was followed by one of the best speeches I have heard for a long time in a review of veterans' benefits, that being the speech made on November 14 by Senator Bélisle of the Opposition party in this chamber. His was an eloquent and informative speech. In listening to his speech it occurred to me that if I myself could possibly forget the number of people from this relatively small nation who participated in either of the two World Wars and the Korean conflict, and the diminishing number that is affected by the legislation before us, how many others who are not veterans have been forgetting.

More than anything else, I was prompted to speak at this time by the remarks made by Senator Macdonald, the Whip of the Official Opposition in this chamber. In his remarks, Senator Macdonald paid tribute to the present Minister of Veterans Affairs, Mr. MacDonald, who is a member of a different political party from Senator Macdonald's. This type of thing is not untypical of the debates which, fortunately, we have in the Senate. Through the weekly meetings that take place elsewhere on the Hill, I have come to know the Honourable Mr. MacDonald, and to appreciate his value to veterans as the current Minister of Veterans Affairs.

In my almost 30 years in Parliament I have been associated with a number of Ministers of Veterans Affairs. It would be, of course, a mistake to start mentioning former good ministers by name. One always gets in trouble by following such a course of particularization. However, on the last occasion that legislation was introduced in this chamber increasing veterans' benefits, it was sponsored by Senator Daniel Lang, and the excellent Minister of Veterans Affairs at that time was our colleague, Senator Arthur Laing who I deeply regret, due to illness, is unable to be with us today.

To illustrate some of the goodness of politics, I draw the attention of honourable senators to a letter I received a day or two ago from one of the most famed and kindly Ministers of Veterans Affairs, the Honourable Milton Gregg, V.C. Honourable senators may wonder what he was writing about. He was writing as sponsor of a fund to assist in a worthy charitable project of the wife of the Honourable Hugh John Flemming, a member of the Diefenbaker government and with opposite political views. Mr. Gregg and Mr. Flemming were leaders in New Brunswick of opposing political parties. Incidents such as this have not been unknown to me in the period I have been in Parliament, both in the other place and in this chamber. It is typical of many of the things not known about political life, and combatants in it.

I have enjoyed being Senator Croll's deskmate. We sat together for many years in the other place after World War II. We were elected to the other place after that war in 1945 and sat steadily, while we were members of the House of Commons, as interested members studying the Veterans Charter in the Veterans Affairs Committee. Another most active member of that committee during that period was Senator Carter, who has continued to be a constant friend of the veterans. He too, spoke eloquently in relation to this bill this afternoon. Relationships such as these are the rewards of public service.

Once again, I want to pay tribute to Senator Macdonald for the generosity he exhibited in his speech to another MacDonald, as well as to Senator Bélisle, Senator Lang, and all other honourable senators who have spoken in this debate.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

[Senator Benidickson.]

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science. While I am on my feet, I should like to announce that the committee will be sitting, as soon as the house rises this afternoon in Room 260-N, to consider this bill.

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, November 14, the debate on the motion of Senator Benidickson for the second reading of Bill C-27, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, it gives me great pleasure to participate in this debate and to follow the brief but eloquent and very informative remarks of Senator Benidickson. He was most generous in his comments regarding my speech on Bill C-4. If Senator Forsey will permit, I should like to borrow a phrase he used some two or three years ago, which is as follows, "Il a l'habileté de laisser parler son cœur avec tant de générosité que je vous en suis très reconnaissant."

The purpose of Bill C-27 is to implement the proposed tariff reductions which were before the other place at the time of dissolution of the 29th Parliament. Since we on this side of the chamber are great believers in the liberalization of trade—and this is not a pun—we can do no more but to lend our wholehearted support to tariff reductions of any kind. We sincerely hope that the government is introducing this legislation because it has finally acquired a proper understanding of fundamental economic principles.

The reduction of trade barriers can have three beneficial effects. It can permit the Canadian economy to gain from specialization a comparative advantage in production for domestic as well as foreign markets; it can help the developing nations to help themselves by making it easier for them to trade with the richer, more industrialized countries; and it can help build friendly relations between Canada and other nations.

● (1500)

It is debatable whether tariff protection offers benefits to our domestic industry. At the outset the tariff will bring the domestic producer a price advantage and higher profits over his foreign competitor; it will not, on the other hand, protect the producer from domestic competition, and original gains from tariff advantage will tend to be lost.

The benefits of tariff protection are illusory. Domestic owners and workers are competing in an industry erected on a false base supported by the threat of force instead of by voluntary choices. The force is directed against consumers. Somebody has to pay for the privilege accorded the producer and his employees. That somebody is the consumer, and he gets it in the neck. He has to pay the prices inflated by protective tariffs.

Tariffs put the whole economy on an artificial foundation instead of a sound business foundation. To say that tariffs cannot be removed when an industry or nation has become adjusted to operating under trade restrictions is no different in principle from arguing against all technological change and advance.

Another myth is that tariffs should be removed gradually in order not to offend those who have a direct interest in the protected industry. What about the offence to the Canadian consumer? What about giving the consumer a break? Why not give the consumer the benefit of lower prices?

You know, honourable senators, governments grow strong and dictatorial by the granting of special favours. Trade restrictions are just another of the handouts which a government can grant, thereby increasing its power over individuals to the detriment of all. Just witness the current dispute with the United States over the quotas on imports of Canadian cattle and hogs. I am not going to debate that question today. Trade restrictions of this nature, imposed by governments, contribute to scarcity rather than abundance. And who suffers? Not governments, but you and I—the consumer, the producer, the small businessman.

We favour the abundance of goods and services that are widely distributed because it contributes to a high standard of living, and a high standard of living depends on the free trade of goods and services at competitive prices. There are great benefits to be gleaned from free trade; it removes the artificial barriers of tariffs, quotas and price increases which can be passed along to the consumer. We favour the removal of tariffs because it restores justice to consumers.

Honourable senators, last night it was refreshing to hear the Minister of Finance, the Honourable John Turner, continue his drive against inflation and restate the government's intentions to reduce tariffs. I am sure we shall have an opportunity to study this subject later, but suffice it to say that we welcome the extension of temporary tariff reductions on $1 billion worth of consumer goods annually to June 30, 1976, and the substantial exemptions, or duty-free allowances, for tourists returning to Canada.

Honourable senators, this bill is a step in the right direction, and, hesitant though that step may be, I would not want my words to be construed as anything but encouragement for further braver steps along these lines.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Senator Benidickson, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

EXPLOSIVES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, November 14, the debate on the motion of Senator Barrow for the second reading of Bill S-17, to amend the Explosives Act.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, before making a few brief comments on Bill S-17, I should like to congratulate Senator Barrow on his excellent introduction of it. As you know, this was the first time he addressed this chamber, and he certainly acquitted himself well. As a fellow Nova Scotian, I am pleased that he has already shown he will be making a fine and useful contribution to the work of the Senate.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macdonald: Of course, I was not surprised at this. While I did not know him personally before he came here, I did know him by reputation, and I can assure you, honourable senators, that over the years he has earned for himself a great reputation in Nova Scotia. He has earned for himself a reputation as a man of ability, of professional competence, skill and real integrity.

As was pointed out, the general purpose of these amendments is to provide for greater control over explosives, especially in those areas relating to the purchase, possession and transportation of such explosives. I am sure that this is a worthy objective. Personally, I feel that the stricter the regulations concerning explosives, the better.

I was interested to learn that there are in Canada 68 factories licensed to manufacture explosives. I was most gratified to know that the present act and the regulations made thereunder have been so effective that there has been only one fatal accident in the past four years, during which period about 900,000 tons of commercial blasting explosive have been manufactured in Canada. The record is good, and to keep it good it will be necessary to make amendments to the act and the regulations from time to time.

There is nothing controversial about the act, and I support all but one of the proposed amendments. I notice that the definition of "authorized explosives" is changed. Under the present act "authorized explosive" means "any explosive that is declared by the minister to be an authorized explosive." In other words, it is in the discretion of the minister. The proposed amendment is:

"authorized explosive" means any explosive that is declared to be an authorized explosive in accordance with the regulations.

● (1510)

Why the change is made I do not know. In any event, it serves to narrow the definition, as the regulations must be made by the Governor in Council, whereas formerly an authorized explosive could be declared by the minister.

I notice also that mention is made in the act itself of what it calls "efficient inspection" by provincial authorities. Indeed, there are two places where I should like to make a short comment on this principle. For example, the act itself defines a magazine as follows:

"magazine" means any building, storehouse, structure or place in which any explosive is kept or stored, but does not include (a) a place at or in and for the use of a mine or quarry in a province in which provision is made by the law of such province for the efficient inspection of mines and quarries and explosives used in connection therewith—

Further on in the section 16, dealing with inquiries into accidents, we find that the minister may direct an inquiry to be made when an accident occurs, but then subsection (3) says:

This section does not apply where an accident has been caused by an explosion of an explosive occurring in any mine or quarry or metallurgical work in any province in which provision is made by the law of such province for a proper and thorough investigation and inquiry into the cause of such accident.

The question I ask is: Who is to be the judge; who is to say that a province has such laws? I will not presume to say that the minister proposes to do this but it is a point which, while not too important, I would like to see clarified.

The bill also provides some increased penalties for offences under the act. I do not know how many prosecutions there are in an average year or how common such offences are, but I presume the increased penalties are to act as a deterrent. If not, then they must be just the result of inflation.

Honourable senators, I mentioned that there is one clause in the bill that I do not agree with. I direct your attention to clause 21(2). Clause 21 outlines offences under the act, but subclause (2) says this:

No person shall be convicted under this section of having an explosive in his possession if he establishes that he manufactured, imported or purchased the explosive in accordance with the requirements of this Act and the regulations.

In other words, all that is saying is that a person will not be convicted of the offence if he can prove that he did not commit it. That is a direct violation of the great principle of our criminal law that a person is innocent until he is proven guilty. Another great principle is that the Crown must prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. This is something I would like to see eliminated by the committee when this bill goes before it.

Apart from that, I am in general agreement with the clauses contained in this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Senator Barrow, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn, to re-assemble at the call of the bell at 8 o'clock this evening. I take this opportunity to remind honourable senators that the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science will be sitting in a few moments in room 260-N to consider Bill C-4, which has just received second reading.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

STATUTE LAW (VETERANS AND CIVILIAN WAR ALLOWANCES) AMENDMENT BILL, 1974

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Senator Carter, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, reported that the committee had considered Bill C-4, to amend the War Veterans Allowances Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, and had directed that the bill be reported without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Langlois moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Douglas D. Everett moved second reading of Bill S-15, to amend the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill S-15 is an act to amend the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce Act. That act gives certain powers to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and the ones that are relevant to the purposes of this bill amendment are in section 5 which begins:

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce shall

(a) promote the establishment, growth and efficiency of manufacturing, processing and tourist industries in Canada, contribute to the sound development and productivity of Canadian industry generally and foster the expansion of Canadian trade.

This is followed by subsection (e), which requires the minister to "provide support services for industrial and trade development, including information, import analysis and traffic services."

Under section 6 of the act:

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, in exercising his powers and carrying out his duties and functions under this Act,

(a) shall, where appropriate, make use of the services and facilities of other departments, branches or agencies of the Government of Canada.

It is clear from the requirements of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce Act that one of the main duties of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is to encourage the growth of Canadian manufacturing and processing industries, for it is through this endeavour that Canada can improve its balance of trade by reducing imports and increasing exports. It is through the development of Canadian manufacturing and processing industries that we can develop Canadian business enterprises, and increase employment.

Clearly, as is well known to honourable senators, Canada imports an enormous amount of its annual consumption of goods. If it were possible to replace those imported goods by goods manufactured in Canada we would achieve one of the main objectives of the powers conferred on the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

In order to know what sort of industry should be developed to manufacture goods to replace imported goods, we must know what sort of goods we are bringing into Canada, and we must know what they are with some precision, for it is on that knowledge that we can develop the potential for new industries which can manufacture the goods to replace those imports. The analyzing of this sort of information is known as import analysis, and it is undertaken by the officials of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. However, the Customs Act prohibits the examination of the material that goes to make up a sound import analysis.

Section 172(3) of the Customs Act says that in no case shall an invoice be shown, or a copy thereof given, to any person other than the importer or an officer, except upon an order or a subpoena of a court of justice. The act goes on to define an officer as a person employed in the administration or enforcement of the act, and includes any member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. However, this preclusion is overridden by section 23(2) of the Statistics Act, which does allow an examination of customs invoices by the chief statistician. Arising out of this power, Statistics Canada has entered into a departmental arrangement with Revenue Canada and with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce whereby members of the staff of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce have been sworn under the Statistics Act and have conducted import analyses and published the results.

Unfortunately, the classifications used by Statistics Canada are often too broad for proper import analysis.

I think it is probably clear to honourable senators that, if we intend to replace imported goods with Canadian manufactured goods, we must realize that before any businessman would be prepared to make the kind of investment involved, he would require precise information on the sort of goods being imported now, and precise information as to all the classifications of those goods. Otherwise he would be unable to make a proper investment decision.

The bill before us proposes that a new section 6.1 be added to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce Act to permit detailed import analyses by officials of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It will mean that copies of invoices and import entries concerning goods imported into Canada will be available to persons who have been designated by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and who have taken an oath similar to that required under the Statistics Act. The amendment does outline certain prohibitions which are similar to those provided by section 16(1) of the Statistics Act. Only persons who have taken the oath can examine the customs invoices, and no disclosure of information is allowed which would make it possible to identify any importer or agent or customer of an importer.

Further, the minister is authorized to disclose information only when consent in writing has been given by the person to whom the information relates, or when it is available to the public by operation of law. In this respect this provision is similar to section 16(3) of the Statistics Act, and the penalties provided in this amendment are exactly the same as those penalties provided by the Statistics Act.

Honourable senators, when the appropriate time comes I am going to suggest that we refer this bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, because in passing it we are, in effect, granting to persons designated by the minister a right to examine the confidential information possessed by the Customs Branch of Revenue Canada. Nevertheless, I feel less apprehensive about this than about the power presently conferred in the Statistics Act, because that power is conferred in part by Order in Council, whereas this power is conferred directly by Parliament on conditions laid down in the amendment before you.

However, when we examine the bill in committee it is my hope that we will consider certain aspects of it to determine whether or not certain clauses should be added—clauses which are present in the Statistics Act now but which are not in this bill. I am thinking specifically of section 17(1) of the Statistics Act, which states that information derived from this sort of examination is privileged and is not compellable in court; section 33 of the Statistics Act, which states clearly that no person can use information derived from a confidential source, such as this, for speculative purposes; and section 36, which provides a two-year limitation of action for prosecution under the act.

I think that this amendment, though, taken in the whole, is useful, for it will contribute to the development of a sound import analysis system which, in turn, will contribute to the growth of Canadian manufacturing, increased employment, an improved balance of trade and an improved formulation of Canadian commercial policy. I am informed by officials of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce that, as a result of import analyses, over the last three or four years 11 manufacturing firms in Canada have expanded their operations, seven new establishments have been created, 3,000 jobs have been added to the economy, and the aggregate new investment is greater than $150 million. It is their opinion—and I am sure we will wish to ask them about their views in committee—that import analysis has played a large role in this growth of Canadian manufacturing.

Senator Hayden: Is my friend clear on the point that when this information has been conveyed to those who have been designated by the minister it is beyond the reach of a subpoena or an order for production of documents in any proceedings?

Senator Everett: I am not clear on that, honourable senators, and that is why I am suggesting that in the committee we examine, with the witnesses and, hopefully, the minister, the question of whether or not section 17(1) of the Statistics Act should be added to this bill. That would clearly make such information privileged, and not capable of being compelled in court.

Senator Buckwold: Would the honourable senator permit a question? It may be that this should be asked in committee, but I was wondering, when he brought to our attention the number of new manufacturing companies that have been established as a result of what is called "import analysis," how the information was obtained if this amendment is needed. I should also like to know how this amendment would improve matters.

Senator Everett: The Statistics Act already provides the power to obtain information on which import analysis can be done. Import analysis has been carried out, and is being carried out. However, it is carried out under Section 23(2) of the Statistics Act. What is being suggested in this bill is that that power lie directly with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce; that it not be the subject of either an order in council or an interdepartmental agreement but, rather, that the whole matter be on the table as it is under this amendment with clear powers, stating what the officials and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce can do with respect to getting import analysis information.

Senator Grosart: I wonder if I could ask the honourable senator who has introduced the bill if he would give us a little more information on the "notwithstanding" aspect. This new access to invoices and other customs documents is to be made available to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce "notwithstanding subsection 172(3) of the Customs Act." Would he be good enough to give us the import of that section, and indicate to the Senate what is the essential protection that is provided by that section of the Customs Act?

Senator Everett: Section 172 of the Customs Act says that no invoice shall be shown to any person other than an officer, and that is the protection provided all importers.

Senator Grosart: An officer of National Revenue?

Senator Everett: An officer employed in the administration or enforcement of the Customs Act, as such. So it would preclude an officer of Revenue Canada, who is involved in the enforcement of the Income Tax Act.

On motion of Senator Beaubien, debate adjourned.

STATUTES OF CANADA

BILL TO REVISE REFERENCES TO THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH OF THE PROVINCE OF QUEBEC—SECOND READING— DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Léopold Langlois moved the second reading of Bill S-16, to revise references to the Court of Queen's Bench of the Province of Quebec.

[Translation]

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is of relative importance, but in order to enable honourable senators to fully understand its thrust, I believe I shall have to recall the history of the Court of Queen's Bench in the Province of Quebec.

Please forgive me, then, for taking up your time to go back one hundred and twenty-five years, in order to give you an historical outline which strikes me as of prime importance.

[Senator Everett.]

Senator Flynn: Why not go back to the deluge right away?

Senator Langlois: No, 125 years is far from the deluge. My honourable friend is perhaps alluding to the time he has been in the Opposition, but that is only by analogy.

One hundred and twenty-five years ago, the Parliament of Canada proceeded to reorganize the whole administration of justice in Lower Canada as it was then, and put in place the structures by which, basically, we are still governed today. In this regard, I am referring to Statute 12 Victoria, chapters 37 and 38 of 1849.

Section 2 of chapter 37 created the Court of Queen's Bench. This act gave this court double jurisdiction, namely, through section 5, jurisdiction in appeal in civil matters, and, through section 24, jurisdiction in the first instance in criminal matters.

In fact, the same judges exercised this double competence. On the other hand, the fact that the court had jurisdiction in appeal in criminal cases at that time is not clearly indicated.

Chapter 38 created the Superior Court. It gave the latter general civil competence in the first instance, through section 6, and set it up as a collegial court—and I underline the term "collegial court"—of at least two and no more than three judges, through section 15. The same chapter created the Circuit Court which, however, does not interest us for the time being.

Those two acts came into force, through proclamation on December 24, 1849, see The Canada Gazette, No. 441, December 8, 1949, pages 9 and 10.

In the following years changes were brought to this system.

In 1857, there were three provisions in chapter 44 which are of interest for our discussion.

First, under section 21, the jurisdiction of the Court of Queen's Bench in appeal was clearly recognized for civil and criminal matters.

Under section 30, it was provided that the judges of the Superior Court could preside over the Court of Queen's Bench sitting as a court of first instance in criminal matters.

Under section 37, the quorum of the Superior Court was re-established as being one judge, therefore the disappearance of the principle of collegiality to which I referred earlier.

In 1861, chapters 77 and 78 were used to reorganize the two courts but without altering their basic principles.

Chapter 77 established the Court of Queen's Bench.

It was given an appeal jurisdiction in civil matters—and I stress "in civil matters"—and an appeal jurisdiction in criminal matters and it was also given jurisdiction of first instance in criminal matters. Finally, Superior Court judges were allowed to sit in this court.

By chapter 78, the same bill established the Superior Court and gave it civil jurisdiction of first instance.

The same situation is to be found in the Revised Statutes of Quebec of 1888 and 1909.

However, the situation changed in 1920 with Act 10, Geo. V., ch. 79, sec. 50. The legislature then decreed that Superior Court judges would hereafter sit, and not only be allowed to sit, in the Court of Queen's Bench acting as a court of first instance in criminal matters.

Since then, we find the same clause in the Revised Statutes of 1925 and 1964. An amendment subsequently brought in 1969 does not affect my statement up to now.

I understand, honourable senators, that Quebec is the only Canadian province where two superior courts of first instance coexist, one with civil jurisdiction and the other with criminal jurisdiction, entirely independent one from the other, but presided over by the same judges. Such a situation does give rise to serious difficulties which I will state rather briefly.

Originally, the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench did sit on appeal for civil cases and in first instance for criminal cases.

Later on, they were also given the appeal jurisdiction for criminal cases.

Then their replacement in courts of first instance by judges of the Superior Court became optional. This is a summary of the situation and its development.

Finally, they were restricted to the jurisdiction on appeal and were excluded from courts of first instance which no longer had designated judges, but were presided over by the judges of the Superior Court.

Such a situation had two disadvantages: the ambiguity of appellations and, in the second place, the ambiguity of jurisdictions.

First let us examine the ambiguity resulting from the appellations.

There was, on the one hand, and there will still be until the legislation before us is passed—the situation will remain—appeals from the Court of Queen's Bench, criminal jurisdiction of first instance, to the Court of Queen's Bench, appellate jurisdiction in criminal matters.

On the other hand, there are appeals from the Superior Court to the Court of Queen's Bench, appellate jurisdiction in civil matters.

Finally, the judges of the Superior Court with jurisdiction in civil matters are the ones who preside over the Court of Queen's Bench, criminal jurisdiction of first instance.

All this may seem rather confusing, because the same terms are used and at times they have different meanings.

A layman could find this very confusing and, in my opinion, this useless complication works against the interests of justice.

Let us now look at the ambiguous powers.

Since the Storgoff judgment, 1945, R.C.S. 526, it is recognized that the writ of Habeas Corpus and, in general, the prerogative writs are either civil or criminal according to the nature of the original proceedings to which they relate. Experience however shows that it is often difficult to determine whether a case falls clearly under civil or criminal jurisdiction.

Now, the existence in Quebec of two distinct courts for those two areas compel the suitors, often in great haste and within a short delay, to make a choice which is sometimes contentious and on which there might be some divergence of opinions.

That situation is in my opinion contrary to a sound administration of justice. It subdues the right of citizens to the hazards of a procedural choice which should not be imposed upon them.

Specially—and this really is the ridiculous aspect of the situation—since the same judges are presiding over both courts, so that a judge may reject today a petition because it has been submitted to him in his capacity of judge of the Court of Queen's Bench, Criminal Jurisdiction, Trial Division, and the same judge may accept on the following day the same petition when it is submitted to him in his capacity as judge of the Superior Court.

Those are not just theories, but true facts which are included in the casebooks of our province.

In the Lafleur case—and I would like to quote some of those key decisions—1964 S.C.R. 412, the Supreme Court of Canada decided that for the issuance of a writ of prohibition in criminal matters, only the Court of Queen's Bench Criminal Jurisdiction, Trial Division, had competence and it quashed a writ issued under the authority of the Superior Court whose presiding judge was nevertheless ex officio a judge of the Queen's Bench Court, Trial Division.

In the Faber case, 1969 Q.B. 1017, the Quebec Appeal Court confirmed the rejection of a petition for a writ of prohibition submitted to the Court of Queen's Bench, Criminal Jurisdiction, Trial Division, against the coroner of the district of Montreal on the ground that it was not a criminal matter and that only the Superior Court had competence. In that case, the Court of Queen's Bench was presided by no other than the Deputy Chief Justice of the Superior Court of that time, the late Honourable George S. Chailles.

In the Cuddihy case of 1972 A.C. 514 the Appeal Court quashed the judgment of the Superior Court and stated it had competence to issue a writ of certiorari against a judgment by a judge of the Provincial Court acting under a penal statute since it was not, contrary to what the Superior Court had decided, a criminal matter.

Finally, during the inquiry into organized crime in Montreal by the Quebec Police Commission several judgments were rendered in 1973, and here are the main ones.

In the Di Iorio case, Q.B.C. No. 27-3120-73 of March 6, 1973, Justice Bisson, sitting in Court of Queen's Bench Criminal Jurisdiction, Trial Division, stated he had no jurisdiction to issue a writ of prohibition against the Quebec Police Commission since its action did not come under criminal law.

In the Fontaine case, C.Q.B. No. 274-103-73, March 1, 1973, Mr. Justice Hugessen agreed in principle with the previous judgment of Mr. Justice Bisson. However, he stated that application had been made before him for a writ of Habeas Corpus subsequent to a charge of contempt of court, and that this act of contempt that had been committed before the Quebec Police Commission had taken the proportions of criminal contempt. Mr. Justice Hugessen held that the Court of the Queen's Bench, criminal jurisdiction of first instance, was competent.

In the Fontaine case, ibidem, March 14, 1973, Mr. Justice Hugessen, then presiding over the Court of Queen's Bench, authorized a writ of Habeas Corpus.

Dealing with the Rollin & Pearson case, C.Q.B. No. 27-004406-73, of March 21st, 1973, Mr. Justice Hugessen stated again that the Court of Queen's Bench was competent, but basically rejected the request for a writ of Habeas Corpus.

Dealing with another case, the Di Iorio case, No. 27-4866-73, of March 30th, 1973, Mr. Justice Hugessen followed the same philosophy and basically ordered the issue of a writ of Habeas Corpus.

● (2030)

On April 3rd, 1973, that same Mr. Justice Hugessen, sitting in the Court of Queen's Bench ordered that the plaintiff be immediately released.

Finally, in the Garry Ball case, No. 27-008 227-73, on June 6th, 1973, Mr. Justice Bisson held that the Court of Queen's Bench, Criminal Jurisdiction of first instance, was not competent to authorize a writ of certiorari in respect of a charge for contempt of court laid by the Quebec Police Commission, and that only the Superior Court was competent in that respect. The wording of his conclusion was quite significant considering that he could chair both courts, and I quote, for the information of honourable senators:

"Therefore, for all those reasons, I have to uphold the defendant's request for inadmissibility and to state that I have no jurisdiction, as a judge of the Court of Queen's Bench, criminal jurisdiction, to hear the claimant's appeal by certiorari against the Police Commission's decision on May eight (8), nineteen seventy-three (1973)."

Honourable senators, I apologize for having taken too much of your time for the purpose of my long demonstration. However, I admit it seems conclusive enough to warrant no further explanations. In my opinion, public interest commanded that an end be put to such a situation where the ordinary man wondered which of both concurrent courts chaired by the same judges would receive him favourably.

Furthermore, the artificial nature of all this legal structure appears clearly on every occasion—and they are many—a judge allows, at a hearing, the words "Court of Queen's Bench" to be used instead of "Superior Court", or vice versa. Normally, a suitor should not be allowed to change forum so easily. These judicial acrobatics are made possible due to the identification of the same judge in both courts at the same time.

It was therefore necessary to clear this mess. The remedy chosen by Quebec's National Assembly was simply to abolish the Court of Queen's Bench and transfer its jurisdiction to the Appeal Court on the one hand and to the Superior Court on the other.

The Quebec National Assembly started working in that direction by passing Bill 36 entitled "An act to amend the Judicial Courts Act and other provisions concerning the administration of justice", which was assented to on July 31, 1974. And here, I want to refer to page 2276 of Hansard of the Quebec National Assembly and more particularly to two paragraphs from the speech of the Quebec Minister of Justice, the Hon. Mr. Choquette, when he moved the second reading of Bill 36 and I quote:

However important it is to simplify our legal system—I would like to recall at this time the intention of the government, which I have expressed several times, to simplify the Quebec court system so that it is perfectly simple, discernible and understandable for the ordinary men and citizens—whatever our intention to substantially amend our legal system, intention which will be outlined in a white paper to be published next fall, it would not be unprofitable to simplify immediately this system by eliminating a court which is now obsolete, the Court of Queen's Bench established 125 years ago, and to replace it by Court of Appeal for Quebec, called simply the Court of Appeal which would make judgments on all appeals in civil and criminal matters, and at the same time, to confer to the Superior Court the jurisdiction previously exercised by the Court of Queen's Bench in criminal matters in first instance so that the Superior Court and its judges may hold from now on jurisdiction in first instance, both for common criminal and civil matters. I believe that this would simplify our system and contribute to a better understanding of the administration of justice.

I should now say that before the introduction of Bill 36 in the National Assembly of Quebec, Section 1 of Chapter 18 of the Statutes of 1966-67 had added to Section 1 of the Courts of Justice Act of 1964, R.S.Q., Chapter 20, the following subparagraph:

"The Court of Queen's Bench shall also be called the Court of Appeal when it exercises its appellate jurisdiction whether in civil or in criminal matters."

This provision has been in effect since September 1st, 1966. The change that has been just completed in July 1974, at the National Assembly of Quebec was initiated in 1966. And, on September 1st 1966, there was put into effect the new Civil Procedure Code of Quebec in which section 22 mentions only the Court of Appeal with no reference to the Court of Queen's Bench, the appeal jurisdiction. There was then a fait accompli in this respect as early as 1966. But, in the federal legislation, the 1970 Judges Act, R.S. Chap. J-1, Section 9 refers only to the Court of Queen's Bench, as well as the Supreme Court of Canada Act, Chapter S-19, Section 6 and 30, subsection 2.

An analysis of the Revised Statutes of Canada of 1970 indicates that the following acts are affected by the change made by the National Assembly of Quebec in July this year. I will simply refer honourable senators to the schedule of the legislation before us where we find a complete list of all federal statutes that are amended by the bill before us.

Furthermore, if the status of Superior Court judges does not present any problem, that of judges of the Appeal Court, all appointed judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, must be explicitly confirmed.

Lastly, I shall point out a provision that I earnestly consider as erroneous—the Winding-up Act, R.S., c. W-10, subsection 137(2) that is also included in the list contained in the schedule of the bill before us.

In fact, clause 2 of chapter W-10 defines the Superior Court as a "court" of Quebec.

Clauses 10 and following give to the Superior Court jurisdiction on winding-up orders.

Subsection 137(1) empowers the judges of the various courts throughout Canada,—therefore, in Quebec, of the Superior Court—to adopt practice rules.

Subsection 137(2) makes this power an obligation in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario.

In the case of Ontario, it imposes that obligation upon the judges of the Ontario Supreme Court, which corresponds to the definition of the word "court" in section 2 for Ontario.

But when it deals with Quebec, the same paragraph imposes the obligation to establish practice rules—and I wish to draw the honourable senators' attention to this—upon the judges, not of the Quebec Superior Court but of the Court of Queen's Bench, that is, the Court of Appeal for the Province of Quebec. To me that seems utterly inconceivable.

Therefore, it seems to me incongruous that Parliament should empower the judges of the Court of Appeal and even impose upon them the duty to approve practice rules within an act, the Winding-up Act, the administration of which comes under the jurisdiction of another Court, namely, the Superior Court.

Should there be a mistake, as it seems obvious to me, it should be corrected through the amendments now before us. Besides, judges of the Court of Appeal never approved practice rules under the Winding-up Act, for it was the Superior Court which did it.

Now, as I just said, this bill affects several federal laws and if I may, I will continue in English for this part of my speech.

[English]

As the long title of this bill indicates, its purpose is to revise all references in federal statutes to the Court of Queen's Bench of the Province of Quebec. In July 1974 the National Assembly of the Province of Quebec abolished the Court of Queen's Bench in that province, and transferred its appellate functions to the Court of Appeal, and its functions as a court of first instance in criminal matters to the Superior Court of Quebec. The Quebec legislation amending the Courts of Justice Act and other legislative provisions relating to the administration of justice and to registry offices, Bill 36, was assented to on July 31, 1974, and will come into force on a date to be fixed by proclamation. The federal statutes referred to in the bill before us contain references to the Quebec Court of Queen's Bench, and, as a result, Quebec is effectively precluded from bringing its legislation into force until the amendments in this bill are enacted.

The amendments proposed in this bill will effect the necessary changes in the federal statutes by substituting the expression "Superior Court" or "Court of Appeal," as the case may be, for the expression "Court of Queen's Bench," or "Court of Queen's Bench (Crown side)," or "Court of Queen's Bench, appeal side."

The transitional provisions in the bill ensure, first, that judges of the Court of Queen's Bench continue as judges of the Court of Appeal and are deemed to have been appointed to the Court of Appeal; secondly, that the new court designations are deemed to replace the former court designations in every proceeding commenced prior to the commencement of this act; and, thirdly, that a reference to the old designations in any other act, or document, instrument, regulation, proclamation or order in council is held to be a reference to the new designations with respect to any matter subsequent to the commencement of this act.

I beg honourable senators' pardon for having been so long in my presentation, but I deemed these explanations necessary for a better comprehension of this bill, especially for those who are not versed in legal matters. I would summarize by saying that the proposed amendments are simply companion amendments in order that the federal statutes conform with the provincial statutes in respect of the Court of Queen's Bench of the Province of Quebec.

I thank you, honourable senators, for your kind attention, and I commend this bill to your favourable consideration.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, November 12, the debate on the motion of Senator Carter for the second reading of Bill C-22, to amend the Canada Pension Plan.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, as mentioned by the sponsor, this bill is not a short one. It is 46 pages in length, and it contains 56 clauses. However, many of these clauses are technical in nature and are consequential on some of the major changes made in the Canada Pension Plan by the bill. It is with these major changes that we are concerned.

I think the sponsor followed the proper course when in his explanation he broke the bill down into its component parts, and dealt very effectively with each of the major objectives. Since he gave such an effective presentation, there is little which needs to be discussed further at this time. Certainly, I believe there is general agreement with the aims the bill seeks to achieve.

No one will object to those provisions, for example, that will make the surviving spouse and children of a deceased or disabled female contributor entitled to benefits under the same conditions as the surviving spouse and children of a male contributor. Indeed, this is so reasonable and so fair that one wonders why it was not provided in the original act. I notice, though, that while in such cases retroactive entitlement is provided for, retroactive payment is not provided for. I do not understand why this should be so, since the female contributor made contributions just as the male contributor did. It was an injustice that these contributors were not treated in the same manner as male contributors. While the amending bill will remedy that injustice, I believe there is at least a moral obligation to make the benefit payments retroactive. If retroactive payments are not to be made, then the discrimination against the female contributors is given a permanent place in our legislation.

Speaking of retroactive payments, there is another case dealt with by the act itself which I find very confusing. I do not understand why it is that, if a person is late in applying for the Canada pension after he or she becomes qualified, retroactive payment will be made for only one year prior to the application. To me it is absolutely incredible that, for example, a person who becomes, say, 70 years of age and does not make application for the pension until two years later, will be paid for only one year retroactively, although that same person and his employer have made the required contributions. To my mind, he is not receiving what is rightfully his, but section 66 of the Canada Pension Plan makes legal what I call this misappropriation of funds.

Honourable senators, there are two cases—there may be others—where I fail to see what principle is being followed in not making retroactive payments. If the pension fund was in poor shape the ground of expediency might be invoked, but the fund is in excellent condition and its assets are now almost $7 billion. I would urge the government to amend the Canada Pension Plan further so as to cure such injustices.

I expect there is general agreement with the provision whereby contributions will not be collected from persons whose religion forbids them to participate in the Canada Pension Plan and with the provision which will allow persons to collect the Canada pension at age 65 and to continue working if they so wish and have the opportunity to do so. And I may say here that I hope the contributions made by—or, rather, collected from—those persons whose religion does not allow them to participate in the plan will be returned to them.

Honourable senators, there is one clause of the bill to which I am opposed, and that is clause 32 which adds a subsection (2) to section 64 of the Canada Pension Plan. The existing section 64 itself is a very good section. It provides that a benefit shall not be assigned, charged, attached, anticipated or given as security, and any transaction purporting to assign, charge, attach, anticipate or give as security a benefit is void. In effect, the insertion of subsection (2) will mean that this fine existing provision will not apply in cases where welfare is given to a person who has qualified but has not received his or her Canada pension.

The purpose of subsection (2) is to permit the minister to repay from the person's pension amounts paid as welfare in that period. In other words, if a person is in such poor financial condition that he must have welfare assistance while awaiting his Canada pension, he can be forced to sign an authority to have those payments deducted from his pension. Of course, it would not be put so bluntly to the person; it would just be intimated to him that if he did not give the authority he would not get the welfare assistance. If, after qualifying for a pension, he were to receive welfare for, say, three months, then the pension for those three months could go to the provincial welfare authorities.

I understand that this obnoxious provision is inserted at the request of the provinces. I am glad the federal authorities had nothing to do with it. I do not know what province requested it, but I cannot believe that Nova Scotia, or any of the Atlantic provinces, would ask for it. Here is some poor fellow who has to have welfare in order to live; he is poor—he must be—and this new subsection is going to make sure that he stays poor. It appears to me to be a sort of legalized oppression of the poor or near-poor.

I would say here that I think wide use should be made of the amendment in clause 33, because under it the minister will be able to remit overpayments when the cost of collection is out of proportion to the amount of the overpayment, or in circumstances where such repayment would cause undue hardship. It is my understanding that this discretion, as a general rule, will be used only when amounts of $50 or less are involved. If that is so, I believe a more generous policy should be followed.

Honourable senators, while expressing general approval of the bill in principle, I would not wish to give the impression that no further major amendments are necessary or desirable. I hope the minister will continue to study until an acceptable formula or method is found to bring housewives under the provisions of the Canada Pension Plan. I have read the discussion paper, Housewives and the Canada Pension Plan, which was presented by the minister to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs on April 4 last. I found it an interesting and informative document. It does, I think, show why the proposals advanced so far to bring housewives under the plan are either not workable or are not beneficial enough to be acceptable.

At various times in the past I have mentioned that it should be possible to draft legislation that can be understood by the ordinary people whom it is going to affect. This bill is a perfect example of unnecessary complication. It is exactly the sort of thing I had in mind. It contains many long, involved sentences which, even for those used to legislation, are difficult to understand, and which, for the ordinary man or woman, are impossible to follow. Let me refer, for example, to clauses 9 and 11. You will find there sentences containing more than 100 words. Surely we can do better than that.

Nevertheless, since the bill contains so many worthwhile amendments, we on this side of the house are happy to support it.

Hon. Chesley W. Carter: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the honourable Senator Carter speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Carter: Honourable senators, I thank my honourable friend for his remarks on this bill. I shall not take up much of the time of the house tonight, because I quite agree with what he has said.

When I studied the bill I, too, felt that female contributors should receive some consideration because, while they become entitled retroactively, the payment is not retroactive but comes into force only upon the proclamation of the bill. I must confess that I never received a proper explanation for that, so I quite agree with what Senator Macdonald said about female contributors, and also about people aged 65 and 70.

[Senator Macdonald.]

With respect to the refunding to the provinces of payments made to welfare recipients when they become eligible for Canada Pension Plan benefits, I must say that this is also a matter I questioned when I read the bill. Like Senator Macdonald, I discovered that this was a provision included at the request of the provinces. Like him, I understood that clause 33 of the bill would give to the minister the authority to remit payments in the case of welfare recipients who in his opinion should receive special consideration, but I never heard anything about a $50 limit on such refunding. The impression I was given, when I inquired about this measure, was that there was no limit on what the minister might remit.

As an aside to that, I recall hearing that the Minister of Veterans Affairs often wished that his legislation contained a similar provision, because veterans are often faced with the necessity of repaying overpayments which are required to be recovered by law, and the recovery of these benefit payments most often places a tremendous hardship on the veteran.

In any event, these are matters which can be pursued in committee, and I intend to move that the bill be sent to committee if it receives second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Carter: Honourable senators, I intend to move that the bill be referred to committee, but before the motion is put I should like to say that there is a certain amount of difficulty in finding a time for the committee to meet. I understand that tomorrow afternoon is out of the question, and that Thursday morning is equally impossible. However, if there is not to be royal assent this week, I would suggest that we would be just as far ahead by having the committee meet on Tuesday. I do not know what the plans are for next Tuesday, but if the house is to sit in the afternoon the committee could meet in the morning, or if the house is to sit in the evening the committee could meet in the afternoon.

On motion of Senator Carter, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science.

On the Inquiry of Senator Forsey:

1. What is the estimated cost of the proposed renovations to the East Block?

Senator Forsey: Honourable senators, I have reason to believe that no answer to this inquiry can be given at present, for perfectly adequate reasons. I think it might be dropped from the Order Paper, and I make that suggestion.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Inquiry withdrawn.

DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE ACT

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Everett for the second reading of Bill S-15, to amend the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce Act.

Hon. L. P. Beaubien: Honourable senators, Bill S-15 is what Senator Laird would describe as a simple bill. It consists of only two pages, and its purpose is to make certain information available to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and designated officers of his department.

● (1420)

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce feels that he could prepare more meaningful import analyses, mostly in the manufacturing and processing industries, if he had access to the information which is held by the Department of National Revenue. This information has been classified as confidential, and under subsection 172(3) of the Customs Act it is not allowed to be given to any other departments of the government, or anyone else, for that matter.

Honourable senators, what we are really looking at is this: Many manufacturing and processing people have trade secrets and confidential information in the hands of the Department of National Revenue, and they may not want that information disclosed to their competitors. If the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, in using these files to make certain reports, gives away trade secrets of the manufacturers and processors, perhaps the bill will do more harm than good. I think that Senator Buckwold had this in mind when he said that the manufacturing companies seemed to be doing pretty well now, and wondered if this additional information was needed.

Senator Everett, who explained the purposes of this bill so well, suggested that if it receives second reading it should be referred to our Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce so that people who might be affected could come and state their case. Therefore, I am perfectly prepared to suggest that the bill be given second reading, provided that it is sent to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee.

On motion of Senator Flynn, for Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

THE WORK ETHIC IN CANADA

PROPOSED SPECIAL COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Inquiry of the Honourable Senator Croll:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the status of the "work ethic" in Canada today, and the need for the establishment of a Senate Committee to examine and report thereon.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, may I ask that the inquiry which stands in my name for Tuesday, the 26th November, be brought forward now?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, let me give you some background on the need for a study of the work ethic in Canada and its implications. I asked for the opportunity to speak today—and I am grateful that the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the Government agreed—because of a very significant report which appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail this morning and which will appear in other newspapers later in the day. The report reads in part:

Federal and provincial ministers of welfare took a major step yesterday toward transforming Canada's welfare system into a guaranteed minimum income system.

Senator Grattan O'Leary, when making one of his memorable speeches recently, said, "When Senator Croll gets up the next time he will tell us about the guaranteed income." He was right in that, the more so because this becomes a significant day. I say that because the fact that the guaranteed income principle has now been accepted rings a bell in this place. I might add that today I looked up the names of the 14 senators who served on the Special Committee on Poverty and only one passed on. I can only presume that the rest of us are being rewarded for the good work by being allowed to stay here. But it occurred to me that it would be a good idea to let those who are still here smell the roses.

We have had a special interest in the poor and the poverty-stricken, and our contribution to the solution of their problems has been a significant one. It is from this Chamber that the suggestion came forward about a guaranteed minimum income. Even when that suggestion was made, it was an idea whose time had come. But you may recall that there was cynicism at that time. Yet today we find that not only are those who are out of the labour force receiving basic guaranteed incomes, but the federal and the provincial governments have agreed in principle and are now working out the details for bringing this into effect. I shall deal with this in greater detail later.

The Senate can take a great deal of credit for the work that has been done in this field, and I would add that it was not by any means marginal work. In the future whenever there is a discussion concerning questions of poverty and the guaranteed minimum income, the contribution of the Senate must be considered as being significant. We have shown here as we have shown in other inquiries we have made that we are interested in the condition of the poor and the unfortunate of this country, and this interest has become evident to the people of Canada. We have also shown that when the need arises the Senate is prepared to do its share of what has to be done.

I want to pass on another piece of information of which senators may not be aware. This book which I have in my hand, Poverty in Canada—A Report of the Special Senate Committee, is the runaway best seller in the parliamentary history of Canada. Twenty thousand copies have been sold to date and it is now in its fourth printing. In addition, I am told that it has been xeroxed many thousands of times in whole or in part.

Senator Flynn: It's a steal.

Senator Perrault: No guaranteed income there.

Senator Croll: It represents an unprecedented contribution to the social security of this land, for therein is contained, as I shall later indicate, the foundation, the blueprint, the guidelines for the Canadian social security system in the twenty-first century. For once, having accepted the principle of the basic guaranteed income, we have commenced to phase out the old and bring in the new. Welfare is being phased out and the new policy is a floor under family income with work incentive. As a matter of fact, it is very simple. It is an economic floor below which no person is allowed to fall, with an established ceiling. It is uniform and universal, with incentives covering the working poor, the welfare poor, the aged and those out of the labour force.

● (1430)

First, it consolidates some 200 programs into one. Second, it can establish a real work requirement. Third, it can establish clear lines of eligibility. The system is based on the proposition that it will not work unless you work, and if you do not work the system will not work. It is as simple as that. All that must be remembered are these three principles: First, there is a guaranteed income for those not in the labour force. Second, there is a guaranteed income for those in the labour force by way of negative income tax—that is, particularly for the working poor. Third, the unemployment insurance looks after everyone else, except for the categorical programs, which remain until such time as they fit into the system.

The report has had a positive impact on government thinking. This, of course, was a principal recommendation. So now the guaranteed annual income is not a pipe dream or pie in the sky, but an achievable goal. However, all Canadians who can will have to work for it, for work is indeed the essential ingredient for the formula to succeed. It will be well for me to indicate to you that since the government has been considering the guaranteed income there have been no new welfare programs anywhere in Canada. There have been new income programs in various provinces, which have contained work incentives.

Some time ago I sent every member of the Senate a copy of the Senate Report on Poverty, updated November 1, 1974. I would like permission to have that included in today's proceedings. It consists of one page.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

STATISTICS CANADA: Minimum income needed by a family which has to spend 70% or more of its income on basic necessities: food, shelter and clothing.

*Note: Average Canadian family income for year 1975 did not become available until October 1974.

Senator Croll: Senator Bélisle, speaking in the house the other day, brought to our attention the fact that there are 15—he did not give the number, but I have it—widows of deceased senators receiving an annual allowance of $2,660.66. That is quite apart from those who receive nothing at all.

That is very significant, because the poverty-line figure for 1973 was $2,990, and in 1974—this is guesswork—it will be approximately another $300 on top of that. The husbands made it to the Senate, but their widows did not even make it to the poverty line. They are $600 behind.

Senator Bélisle: And nothing for the children.

Senator Croll: That is a fact. It is well that we, who look after everyone else's business, should take a look at our own. I raise this only for the point—

Senator Flynn: Cordonnier mal chaussé.

Senator Croll: —that we should implement the guaranteed income for those not in the labour force. I recommend seriously to honourable senators one of the best speeches I have read in many years. It is that of the Honourable Marc Lalonde, speaking before the Empire Club in Toronto.

Senator Flynn: Is he back?

Senator Croll: He spoke on October 31. I recommend that you read that speech. In it he clearly sets out the policy. He said, in effect, that there was no longer any question of implementing policy. He spoke only about when, how and by what method. It was a speech worth remembering.

We have the blind, aged, crippled, widowed, separated, and divorced. We also have new legislation dealing with wives or recipients who are 60 years of age. That legislation may later eliminate a means test. The concept here may well be that with the Old Age Security supplement and the Canada Pension Plan, and with the wife receiving a pension at 60, the old folk will be well looked after. When we add the figures of $118, $80, $157, and $180, the total sum provides them with a reasonable opportunity of looking forward to a decent life. That is the ultimate aim and objective.

In addition, there is talk of providing community employment for those within the community, which means an employer of last resort. Until now that was not possible because the federal government would not provide the needed capital. If that money is provided, local employment will be possible for those who occasionally require it.

Those who are suffering most are the working poor. These people, in the main, are working for the minimum wage. The obvious solution is to raise the minimum wage, but it is not so easy to do that. There are many industries that simply cannot pay more than the minimum wage. There are many marginal industries, under-capitalized industries, inefficient industries, which carry on operations in various parts of this country, and although they cannot pay more than the minimum wage, they provide steady employment. I do not know how this problem can be resolved except by raising the minimum wage to about 60 per cent of the average wage across the country.

In a speech I made in this chamber not long ago, I suggested that the wages of the working poor should be supplemented by way of fringe benefits. This was tried but proved unworkable. The government thought it would help the working poor by supplementing their incomes by welfare. The fact is, the poor would not take it. Thousands and thousands of those who were eligible simply refused to take it. A few did take advantage of it, but because of the small number who did participate, the government decided to discontinue that program.

The Honourable Marc Lalonde deals with this in his speech to the Empire Club of Canada, and suggests that some other way must be found. I suggested that we supplement their wages by way of fringe benefits. Perhaps honourable senators and others will take the position that to subsidize the working poor by way of fringe benefits would be to subsidize these inefficient industries. To an extent, that is true. But we would be doing something more important—we would be redistributing the wealth in this country, which is something about which we have done nothing for 25 years. Mr. Lalonde put great emphasis on this in his speech, when he said:

Twenty per cent of the families in this country were living on less than $5,516 in 1972. This figure was 49 per cent of average family income in Canada, which means that one-fifth of all Canadian families were required to live on incomes of less than one-half of the national average family income. Even more striking is the fact that the share of total Canadian family income being received by this bottom 20 per cent of families was less than 6 per cent: 20 per cent of our families received less than 6 per cent of all family income. Compare this with the fact that the top 20 per cent of Canadian families in 1972 received 39 per cent of all family income.

He said one of the things we must do is redistribute wealth in this country. How well we agree with him.

When one talks of a program such as this, the first thought that comes to mind is the cost involved. When you consolidate hundreds of programs into one, there is bound to be some saving. I have no idea what it is likely to cost, and no one to whom I have spoken has any idea. However, our American friends conducted a study which indicated there are tremendous savings to be achieved when one consolidates a number of programs into one. The cost, surely, will not be anything of the order that has been suggested in the past. I well remember the fantastic figures which were thrown about by the finance people when we first brought forward the proposal for a guaranteed annual income. The committee delved into the cost of such a program in great detail, discussing it with competent people at all levels, so they had some idea of what it would cost, and it in no way resembled the figures being thrown about in order to cool it off. Now that they no longer wish to cool it off, they are embracing it as being a viable proposal. Well, it is only about two years since that proposal was brought forward, and things have not changed that much.

What we are doing is emphasizing a change from welfare to income and work, and people who have the capacity to work will not be permitted to jeopardize the new system. The middle class feel they are being ripped off by having to pay for those who can and should work. Reforming welfare by phasing it out, and replacing it with a policy of income and work, is the most imaginative and effective human initiative that has come along in many years.

Just think of the full effect of what I am saying. Fifty years of welfare is being phased out, and a new social security program is being put into effect. Honourable senators are going to see that change come about, and they will have helped establish it. That is a very important thing for this country. We have all heard complaint after complaint about welfare in all its forms. For years people have been asking how to get rid of it. How do you get rid of welfare? What do you put in its place? We did not have answers to those questions. Now we think we have found something much better than welfare, and certainly in the democratic world this is the most progressive system yet to be introduced. As I have said before, we have to get it across to the people that in order to make this policy work, they must work. If they do not, it simply will not work.

Honourable senators may wonder what my purpose is in speaking on the work ethic in Canada today. It is simply this: many Canadians have the idea in their minds—and you are not going to change it by saying, “it ain’t necessarily so”—that there are a lot of bums, as they put it, on welfare and unemployment insurance. Well, they are wrong on one and right on the other. Nevertheless, you cannot tell them they are wrong. Certainly, the welfare roles in this country were never so pure, the reason being that those who have been on welfare long enough are smart enough to know that they are now better off on unemployment insurance, and that is where they are. They are not on welfare at all.

There is no doubt that we have a problem. Everyone knows we have a problem. The question is how to deal with that problem. To put this proposed program into effect is going to take some time once it has been accepted in principle, and how and when it is put into effect will make a difference.

What is bothering the Canadian people today is the work ethic. For the most part, they have no argument with the benefits. They are willing to pay the shot for such a program. However, they want to be assured that the people will work; that those who are ripping off on unemployment insurance will not be permitted to continue to do so. They want to know how the program will be organized and implemented. They want some idea of how efficient Parliament will be in putting it into effect.

Well, what does it involve? What are we worried about? The questions in the minds of the Canadian people arise out of such headings as that in one of the largest evening newspapers in Canada recently: "522,000 out of work but 130,900 jobs go begging." That is a scandalous sort of thing when you consider it. If this is the situation, surely there is something wrong somewhere. I do not know what the answer is at this particular time.

● (1450)

On the other hand, we import indentured labour, which is something new in Canada. Last year we brought in people to pick berries, tomatoes and tobacco—about 6,000 persons. We have been doing that for some years. Last week we brought 50 Spaniards into north Saskatchewan to do bush work.

Senator Benidickson: And Mexicans for hotel work.

Senator Flynn: Spaniards or Mexicans?

Senator Croll: Both. We have got problems. We have collective bargaining, which I will cover later, but for some reason suddenly the process we thought was an excellent one is starting to limp. We talk about the work ethic, but we find a very competent, able and outstanding jurist in the Province of Quebec saying, "This is an antiquated law. I cannot enforce this sort of thing. It is an anti-social law." In the Province of Ontario schoolteachers are on strike; they have a contract and then say, "You know what you can do with that." Ontario civil servants say, "Next December 31 we will walk out, despite our contract." Perhaps we are making a mistake in having these closed contracts, and not allowing them to be opened up at various times; perhaps something ought to be done about it. Management-labour relations need to be looked at and given some consideration.

With unemployment insurance it is time we got to the point of saying, "No more fooling or holds barred. If you are entitled to benefit, you get it to the full; if you are not entitled, you are not going to get it. Since a basic income is provided you will have to come under that, so you will not be left out in the cold."

Alberta needs 20,000 persons for jobs available there, and within two years they will need 100,000 more workers. In Manitoba the need is for 5,000 to 6,000, and Saskatchewan needs 5,000. In British Columbia they need carpenters; in Ontario, service personnel and skilled workers; in Quebec, service personnel; and in Nova Scotia they need all sorts of workers. One wonders why this question has not been looked into long ago, to find out what all this is about.

I agree we have some people, but very few, who rip off the system. It always happens that way. There is no mass defection from the idea of work. Is it job satisfaction? Is it security? Is it achievement? Is it human treatment? Is it management-labour relations? What is happening? We knew what the difficulty was with welfare. There was a lack of incentive; that was the vital flaw, and we finally got around to starting to correct it. We knew that years ago, yet we did not get around to correcting it for some time. For a long time, whenever we found that some welfare program did not work, we just loaded another one on top of it and thought that would work, but we found it did not. At least, now we can start afresh and know what we are doing.

I have got to my main theme, although some honourable senators may have expected I had already passed it.

Senator Smith: It is a measure of your enthusiasm.

Senator Croll: My own feeling is that there is a challenge in the land today, and that we cannot ignore it, except at our peril. The challenge is a new one and it deals with the quality of life, the disenchantment of the blue collar workers, women searching for new identities, the aged reaching out for respect and continuity, youth for a voice that will be heard and heeded, and with mass society it is frustration. We sometimes ask ourselves, "Where have all the workers gone?" There are thousands of jobs begging for thousands of workers. Why do Canadians refuse to do manual work? We tolerate indentured labour or, worse still, Canadian okies.

My proposal, on which the Senate will have to pass judgment, is that the Senate should investigate the work ethic in Canada. If I have not sufficiently defined it for you, you can define it in any other way you wish, although I thought I had given a pretty fair definition. A hard public look at this question is necessary. While everybody in the country is an expert on the subject, one rather gets the feeling that we really do not know much about it. What we are talking about is a very important matter.

Is unemployment insurance and welfare turning us into a nation of loafers and lazy "bums"? Do we all want more in wages than we are prepared to give in work? Does mass production have to use men like machines? Since work takes up a third of our life, can work be made more satisfying? These questions affect all of us, and they affect business and government, from inflation policy to social welfare and collective bargaining. It is time we found out what we have been talking about for all these years.

I know there are more than a few of my colleagues here who would say that any examination of the work ethic today would have to be an autopsy. According to them, the spirit of work has departed. The idea that work is good, that man ought to work, that man needs to work—and when I say "man" I, of course, include "woman"—all such notions have been hauled off to eternal rest in the graveyard of ideas—or at least, they say so. Some also say that the spirit of work was destroyed by well-intentioned but simple-minded liberals who have made society too soft.

● (1500)

Senator Flynn: I agree with you.

Senator Croll: I thought you were looking at me.

Senator Langlois: Le conservateur.

Senator Croll: Men do not have to work to survive. If necessary, they can live off the rest of us.

There is another, entirely different approach to this question but which agrees at the same time that "the work ethic is dead." This approach is made by those who proclaim the coming of the "leisure society," who think of work as a form of slavery, the pursuit of money by meaningless and mindless production—at least, until they need it. For the first time in history, so they say, we are approaching the freedom to do what we want, when we want and as we want.

Senator Walker: As long as they get welfare.

Senator Croll: No. Welfare is something that is hard to get—almost as hard as getting into the Senate.

Senator Walker: You should know.

Senator Croll: I do. That is how I got here.

Senator Walker: You studied it.

Senator Croll: These two opposite points of view have done much to promote the idea that work is a passing phenomenon, even though there are at the present time more than half a million men and women working for wages—part time, full time, whatever it may be—when they could get much more money on welfare.

I should like to quote from the Financial Post. You will have to excuse me for coming back to this, but it is an ordinary example:

An Ontario worker with a family of five to support, for instance, would earn $2.25 per hour, or $90 for a 40-hour week, at the minimum-wage level. The same worker could collect about $133 in unemployment benefits, so there could be an actual incentive for the person not to take a job.

The same situation obtains to a lesser degree for unemployed persons with smaller families.

That applies across the country, not in Ontario alone. These people are working. They are seeking help in any possible way we can give it to them, for they want to succeed.

These reports of the "death of the work ethic" are greatly exaggerated. It is certainly true that work is changing and what men and women expect of work, by way of specific rewards and conditions, is changing. But to say what I have said is not to say that work is dead. On the contrary, it is to say that work is alive and, therefore, subject, as other things are, to forces of change.

Those who condemn all changes in work believe that if work is not what it has always been—a plain necessity—then it is not work at all. Their theory is that for men or women to have any choice about what they will do or not do is a fatal weakness in society, and if a migrant farm labourer chooses not to live like an animal or be treated like one, that is evidence of the softening of society. If a man on the assembly line complains of boredom, they say he is a lazy dreamer, and if one of the hundreds of thousands of white-collar workers should speak of dignity, equality or responsibility in the work place, he is simply spoiled.

If the hardliners on work are stuck in the past—what was, is and must always be—then the progressives, the prophets of leisure, are infatuated with some imaginary future. They are caught up in the cult of change. Nothing at all will be as it was, whether in society, politics or people. The fault here, and it is a very dangerous fault, is that the slowness of change and the ordinary needs of men and women are ignored. To hear some of those prophets speak, you would think that the millennium of leisure had arrived.

Speaking for myself, and I am sure I speak for the members of the Senate and for most people I know, work is still a very large part of life. It takes up a large part of most days, and often a larger part of our thoughts. Perhaps we do not work as hard as our grandparents—at least, physically—but we still work hard. Talk to the construction worker doing a double shift, or the truck driver who has to do two jobs; talk to the farm labourer who gets $2.50 an hour, and whose working day is 10 hours; talk to a doctor. Tell them about the leisure society. We still work hard, and we still need to work for the coin of the realm.

There are "welfare bums," no doubt, but they have not discovered an easy or sure route to security, and moreover they are insignificant in number. Our need to work goes a long way beyond money. It has to do with finding order and purpose in our lives. The suggestion is that work remains what it has always been, a basic need of individuals and society.

Work, like everything else, must change. Mr. Reuben Baetz, executive director of the Canadian Council on Social Development, has summarized the situation very well:

In North America and Western Europe, we have sensed in recent years a slow but inexorable change in the concept of work. However no one has been able to describe with certainty the nature of this change and, above all, no one has been able to tell us precisely what its social and economic implications are for the future.

As to the studies of attitudes towards work, there have been many in the United States and a few in Canada. Those studies have produced conclusions which the average man will hardly find surprising. Men want to work, but they also want satisfaction from their work. Men want to work, but they prefer good pay to lousy pay. Survey after survey over the past 25 years has reported that the vast majority of workers say they want work, and have a need to work. Only 4 per cent admitted they would prefer to "work for a while and then get by on unemployment insurance."

So far, those surveys reveal that the same general truth applies to the young and to the poor. Despite all the common assumptions that the young are out to rip off the system and that the poor are lazy, there is little evidence of this.

One American study of the poor and work concluded that they value work as highly as do the rest of us:

They express as much willingness to take job training if unable to earn a living and to work even if they were to have an adequate income. They have, moreover, as high life aspirations as do the non-poor and want the same things, among them a good education and a nice place to live.

● (1510)

The idea that the poor are strange creatures, essentially different from us, is blatant nonsense. The reasoning is that the young today are the first pampered generation, that they have never had to work so they cannot work for a living. The actual truth is far less threatening. It is certain that the young question more. Until they acquire the responsibilities of a family they feel freer than the rest of us to complain, and to pack up their bags and go.

Studies show that they change their jobs more often than the rest of us, that they are less tolerant of much of the nonsense which passes for authority in work; but these differences, generally, are familiar. Many surveys show that the poor and the young all want what we want—satisfaction in return for work. There is no evidence of wholesale rejection of work.

However, research and common sense tell us that there is considerable and growing dissatisfaction with certain specific characterizations of work. First of all, men and women are becoming less tolerant of managements that fail to treat them like human beings. Human beings have always preferred interesting work to boring work, leaving aside a few exceptional individuals. The difference is that we really do expect more from work, and so we demand more.

One of the common complaints is about the repetitiveness and triviality of some work—stuffing or unstuffing envelopes all day; inserting a plug a thousand times; turning a nut a million times—there are numerous examples of jobs which have been deliberately designed to provide as little interest and satisfaction to the worker as possible. Closely related to this grievance is—and we often use scientific jargon for it, what we call the “mechanization of people”—the management style which presumes from the start that people are best, and most safely, reduced to the status of machinery helpers. On the top is wisdom and devotion; on the bottom is emotion and lethargy.

The United States Task Force on Work reported:

The most consistent complaint reported to our Task Force has been the failure of bosses to listen to workers who wish to propose better ways of doing things. Workers feel that bosses demonstrate little respect for their intelligence.

There are some old-fashioned grievances about work still kicking around in our society. The most common, and perhaps the most important for policy-makers, is that many of the dirtiest, hardest and most severe jobs are also the worst paying.

I want to talk for a minute about farm labour. In 1969, we imported 2,363 Americans, Mexicans and West Indians to pick tomatoes and tobacco. By 1973 the number had risen to 5,600. While that is still a small percentage of the total placement of 80,000, it is a pretty hefty increase. Why is this so? Are Canadians too lazy to do the work? Must we now import a helot class from the poor countries of the world to do our menial jobs? Are we going to depend on indentured labour and ‘Canadian okies’?

The 1973 Task Force on “the Seasonal Farm Labour Situation in Southwestern Ontario” had this to say:

In every case where we discovered that later in the season there may be a “shortfall” in farm labour in the area, i.e., an excess of demand over supply, we found—and every responsible grower and grower's representative we spoke to confirmed this—the simple, basic fact that lack of suitable accommodations is the key to the problem. Low or uncertain wage rates was a significant factor also, as the size of a seasonal farm worker's earnings is tied to his production from the fields, and several days' wages lost due to rain or unforeseeable factors can be a strong incentive to the worker to leave the job to return home or to take other employment.

This suggests that one should begin to deal with the problem not by worrying about the work ethic but by trying to make these jobs more attractive. The Ontario Federation of Labour has called for a new deal for farm labourers by extending to them laws now covering industrial workers. However, to date it has been unsatisfactory. When you see the literature, when you read what has been said and realize what the conditions are, you find it all adds up—or at least to me it seems to add up—to the conclusion that there are some jobs, at some kinds of pay, under some conditions, which Canadians will not accept. Nevertheless, as I said before, there are some Canadians ripping off the system, and they should be stopped—both the big ones and the little.

But what of this question of choice? Should Canadians, after years of education and increasing income, still be willing to accept any job, anywhere, any time? Should a skilled electrician in Kitchener be willing to dig ditches for half the pay in Fort McMurray? What are the limits? Who should enjoy them? Should the well-educated be free to pick and choose their jobs, but the common labourer be bound to take any work that comes along? The fact, of course, is that we have a double standard in these matters. We, the privileged, who rarely face such choices, think it an easy, the right and proper, thing for a man to pack up his bags, his family, and sometimes his life, and leave for work elsewhere.

We ask ourselves, therefore, why we have such a poor record in collective bargaining. Between 1960 and 1969 the number of working days lost because of industrial disputes rose tenfold from 738,700 to 7,751,880. Certainly, there are many factors that go into such an increase, but one of the most important may be job conditions and job satisfaction. There is plenty of evidence that labour and management, in both Canada and the United States, have seriously underestimated these things in assuming that all a worker cares about is the money. The American Task Force on Work said plainly:

Unions have assumed too long that they could prevent workers from being exposed to unreasonable hazards or physical strains, but not from being bored to death.

We then ask ourselves whether the incentives to work are rapidly vanishing. The Conservatives say yes; the Liberals say no, with a little doubt in their voices. In the past ten years or so, this issue has grown until it has become a major preoccupation of policy-makers. The predominant question in the minds of the Canadian people is: What will the guaranteed annual income do to the work ethic? This uncertainty is the great stumbling block to the immediate introduction of the guaranteed annual income.

[Senator Croll.]

It is not a matter of whether we can afford it in economic or fiscal terms, but a fear of what it will do to the work ethic.

● (1520)

Many Alberta farmers blame the unemployment insurance system for the disappearance of labourers. As one farmer put it, "They work long enough to become eligible for benefits, then disappear into the city where they get a cheap room and sit around on their butts eating, drinking and doing nothing. Unemployment insurance is the ruination of the country." I do not agree with him, but that was his statement.

Are we going to create a class of indentured labour in this country? Are we Canadians prepared to do our own jobs, or are we going to import, and then export, every year a desperately poor mass of people to do them for us? We have already started down the road towards this end. I have indicated to you that every year there are more migrant labourers picking tobacco, beets and tomatoes. There is talk of bringing in more people to work on the wheat farms, the cattle ranches, and in the textile mills. We have seen the huge problems of the European countries, and the way in which they have had to deal with indentured labour. You will remember that Switzerland recently had a national referendum on setting a limit to the number of workers who would be allowed to come in. Is that what we are aiming at? If not, then we shall have to do something pretty drastic to improve these jobs, and to find Canadians to take them.

There are other good reasons for a Senate investigation. I hope there will be one, because this is a bread and butter issue in this country at the present time. When we devote ourselves to it, I think we will find that we do not know very much about Canadians at work. I know we all consider ourselves experts, and we all have some common-sense ideas on the subject, but no one will be amazed to discover that some of us, some of the time, hate our jobs. There is no mystery in that. What we need to understand better than we do is why the discontent and the bad conditions exist, and how we should go about changing them. Why are organizations and managers so devoted to controlling employees? Why not more power sharing and trust? Why are certain jobs so miserable and so poorly paid? Or conversely, have we educated young people to expect the impossible of jobs? If these questions sound to you as though they are about work itself and not about attitudes to work, so be it. We go where the problem leads.

Secondly, we need a Senate investigation, with a full public discussion, because Canadians need to talk and argue openly about these matters. We cannot come to any conclusions about welfare, unemployment or unemployment insurance, without it. We have to find the facts and present them to the people.

We are not now recommending an antiseptic survey of public opinion where people say, "Yes," "No," or, "I don't know." We have had many of those and we will have many more. Our purpose should be not merely to get reactions, but to join Canadians in thinking and arguing about work. This is essential. Work is one of those major facts of life that do not receive the attention they deserve from politicians.

We require an investigation into the work ethic in Canada because work is, and in the foreseeable future will remain, a basic condition and requirement of human life; because job satisfaction is an increasingly important determinant of social and economic well-being; and because there is much disagreement about the degree and breadth of alienation from work, since we know far less than we need to know about how Canadians view their jobs, and act upon those views.

The function of a Senate investigative committee, if it is decided to establish one, would be to encourage research, public discussion, experimentation and reform, with meaningful and practical recommendations.

Finally, the whole point of the exercise is to open up a system to promote justice in poor jobs, and satisfaction in all jobs. It is to lure and entice Canadians into the work force in order to produce. No matter what they produce, it will be to the benefit of the country. There are far too many Canadians who are rigidly stuck in place, viewing any change as a threat to the old order. We have a great deal to learn about that large zone of change between inertia and catastrophe. Work needs changing, but men need work.

Senator Lamontagne has on the Order Paper a motion for the appointment of a committee, to be known as the Special Committee of the Senate on Science Policy, to organize and hold a conference for the purpose of determining the feasibility of establishing a commission on the future. I am not here to oppose that motion, but I have asked the honourable senator to hold off at least until I have spoken, and until the Senate has made up its mind with regard to the committee I am suggesting.

My view respecting this matter is that we have got to fix our priorities. Our first priority is the work of the Senate—second sober thought. That work must be done above everything else. The composition of a special committee on science policy as envisaged by Senator Lamontagne, would take about a third of the Senate and, in my view, 70 per cent of the working senators. We cannot possibly name all those senators to one committee, and expect an issue as important as the one I have been talking about all afternoon to be dealt with properly by the remainder. If we decide to proceed with a committee on the work ethic—and I do not see how we can do otherwise—we must have a committee of talent. Senators cannot be allotted to that committee; they will have to be designated because of their expertise, their competence and their dedication, and they must constitute a cross section of the Senate. This is certainly not going to be an easy committee to establish, especially if those senators suggested in Senator Lamontagne's motion are taken out of circulation.

It may be said, "Well, that committee will sit only four or five weeks," but I know Senator Lamontagne. Once he gets going, four or five weeks will be only the first day. After that, he will get going with a real number of meetings, and goodness knows where he will wind up. He and the members of the committee will be very busy. A study of the work ethic, however, will be a full-time job for at least one year. I make the suggestion, therefore, that until such time as we establish our priorities the motion of Senator Lamontagne not be proceeded with. After that, if we decide to go ahead, such changes as are appropriate can be made.

Honourable senators, that is my presentation with regard to this committee.

On motion of Senator Asselin, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Senator Perrault tabled:

Copies of a Note from the Government of Canada to the Government of the United States, dated November 19, 1974, concerning the Presidential Proclamation imposing a temporary quantitative limitation on imports into the United States of certain cattle, beef, swine and pork from Canada.

Revised Capital Budget of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1975, pursuant to section 70(2) of the Financial Administration Act, Chapter F-10, R.S.C., 1970, together with copy of Order in Council P.C. 1974-2455, dated November 8, 1974, approving same.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, November 26, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Before the question is put, I should like, as usual, to give a brief outline of the work program for next week. As honourable senators know, we have several legislative measures on the Order Paper which will come up for second reading and which will probably be referred to some of our standing committees. I cannot at this stage inform the house as to the sequence in which they will be referred back to us, but I can say that these bills will be considered by the Senate in the order in which they are returned from our committees.

I should also inform honourable senators that the committee schedule for next week is already heavy. On Tuesday afternoon—remember that the Senate will not be sitting—the Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will meet. The Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will continue with its study of competition in Canada and it will also consider Bill S-15, to amend the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce Act.

Senator Flynn: If the bill is referred.

Senator Langlois: Yes. It is possible that the Agriculture Committee will meet Tuesday afternoon to complete its examination of Bill S-10, to amend the Feeds Act. The Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Science will consider Bill C-22, to amend the Canada Pension Plan.

On Thursday the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will hold a meeting. The Committee on Transport and Communications will commence its study of the controversial CBC French network program "Les Beaux Dimanches." The Foreign Affairs Committee will continue its study of Canadian relations with the United States. The Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service will hold another meeting. Of course, should the bills referred to those committees be received back here, they will also be considered in this house during the week.

In addition, I should say it is expected that we will receive some bills from the House of Commons and that we will have another bill for introduction in the Senate.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, just to keep the record straight with regard to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, did I understand the deputy leader to say that that committee would probably meet on Tuesday afternoon to complete its study of Bill S-10?

Senator Langlois: Yes, I said the committee would meet on Tuesday, and hopefully it will complete its work.

Senator Argue: It is quite conceivable it will not complete its work, because there are certain highly important witnesses to come before that committee. It is my intention that the committee will do a thorough job on the bill and we will not complete our work until we have done what we consider to be an effective study of the bill.

Senator Langlois: I had no intention whatsoever, Senator Argue, to curtail the excellent work of that committee.

Senator Walker: Touché.

Senator Flynn: You just used the formula from the previous session, when Senator Martin was leader.

Senator Langlois: You have a very good memory, senator.

Motion agreed to.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

IMPLEMENTATION OF RESOLUTION—REPORT TO PARLIAMENT TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I have the privilege of tabling the report to Parliament on the implementation of the official languages resolution adopted by Parliament in June, 1973, dated November 21 of 1974. I would request the opportunity to make a brief statement in connection with the tabling of this document.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in June 1973, my predecessor, the Honourable Paul Martin, introduced in this chamber a resolution recognizing and approving principles for achieving the equality of status of English and French as the official languages in the Public Service of Canada.

[Translation]

I take great pleasure today in tabling, on behalf of the government, a report on the steps which have been taken to implement this resolution.

[English]

The report contains the results of the process of identifying the language requirements of all positions in the Public Service of Canada for which the Treasury Board is the employer. Information is provided on the number of bilingual employees occupying positions identified as bilingual, as well as data related to language training for public servants.

When the resolution to which this report refers was introduced in this chamber, the Honourable Leader of the Opposition, the Honourable Senator Flynn, asked how many positions in the National Capital Region would be identified as bilingual. This report shows that the number of bilingual positions identified in this region is 35,611. Honourable senators will also learn in reading this report that 53 per cent of incumbents of bilingual positions are bilingual, leaving an estimated training load of some 19,000 persons.

The number of positions identified as bilingual in the whole of the Public Service is 53,600, compared to the estimate of 25,000 made in December 1972. The main reasons for this are that the number of bilingual positions required to serve the public as well as to provide internal services to other public servants was underestimated. In addition, to allow public servants to work in the official language of their choice, the number of supervisory positions is higher than estimated.

[Translation]

The government wishes to enable the largest possible number of civil servants to gain some knowledge of the other official language. To that effect, linguists of renown will conduct a study with a view to finding out why some people seem unable to learn the other language, and whether present teaching methods cannot be improved.

[English]

In addition, at the request of the government, the Public Service Commission has agreed that effective immediately, unilingual employees, age 60 or over, will automatically be exempted from language training while retaining the right to occupy or be appointed to bilingual positions. This means that a unilingual employee, age 60 or over, who has all the other qualifications for a bilingual position, can be appointed to the position without having to become bilingual.

Senator Walker: How generous.

[Translation]

Senator Perrault: The resolution adopted by Parliament in June 1973 provided for measures to increase the use of the French language in the public service and to ensure full representation of both the English-speaking and the French-speaking groups. The statistics contained in this report give the linguistic profile of the public service and show that some progress has been made in that area. I strongly believe that honourable senators wish that this progress continue.

[English]

The government wishes to express its appreciation to the certified bargaining agents who were consulted during the process of implementing the resolution adopted by Parliament. The fruitfulness of these consultations with the employee representatives deserves special mention, particularly the work of the Official Languages Committee of the National Joint Council.

Senator Walker: Would the honourable Leader tell me how many employees there are in the National Capital Commission at the present time?

Senator Perrault: I am unable to give the exact figure. I think that information will be contained in the report, but if it is not then I shall undertake to get it for you.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, because I was given notice of this statement by the leader of the Government only a few minutes ago, it is very difficult for me to comment to any extent at this time. However, I will say that I am happy that we have this report and I hope that we will have occasion to consider it, if not to debate it.

I realize, and it is clear from this report, as was indicated in the statement made by the Leader of the Government, that it is rather a difficult task to implement the Official Languages Act in the Public Service. But a desirable objective it is, and everything that is being done to achieve it is welcome on this side of the house.

I shall only add as a footnote that I notice that the Leader of the Government has been practising his French and has improved very much and very quickly.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: I would simply like to tell him that his accent is as good as his predecessor's, Senator Martin.

Senator Perrault: I have a western accent.

MANITOBA INDIAN BROTHERHOOD

MEETING WITH SENATORS

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to draw the attention of the Senate to a meeting which was held this morning between honourable senators and the President of the Manitoba Indian Brotherhood, members of that executive and certain chiefs of the Indian Brotherhood.

It was a very important meeting, and in my view the results were excellent. I particularly noted the statement of one Indian representative that this was the most impressive and the most satisfactory meeting they have attended since coming to Ottawa. They had endeavoured to meet with the Committee on Indian Affairs of the other place but because of the schedule for that committee it was found that they could not meet with the Indian representatives until January next.

My main reason for raising this point is to suggest that the method by which we met the Indian representatives this morning could be greatly improved upon. I suggest that when an important organization like that wishes to meet with senators, the preferable way of doing it is to have the organization appear before one of our standing committees. In this instance it would be our Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, which normally deals with matters connected with Indians.

Such an arrangement would carry with it great advantages, in that we would have a public hearing, there would be a public record and the press could be invited to be present. The country would benefit by having available the record of the Senate standing committee and would know that in this situation, as in so many others, the Senate is doing its job. I think we should try in the future to meet organizations like this in committee, because it would assure adequate representation of the Senate, the making of a public record and the attendance of the press.

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, if I may be permitted to add a brief comment to what has just been said by Senator Argue, I am in perfect accord with his remarks in connection with this morning's meeting. I should add that the attendance of senators was excellent, as was their participation. I agree with his suggestion that the next meeting with this group of Canadians should be arranged to take place before a standing Senate committee. As I understand it, this morning's meeting was at the request of the Indian group, who wished to have an informal meeting with senators. I am sure that they were satisfied with the attendance and participation of our colleagues.

Senator Benidickson: I believe there were approximately 30 senators present.

Senator Langlois: I did not count them.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, I did not intend to raise this matter, but as the meeting with the Indians has been brought up I would like to say that sometimes our communications in the Senate fall down. This is certainly not because of any dereliction of duty on the part of anyone, but just by accident. Today, for instance, I heard of the meeting with the Indians when the meeting was just about over. I inquired as to how one might have been informed and was told that the Whips had notified the members of their respective caucus. In my opinion this is a fine method of dealing with it, except that the Whip in my party was not on duty today. I received no notice of the meeting with the Indians and I suspect there are a few other members of the Senate who are not members of one of the caucuses. I do not make these remarks in any spirit of criticism. I just feel that we can do better than we did in this particular matter this morning.

Senator Riel: What about your own Whip?

Senator Molson: I will deal with my Whip, but I am dealing now with the procedure in the Senate. In a matter of this nature, when a group attends to talk with senators, it should be dealt with as a Senate matter. It is no reflection at all on the method of dealing with these matters through the caucuses. That is a most efficient and probably the best method of transmitting a notice, but it does not take in every one of us, and some of our parties which are a little removed from the centre of affairs.

I would suggest that in connection with this and similar matters, the responsibility should be placed upon the staff of the Senate to make known the activities which will occur.

Senator Langlois: You need a deputy leader.

Senator Walker: May I ask the leader whether it is true that the Indians this morning, as a result of the wonderful reception led by Senator Argue, have in mind making him an honorary chief?

Senator Perrault: I do not know whether that action is contemplated, but I believe that all of us were very much gratified by the superb attendance of senators at the meeting this morning.

EXPLOSIVES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator Barrow moved the third reading of Bill S-17, to amend the Explosives Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Senator Benidickson moved the third reading of Bill C-27, to amend the Customs Tariff.

He said: Honourable senators, when this bill received second reading on November 14, Senator Connolly (Ottawa West) raised a question relating to the inadequacy of certain information in the schedules to this bill which came to us from the House of Commons. His question appears at page 262 of the Debates of the Senate for November 14.

I have pursued the point. I have communicated with our Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel, Mr. Hopkins, and have sent copies of correspondence that has ensued to the Leader of the Government, Madam Speaker, the Speaker of the House of Commons, and Senator Goldenberg, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Since then it has seemed more appropriate that this matter of adequate printing for Senate purposes of bills originating and passed in the House of Commons should probably be referred to the Chairmen of the Joint Committee on Printing of Parliament, and that will be done.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

STATUTES OF CANADA

BILL TO REVISE REFERENCES TO THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH OF THE PROVINCE OF QUEBEC—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, November 19, the debate on the motion of Senator Langlois for the second reading of Bill S-16, to revise references to the Court of Queen's Bench of the Province of Quebec.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I listened very carefully and with a lot of interest to Senator Langlois when he moved last Tuesday night that Bill S-16 be passed on second reading. He will admit that I interrupted him only once and, since he did not appreciate this interruption, I then remained completely silent.

Senator Langlois: I even pointed that out.

Senator Flynn: I adjourned the debate to be able to read the speech in Hansard. He gave us, or he told us, the history of the Court of Queen's Bench, that will have survived for 125 years.

He indicated the problems caused by having two superior courts, one having jurisdiction in civil matters and the other in criminal matters, while both are presided over by the same judges.

The lengthy jurisprudence that he quoted showed that sometimes the judge wonders if he is competent because, when he sits on the Court of Queen's Bench, he can be told that a case is a civil matter and when he sits on the Superior Court of Quebec he may have to try a case that could be considered a criminal matter.

Senator Langlois should be congratulated for having placed on the record such detailed research which undeniably supports Bill S-16.

When I was reading his speech, I told myself that this was a work of laborious scholarship and that Senator Langlois must certainly have spent a very long weekend, if not two, on its preparation.

Senator Langlois mentioned that, unless he was mistaken, Quebec was the only province with two superior courts of first instance, one for civil matters and the other for criminal matters, which are completely independent of one another even though they are presided over by the same judges. He is absolutely right, because the Judges Act, chapter J-1, Revised Statutes of Canada, provides that in Ontario the Supreme Court is the only superior court with double jurisdiction, civil and criminal. The same in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, British Columbia, Prince Edward Island, Alberta and Saskatchewan, where the only court of first instance with civil and criminal jurisdiction is the Supreme Court.

In Manitoba, there is also one court which is called the Court of Queen's Bench.

Also in Saskatchewan, one court, also called the Court of Queen's Bench.

When the Quebec National Assembly abolished the Court of Queen's Bench to grant to the Quebec Superior Court the double jurisdiction of first instance, it was under the provisions of the British North America Act which gives power to provincial legislatures to pass legislation concerning the application of justice, including the setting up, organization, maintenance and administration of courts with both civil and criminal jurisdiction. I refer here to paragraph 14, section 92, of the British North America Act.

It seems to me that the Quebec National Assembly had good reasons to do so as it is evident from the facts reported by the sponsor of the bill. However it is more a procedural matter. In some cases, not only did the problem derive from the fact that the justiciables erroneously appeared before the Court of Queen's Bench instead of the Superior Court or conversely, but recently, in a ruling given by the Superior Court in Montreal, a judge dismissed petition for contempt of court based on the refusal to comply with an injunction of a judge in the same court, alleging that the nature of the offence was criminal rather than civil. However, the injunction had been pronounced by the Superior Court in civil matters. But the judge of the Superior Court alleged that it had been wrong to go to Superior Court instead of the Court of Queen's Bench.

In this particular case, it is clear that the judge was looking for a reason not to apply the law, because his decision was based for that matter on motives which he himself described as social and political ones, motives which I feel should never affect the basis of a decision.

As a matter of fact, the separation of the legislative from the judiciary remains a principle both essential and necessary. Judges are not appointed to make laws but to apply them. They should keep away from the legislators' responsibilities. They are free to recommend changes to the law, but it is not because they do not agree with a particular piece of legislation that they can take upon themselves not to apply it. Jack of all trades, master of none.
